According to Francis De Souza, the four buildings were once owned by the Sassoon J. David Trust and later acquired by the Tatas. The Tatas then sold it to Bahl reportedly, for a total of Rs one lakh, in 1977. Two of the four buildings are residential-cum-commercial and the other two are purely commercial. All the residential premises occupied by previous owners were forcibly taken over and more area was added to the restaurant. The empty space has been used by Bahl to construct illegally a fifth building. It is believed that Bahl did not submit the plans for approval to the municipal authorities and went ahead aware that he could get it regularised and that the battle in the courts would go in his favour.

Bahl's modus operandi for making additions to his restaurant was simple. On Friday nights, equipment would arrive; by 5 pm the next day, gangs of workers would arrive and work would begin that night and continue till Sunday night. When residents of the building and of neighbouring buildings would complain about the noise, he would pay no attention. Bahl was employing the same tactics on 31 March when the fire broke out. He was installing a third tandoor without any permission from the corporation. During the welding work, the apparatus blew up setting the carpets on fire and finally all the other rooms: The Moghul Room, The Maharaja Room, The Party Room, The Walk-in, the pantry and the kitchen. As Mr Pinto said, "The most controversial portion of the restaurant has disappeared."

Four residents of the building, Madhukar Rane, Bharat Patel, K. David and V.D. Kanchan along with some other residents claimed that they were "living with a bomb. If it had exploded, it would have been a disaster for hundreds of people," they said. "On the day of the fire, we saw two tempos taking away around 120 gas cylinders, all of them illegally stored in two feet wide passages of our buildings. More than a year ago the fire brigade had asked for their removal but besides giving assurances, Mr Bahl did nothing," one of the residents added.

How could Bahl get away with it and for so long? In 1983, during a public furore, urban development minister Ramrao Adik had kept the Bahl action file in his "safe" custody for a whole year. The then municipal commissioner was too timid to ask for it so that proceedings could begin against Bahl. At that time, the 'A' ward officer Mr Pinto initiated action against him and because action was pending, Pinto did not renew his licence for running the restaurant. But Bahl continued to operate the restaurant without a licence. On 22 August, Bahl approached Mr D.M. Sukhtankar, the then chairman of the Bombay Municipal Corporation to ask him to order Pinto to restore the licence, and stop prosecution. However, Pinto did not accede to Mr Sukhtankar's request until the court finally let off Bahl.

What now? The residents are on the streets. The corporation is dithering over what should be done. De Souza says, "It is obvious from what we have told you that Bahl has violated all the rules, laws and regulations for the sake of personal gain without any scruples. He made the tenants of four buildings sit on gunpowder. In view of his being so ruthless, careless, negligent and inhuman, he should not be considered fit to continue as a landlord of these buildings and we tenants demand that all four buildings should be handed over to those who are willing and able to take over and carry out repairs on a cooperative basis."

Meanwhile, Bahl called a meeting with the residents on 8 April and appealed to them as "my brothers and sisters" to shift to transit camps immediately so that he could repair the burnt down structure as this was his bread and butter and he was starving. One wonders if the tenants are going to be hoodwinked by him again?

Are central government firms moving out of the state?

Are the central government organisations moving out of Hyderabad? Is it only a coincidence that in recent weeks there have been rumours of a number of central government organisations moving out of the city. There is already a belief that there is a plan to move central government offices out of Hyderabad because the state does not have a Congress(I) government. But it is the short span of time in which the reports of at least four central government organisations either closing their offices or cutting down their establishments in Andhra Pradesh which has given credence to the feeling of discrimination. After the drastic reduction of the allocation for the Visakhapatnam steel plant, there are rumours that the entire project may be shelved altogether, as the costs have escalated to an astronomical figure. Among the organisations which are reportedly planning to downgrade their activities are the Indian Tourism Development Corporation (ITDC), the Directorate of Oilseeds Research, Indian Airlines engineering base and the National Mineral Development Corporation (NMDC).

The ITDC unit in Hyderabad has been closed since the beginning of this year. The unit had incurred heavy losses during the previous year. The fleet of commercial vehicles that the unit maintained have been shifted to other centres. Employees of the corporation contend that the heavy losses are mainly due to bad management, that there was no need to close down the unit as proper management would make it profitable. Some employees, however, moved a petition in the Andhra Pradesh High Court against the closure of the unit, but the petition was dismissed. The other organisation that is likely to bring down its shutters in Hyderabad is the Directorate of Oilseeds Research, housed at the Andhra Pradesh Agricultural University since its inception in 1977. The directorate moved into its own building in Rajendranagar just last year when the building was inaugurated by the union minister for agriculture.

The Visakhapatnam steel plant has been plagued by a shortage of funds. Other major problems are: an inadequate supply of water and the possible increase in costs. A delegation of the city Congress(I) committee has called on the Prime Minister to plead for more funds for the steel plant.

Another central government establishment which is likely to be moved out of Hyderabad is the National Mineral Development Corporation (NMDC), a Hyderabad based central government corporation. There is a proposal to merge NMDC with the Minerals and Metals Trading Corporation (MMTC) as an integrated operation combining mining, ore handling and export would reduce costs. A merger with MMTC will mean that the headquarters of the NMDC will be moved to Delhi. NMDC employees apprehend that a merger could lead to large-scale transfers of staff and even retrenchment, affecting hundreds of employees.

The Union steel minister Vasant Sathe who inaugurated NMDC's new office building in Hyderabad and a meeting of the Federation of All India NMDC Employees Unions said that he was against the merger proposal. But the union leaders are afraid that other considerations may finally prevail. The note on the proposal is still doing the rounds of the steel ministry.

Telugu Desam Party's general secretary Mr P. Upendra, replying to questions about the shifting of these establishments said: "Our reaction to these things is well-known." In the early 1970s, a number of organisations including BHEL R and D, defence research establishments, IDPL, the HAL Electronics Division and ECIL had moved into Hyderabad. In the early 1980s, tremendous activity had begun on the outskirts of Hyderabad at Patencheru in Medak constituency when it was represented by Mrs Indira Gandhi in the Lok Sabha. Now, the big question being asked is why the conditions which made Hyderabad a suitable location for these establishments have suddenly changed.

Brush with India

"Pakoras, silver bangles and the star-studded skies are the things we liked best about India." This was the conclusion Kevin, Greta and Enilda, young artists from New York City public (state) schools, came to after their two-week stay in India as a part of the Festival of India activities. The children won the trip to India by painting portraits of India in a competition organised by the Asia Society. "I used to dream about India," says Greta, "men in turbans, bright saris, and the Taj Mahal, so I drew these images. I guess they chose my drawing because that's what everyone feels about India." After staying here with Indian families and travelling, the children found the India of their dreams different. "The people are real nice but they speak so many languages and keep asking you to eat more," said the confused teenage New Yorker Kevin, "and why do boys hold hands here all the time?"

Training Cells

Chess anyone? "You can have training programmes for chess just as you might for hockey, football," says Bob Wade, chief trainer of the British Chess Federation, now visiting India, a land of chess from where, alas, only a few chessplayers make a mark in international tournaments. Those grey cells can easily be marshalled, as can the muscles, according to this international master who was twice the British champion, and was given the Empire for his contribution to this exacting game. The secret of improving the quality of chess players lies in getting grandmasters to train or at least examine how young players perform. What India needs is a "star". There are no Amitabh Bachchans of chess in this country to add to razzle dazzle. Neither is there publicity to this game which is, according to Wade, all in the mind. When his country realised it was slipping badly in chess, a training programme was started and 15 years later, Britain inched to second place.

Set to Succeed

On the day after Raja Man Singh of Bharatpur was killed in the busy grain market of Deeg by the police, his daughter, Deepa Singh, sat in his huge, rather frayed armchair by the fireplace.

Stroking the arm of the chair, she had said, "I am sitting on daddy's throne." Dazed, though she was then, her remark might prove to be prophetic: the Raja's daughter will be contesting the coming byelections for the Deeg Assembly seat (the election was countermanded) as an independent candidate which her father had held in the Rajasthan Assembly since 1952. Chances are that the Congress(I) might not put up a candidate against her. Nor would the opposition like to oppose this rather strong personality. Normally Deepa lives with her husband and little daughter in Saharanpur. She may now have to move to Bharatpur and Jaipur. Not only has the chair to be occupied, but also the MLA's flat her father had:

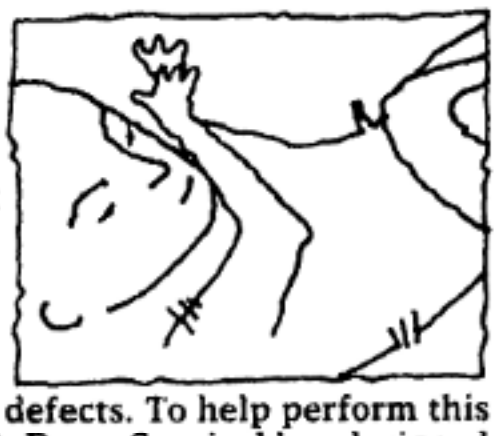
A Chip Above

Just as the small-budget filmmaker made it to the box-office, along came video piracy and later the indigenous television serials to snuff out the brief euphoria. So, in the join-them-rather-than-lick-them strategy, many are going to make films for television. One of them is Suresh Jindal who cajoled Satyajit Ray to make Shatranj ke Khilari in Hindi. He also produced the first small-budget big-hit Rajnigandha and is now busy producing a film based on Prem Chand's novel written in the Twenties: Panch Parmeshwar. The film is to be directed by Kundan Shah for television. Not daunted by the new age of television, Jindal is quite enthusiastic about the transformation in the world of communications: "Man first began to walk, then came the horse, the automobile, the car, electronics and now communication is through dust—that little silicon chip, what else is it?" The cinema hall-owners will now have to behave themselves, according to Jindal who foresees a day when one video cassette recorder will serve 100,000 theatres. "Maybe we will have one giant video screen outside the ministry of information and broadcasting, projecting over the entire capital city."

Suresh Jindal

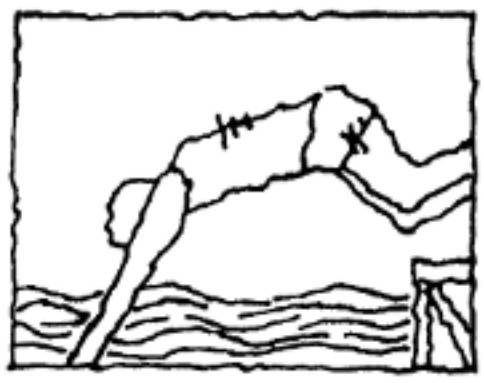
Jindal at present has more pressing problems on hand. He has sued the government of Uttar Pradesh for not exempting his national award-winning film, Katha from entertainment tax. Says Jindal: "From 1978, which was incidentally Shatranj ke Khilari's year, all the award-winning films, including last year's have been exempted from paying (entertainment) tax."

CHP-Rice Flour: Rich in Protein



A new hope now emerges for undernourished children in Third World countries. Scientists in the agriculture department of the United States have developed a technique for producing a kind of rice flour that is three times richer in protein than standard rice flour and could help reduce malnutrition. The flour, called CHP-rice flour, contains 25 per cent protein, compared with eight per cent for standard rice flour. Wheat flour has about 12 per cent protein. The new processing method, which the department is making available for commercial use, involves adding an enzyme from the fungus aspergilus oryzae, commonly used in the food processing industry, to a rice flour solution.

Exploding a Myth



There is a false impression that accident victims deliberately exaggerate their injuries in order to gain compensation. Such injuries disappear once they get the money. This erroneous notion of "accident neurosis" started in the early Sixties when a neurologist suggested that some victims of accidents deceived the courts and exaggerated their injuries in order to increase their compensation. This view has appealed to many lawyers who have treated claims with scepticism. However, a report in the British Journal of Psychiatry says that patients who were said to have 'accident neurosis' complained of physical problems long after they were given accident compensation. Long after the legal wranglings were completed the vast majority of patients were still unfit and, for the most part, were either unable to work or not able to take back the physical and emotional responsibilities they had before

In Search of Birth Defects

Achorian biopsy is an operation where samples are taken from different parts of the placenta and can be performed in the first three months of pregnancy. Great care is taken at this stage so that the foetus is not damaged, but in skilled hands the test can reveal many birth defects. To help perform this delicate operation, Britain's Down Surgical has designed an extremely precise instrument called the KCH cannula. The manufacturer, working with King's College hospital, London, has produced the cannula from malleable 16 gauge silver tubing 260mm long. The instrument can be "modelled" into the appropriate shape depending on the foetal position. The device has to be used in association with ultrasound equipment, which the operator uses to guide the instrument precisely.

Harmful Sport

Deep-sea diving could damage the brain, as a research in Lancaster university has shown. Older divers suffer from a loss of memory and other mental problems compared to their younger colleagues. The research states that working in harsh environments such as those existing in the North Sea over a long period could lead to brain damage and thereby poorer performances.

For a Longer Life

Four researchers in the United States have discovered a natural substance which promotes the rapid growth of new blood vessels. This could help patients suffering from heart disease or stroke and might also be useful in the treatment of cancer. The team injected a substance derived from cat omentum—a membraneous apron which covers organs in the abdomens of animals and humans—into rabbit corneas, an area devoid of blood vessels. After three days new vessels appeared.

Heartening Experiment

A team of Osaka university medical experts have kept the hearts of "braindead" patients alive for up to 54 days. It's the world's first experiment. Dr Tsuyoshi Sugimoto, leader of the team, said they kept six hearts alive for between nine and 54 days with the aid of a hormone that maintains a certain level of blood pressure. Normally, the heart stops beating a few days after the brain's death.

Longer Periods of Painlessness

Scientists in the United States have developed a technique for enveloping a local anaesthetic so that it works for up to 40 hours with a single injection. The new strategy should relieve chronic or surgical pain without stopping the healing. Later, it may be applied to anti-cancer and anti-arthritis drugs, permitting direct injection into affected areas to avert side-effects and deliver medicine only where it is needed. Using the technique would require less anaesthetic and so would be less costly.

The method involves enclosing tiny droplets of a drug in membranes resembling those of a human cell. The idea is at least 20 years old, but droplets can carry much greater amounts of drug than previously developed particles, generally known as liposomes. When a local anaesthetic is injected, it spreads to surrounding tissue. To increase the effect and duration of the drug's action, a higher dose may have to be given. This could be dangerous, since higher doses produce higher blood levels of the drug and could lead to convulsions and heart attacks.

BANGALORE: There are coins embossed with figureheads. But have you come across currency notes stamped with a portrait of Mahatma Gandhi? A trickster produced such a "rare note" to dupe a shopkeeper here on 26 March. The owner of a government fair price shop at Shantinagar told police that a stranger showed him the note on 26 March. When the surprised victim, Mr Lakshman Gowda, rubbed his eyes in disbelief, the conman told him confidently that there must be at least a dozen such notes in the cash box, which the shopkeeper had simply not noticed. What followed was an earnest search for the Mahatma currency in the cash box, with the stranger generously offering a helping hand. After searching the bundles of notes in vain, the stranger gave it up in exasperation. The bemused man walked away shaking his head in wonder. Hours later the shopkeeper discovered to his horror that Rs 3,000 was missing from the cash box—The Times (Waheed Khan Bawadiwale, Hubli)

MADRAS: A legislator of the AIADMK played a prank on the speaker in the Tamil Nadu Assembly to mark All Fools' Day. During question hour, Mr S. Duraiswamy (AIADMK) raised his hand. Presuming that the member wanted to ask a supplementary question, the speaker, Mr P.H. Pandiyan, allowed him to speak. Rising to his feet, Mr Duraiswamy announced he had received a message that Mr Pandiyan had been made the secretary general of the United Nations. As the members of the House burst into laughter, Mr Pandiyan reported: "I know today is 1 April"—The Telegraph (Dr Prahlad Ghosh, Calcutta)

SHILLONG: A primary health centre in the Patharkhama area of East Khasi Hills was being run by its chowkidar single-handed for want of requisite staff, according to an opposition legislator of the Meghalaya Assembly. Speaking on a cut motion on demands for grants for the health department, Mr Garson Lyngdoh said the chowkidar had to work as doctor, compounder and nurse as well as administer injections—Hindustan Times (I. J. Sharma, Unchahar, Uttar Pradesh)

NASIK: The Nasik unit of the Janata Party took out a funeral procession here on 25 March to highlight the inefficient working of the telephone department and demanding immediate remedial action on complaints. For people, acting as pall-bearers, carried the telephone on their shoulders while other processionists chanted "Ram Nam Satya Hai." Women in some areas sprinkled water in front of their houses in the traditional manner, as the procession moved on—Indian Express (M. BANGALORE: A case of an avaricious wife manipulating to get her living husband as dead with a view to inheriting his property was brought to light in the Assembly on 28 March. Mr Vedanta Hemmige (Janata) said he wanted an explanation from the government and added that the man had already decided to sue the government for a sum of Rs one lakh for issuing the certificate without investigating the claim of the wife—Deccan Herald (K.V. Harsha, Bangalore)

SALEM: After a 45-hour struggle, a purblind, pregnant,elephant that was stuck in the boggy area of the Dhandikkam reservoir near Dhenkanikotta in Dharmapuri district was tugged out of the slush by some 500 villagers on 2 April, but not before it was tranquillised. As usual, the elephant, 15 months' pregnant, came to the reservoir along with her male companion on 31 March. While the male had his fill from the edge of the reservoir, the female elephant, said to be blind in the left eye, walked into the swamp and was stuck knee-deep in the mud. Eye-witnesses said the elephant had raised a tearful cry and the male elephant stretched out its trunk but it was not possible to pull her out. On 1 April the male elephant retreated into the forest on seeing the village crowd. When forest officials began rescue operations by placing huge logs in front of the trapped animals, it tried to walk on them but they sank in the slush. As a last resort, a rope was tied round the animal and the villagers pulled it out to safety—The Hindu (Ali Akbar Teherally, Madras)

It has been a long time since I published a game played by John Nunn. Unfortunately there came a point in his career where he stopped winning short brilliancies against weak players and started winning long brilliancies against strong players, the latter being notoriously difficult to publish and explain without resorting to serialisation

Despite the change in his style, John remains of course a devastating attacking player I never cease to be amazed by those who still blithely walk into sharp variations of the Sicilian against him Inferior sharp variations at that. The following is a typical result

Word Power

The end of each word clued is a word in itself and is also clued. For instance, the word FOREHEAD could be clued in this way.-

WHOLE WORD — END
brow — chief

Now fill in the grid according to the clues given below. If you complete it correctly, you will find that the first letters reading downwards will give you another word Can you say what this word is?

CLUES:

WHOLE WORD	END
On all sides	Globular
Household	Period
Moisten	Passage
Coarse seaweed	Fish hook
Inattentive	Despatched
Compact collection	Obtain
Account	Narrative
Hidden word	Political star

Anil was not the son nor the nephew (clue 3) so he was the brother. Neither he nor the nephew got the business and Rs 2 lakhs (clue 3), therefore the son inherited this. His name was not Prakash (clue 2) nor Anil (clue 3) so it was Jagdish. Therefore Prakash was the nephew who inherited the car. We already know that Nina the daughter received Rs 3 lakhs, Mona the niece Rs 50,000 and Jagdish the son Rs 2 lakhs. Prakash the nephew got more than Anil the brother (clue 3) and inherited Rs 25,000 along with the car. Mona did not receive the house so she got the paintings and Nina inherited the house.

Mahesh Bhatt is working on a film that will make or break Kumar Gaurav and Sunjay Dutt. The two star sons have been clearly outclassed by Sunny Deol, Jackie Shroff or even Anil Kapoor. Just when directors were shying away from them, Rajendra Kumar and Sunil Dutt put their heads together and approached Mahesh Bhatt for help. The latter obliged and started Naam. The film is about illegitimate children and Poonam Dhillon and Amrita Singh are there to add glitter to it. Also at stake are the lakhs of rupees which Rajendra Kumar is investing. "This is a major attempt for my company which suffered heavy losses But I want to see the boys coming alive again. This is their last chance," Kumar Gaurav's father said confidently.

Producers and directors who once queued up before Zeenat Aman's door to sign her up are now neglecting the actress. Reason: age is finally telling upon the sensation of Satyam, Shivam, Sundaram and her exposures no longer titillate the audience. For the last six months Zeenat has not signed a single film. A record of sorts for a star who not very long ago signed a film a day.

Misfortunes never come alone. Basu Bhattacharya's troubles started the day his wife, Rinki, walked out on him and started a campaign against him. In several interviews to gossip magazines, Rinki talked about the torture and humiliation she suffered at the hands of the director for 16 years. Basu Bhattacharya on his part is silent regarding these charges. His mental agony has been compounded by the fact that two of his films failed to take off due to lack of finances.

Dilip Kumar's illness has upset Subhash Ghai who was all set to launch his ambitious project, Karma. But Subhash is made of sterner stuff and he has decided to continue shooting without the legendary superstar. "I know how to make up things at the last moment ... I have done it before and I am going to do it this time also," Subhash said.

Zeenat Aman: neglected

Jayasudha has forgotten her past. She divorced her first husband and is now happily married to Jeetendra's cousin. Her future plans in her own words: "I have decided to concentrate on film direction." Another Aparna Sen in the making?

The Telugu film industry is passing through a crisis. Most of the grand extravaganzas are not doing too well at the box office and distributors too are unwilling to oblige the big budget producers due to the video invasion. A realisation is slowly dawning upon producers and artists that there should be less of money and more of acting. The sooner the realisation turns to reality, the better.

Guess who was the happiest person when the Andhra Pradesh government honoured Suhasini with the best actress award? Shobhan Babu. Ever since Suhasini entered the tinsel world in skirts, the Telugu superstar has been going around telling people that Suhasini would make it big one day. On the sets too, Shobhan Babu never loses an opportunity to compliment and encourage her.

Number Seven

The Prime Minister's house was referred to as "number one" till now, because it was situated at 1 Safdarjang Road. Mr Rajiv Gandhi having shifted to 7 Race Course Road (with bungalow No. 5 serving as the office complex), the PM's house should now be referred to by the lucky number, "seven." The shifting was done on an auspicious day, in the first phase of the "Navratri" preceding Ramnavami, the birthday of Lord Rama. The process was completed by 29 March, the "Ashtami" preceding Ramnavami. On that day Makhan Lal Fotedar, political adviser to the Congress president, also shifted from 1, Akbar Road (which was the previous office complex of the PM's house) to 5, Race Course Road. The office which Fotedar is now occupying is more spacious than the previous one. On the day of the transfer, Fotedar was in tears. He had been Mrs Indira Gandhi's aide for long. In fact, he is the only relic of the Indira Gandhi era in the new set-up. Fotedar was Mrs Gandhi's election agent in Rae

Minister On Leave

Kerala's health minister, K.P. Ramchandra Nair, has gone on a long leave. This unprecedented act has not been necessitated by reasons of health. In fact, the health of the Congress(I)-led United Democratic Front (UDF) government would have been affected had the minister not handed over his portfolio to the chief minister and "gone on leave." A member of the National Democratic Party (NDP), which has four MLAs, Nair had been under pressure from his party colleagues, who wanted him to resign so that the NDP constituent could nominate another minister. In 1982, the NDP nominee in the Karunakaran ministry was K.G. Kartha. Kartha has now mustered the support of the other two MLAs and is threatening to quit the UDF if Nair is not dropped. Chief minister Karunakaran has found an easier way out : he has taken over the health portfolio and sent the minister "on leave." In March, the transfers of doctors were processed by Kerala's health ministry. With Nair "on leave" Karunakaran has been burdened with additional administrative work concerning the doctors' transfers.

Wealthy Prisoners

Coomar Narain, the kingpin of the busted spy ring, and the international cheat Rajendra Sethia, have been lodged in adjacent cells of the Tihar jail. Both are "B" class prisoners, entitled to certain comforts. Stories trickling throughthe jail's gates have it that while Sethia is leading a carefree life, Coomar Narain is a worried man. He does not even read newspapers. One day, Coomar Narain is said to have commented to Sethia that the latter must be a regular jailbird, considering the way he is living in jail. Sethia protested and said this was his first experience. Not being in touch with newspapers, Coomar Narain asked Sethia if he was a rich man. The reply was evasive. At this point Coomar Narain is said to have told Sethia, "Have you ever seen a lakh of rupees? I have lots of money, so I am worried. You can afford to be carefree." Amused at Coomar Narain's "wealthy" disclosure, Sethia is said to have laughed at the reply.

Kathmandu or Bangkok?

Did the Russian defector, Igor Gueja, go to Kathmandu enroute to the USA? While speculation so far has been restricted to the Nepalese capital, sleuths investigating the disappearance of Gueja do not rule out the possibility of his having taken a Lufthansa flight to Bangkok from Palam airport.

The departure time of this flight just suited Gueja: it left in the forenoon. By the time Gueja's disappearance was noticed, the defector was flying in Indian airspace over Farukhabad, Lucknow, Gaya and Calcutta (the flights to Bangkok from Delhi take this route).

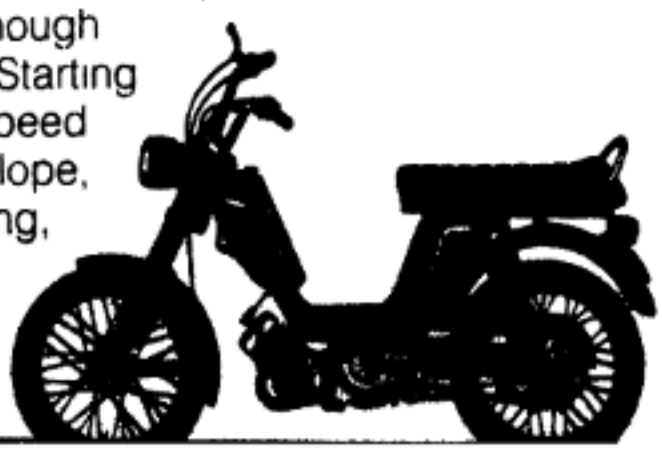
Sitaram Kesri



Sitaram Kesri, the AICC(I) treasurer, seems to have 'helped' two former Bihar chief ministers in a row. Chandra Shekhar Singh, who became a union minister on 30 March, had met the Prime Minister at a dinner on the night of 29 March. The host was Sitaram Kesri. Venue: Parliament House Annexe. The new Bihar chief minister, Bindeshwari Dubey, was being feted. The Prime Minister attended the dinner and talked to the invitees, mostly MPs from Bihar. The next morning, C.S. Singh was inducted into the council of ministers. As the chief minister of Bihar, C.S. Singh had faced opposition from Kesri. Perhaps unwittingly, Kesri helped C.S. Singh this time. Another former Bihar chief minister, Abdul Ghafoor, who is now a union cabinet minister, had shot back into the centre stage courtesy Kesri in 1983. At the Bombay session of the AICC(I), Ghafoor was literally pushed into the working committee meeting as an invitee by Kesri, who wanted to counter A.R. Antulay. Ghafoor has not looked back since then.

We asked the judge why he picked a TVS 50 XL. "Pick-up, for a start!" he quipped. "And frankly, there's enough evidence to build up a strong case in its favour. Starting is no problem. And once it's rolling, it picks up speed quickly. Even if you're going doubles and up a slope, it can do it comfortably. It's also rather well sprung, so potholes don't come as a rude shock! And it goes so easy on fuel. I've almost stopped using my car! Look at what petrol costs these days. It's criminal, I tell you! All things considered,

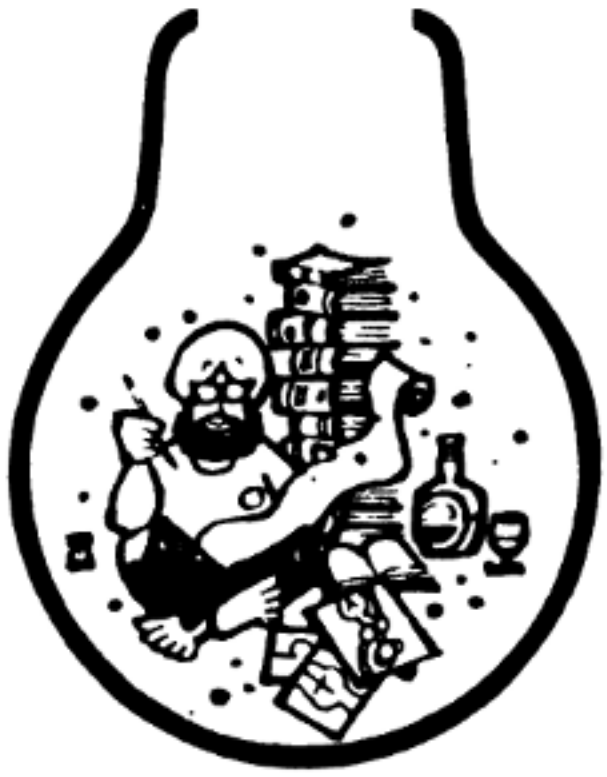
In Tamil Nadu



On the flight to Madras I found myself sandwiched between two enormous Tamil males. Tamilians come in different shapes, sizes and colours. The oversized are of the same dimensions as Zulu warriors; the average are smaller than I. Their complexions range from ebony blue-black of Nilotic tribesmen to the pale-ivory of a Jayalalitha. It was my misfortune to be wedged between two swarthy monsters both oblivious of my presence. They spread their elbows across from either side totally immobilising me. Came dinner time. With great difficulty I extricated my hip-flask from my trouser pocket and rang the bell for a tumbler of ice. Would these fellows object to my drinking in the aircraft? I turned to the bigger one of the two who seemed to be engrossed in reading what appeared to me a Tamil version of the Srimad Bhagwad Gita. Very timidly I asked him if I had his permission to imbibe spirits for which my body was thirsting. He turned from his spiritual guide-book and grunted something in Tamil-English which I wishfully interpreted as, "Drink what you like. How does it concern me?"

Dinner was served. While my neighbours polished off their trays I was unable to move my hand beyond emptying the contents of my hip-flask into my tumbler and taking it up to my lips. Except for that the two-and-a-half hour journey to Tamil Nadu would have been unbearably long. They should ban big-sized Tamilians from travelling by Boeing aircraft.

We landed in a freshly washed, humid Madras. An unseasonal shower had made it cooler than Delhi. It was barely 9 pm but there was hardly any traffic on the streets. "This is Vyjayanthimala's constituency from where she defeated Era Sezhiyan," remarked my escort as we passed by a dozen men standing by a paan-bidi stall. "Era Sezhiyan is a very honest and able politician," I said. "That's why he lost," came the prompt reply. In MGR's star-obsessed Tamil Nadu looks count for more than learning.

When I do not know where I am, I find it hard to get sleep. Besides the strange hotel-room, my throat seemed to be giving up. I got up many times during the night to see the hour. At long last came the dawn like thunder over the Bay of Bengal.

A fiery sun fought its way up through mountains of dark clouds cleaving through like a ball of molten lava and setting them aflame. For a while I watched the gory contest between the sun and the clouds before I noticed the stretch of green dotted with a few bungalows and cricket pitch beside a broad canal. I decided to let out the fetid conditioned air from the room and let in fresh ozone. I threw open the balcony door. A whiff of warm air drenched in urine assailed my nostrils. I quickly shut the door and beat a hasty retreat back to my bed.

No one goes to Madras without buying something Madrasi. Silk saris and sandal wood products seem about the sum total of all they produce. If you are flushed with black money, you cannot do better than invest it in a Conjeevaram temple sari. A good specimen can lighten your purse by Rs 10,000. There is nothing in silks for less than Rs 500. The better buys are cottons called chungdi from Madurai: all under Rs 150. You can buy them anywhere in this city but most outsiders make a bee-line for Nully. This one Chettiar-owned shop has a sale of Rs five lakhs every day.

The closer I came to speech-making, the worse my throat got. Antibiotics, gargling and throat lozenges made little impact. Like most northerners I suffer from a Tamil complex; these Tamilians are too nimble-minded for my types and would tie me up in knots. After the introductory eulogy pronounced by my friend R. Ramakrishnan, I was almost voiceless. I apologised for my hoarseness. I told them that at normal times I have, what a lady friend assured me, a sexy voice. I sounded like a randy bull frog. I croaked on for 20 minutes about the wretched state of affairs in the country and passing of the point of no return in Punjab. As they say in Tamil Ethai venumanalum of anything goes.

After the speech my throat began to mend itself. After a short siesta I had a long session with Surya Narayan Rao, head of the state RSS. It has not been fully recorded that the RSS played a very honourable role in the anti-Sikh violence of last November. Nor of efforts to instil confidence among Sikhs that they remain an integral part of Hindu society and India. It was followed by yet a longer seance with K.S. Ramanujam of The Hindustan Times. He lectured me on the benefits of meditation, vegetarianism, nature cure and Brahminical morality. Ramanujam deftly mixes self-depreciation with name-dropping.

Educated Tamilians baffle me. They have the sharpest of minds and at the same time they are utterly irrational in their addiction to caste, ritual, superstition and belief in astrology. No people in the world are as self-righteous and sanctimonious as Tamilian Brahmins. The only way the likes of M.G. Ramachandran and Karunanidhi can cope with them is by wearing dark glasses.

My friend R. Radhakrishnan is a Brahmin of the bigger breed of Tamilians. Unlike other members of his fraternity, he has no hang-ups of caste nor imposes his views on diet or drink on others. At his table the Nawab of Arcot, now Sheriff of Madras, breaks bread with the Chettiar, the Sikh and the Harijan. Radhakrishnan is an early-achiever: a top executive in his twenties; Sheriff of the city and a millionaire in his 30s and Member of Parliament in his forty's. No matter what discrimination they practise, no one can keep a Tamilian Brahmin down for too long.

The German Indologist Lassen in his Indische Alterthumskunde opined that the name Madras is a derivation of Manda Rajya realm of the stupid. Authors of Hobson Jobson believe that the German was taken for a ride by some Bengalis who resented Tamilians being regarded brighter than they. Most English who came in contact with Tami-lians regarded them as "the benighted." I am inclined to agree with the judgment.

Babu Habit

In the last year of his service a certain Babuji was made head of the cash section. All vouchers had to have his signatures before they could be cashed. He introduced a new system whereby his prior approval was required in writing before any purchases could be made. It worked so well that he decided to introduce the same system in his home.

One Sunday his wife sent him a note saying that the children wanted to eat pakoras; hence a sum of Rs 15 may kindly be sanctioned for purchasing oil, besan, paalak etc. The husband recorded that oil and besan had become too costly and beyond the reach of a middle-class family like theirs; hence the proposal was rejected. Next Sunday his wife sent another note saying that she wanted to accompany her friends to a movie; hence an amount of Rs 20 be kindly sanctioned for a cinema ticket and refreshments. The husband recorded that the pay of a government employee is almost finished by the 20th of the month and it being the last Sunday of the month, there was no money left with him. The proposal may be re-submitted in the first week of the next month. The wife got irritated and wrote an application saying that she had not visited her parents for long and should, therefore, be granted leave for one month. The husband wrote, "Leave granted Substitute may be arranged."

Mohalla Mentality

I have often wondered why in all our big cities and towns different communities live in different mohallas. Although it is not quite the same in the countryside, a similar pattern is discernible. Most villages in northern India continue to be described as Brahmin, Jat, Rajput, Aheer, Meo (Muslim) or Harijan depending on which caste predominates. Down to the tiniest hamlet, homes of one caste will be found in one lane, those of others in others with those of Harijans in the outer periphery.

I now know how these mohallas must have sprung up because I notice a new kind, the Sikh mohalla taking shape in cities like Delhi and Kanpur where members of the community were subjected to violence. Most Sikh refugees I questioned were unwilling to return to their original homes. At first they made excuses that their dwellings had been damaged beyond repair. Even after they had been repaired and re-furnished, they remained reluctant to re-occupy them and in many cases only the men came back to them during day time to rejoin their womenfolk in refugee camps or in homes of other Sikhs. Many sold their homes and shifted to areas where they are amongst larger numbers of their own community, preferably close to a gurudwara where they could go for refuge in times of trouble. It was difficult to argue with them: they simply feel insecure and will not trust the police to be even-handed in putting down communal mischief.

I am not sure if communal mohallas are necessarily a bad thing. Till such time as communal harmony remains a distant dream and law-enforcing bodies become paragons of impartiality, the mohalla guarantees undisturbed sleep.

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

In Defence of Gianiji

I have not been able to make out who was behind the recent attack made by K.K. Tewari, a senior Congress(I) MP from Bihar, on President Zail Singh in the Lok Sabha. The backing is supposed to have come "from above." But it is hard to say who the person from "above" was, because Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi himself expressed regret over press criticism of the President, even before Tewari's allegations were heard in the House.

However, the fact remains that no action has been taken against the erring MP; not even a warning has been given. That the Lok Sabha speaker, Balram Jakhar, allowed the statement despite protests from Madhu Dandavate, the Janata Party Parliament chief, and did not expunge the remarks, also indicates that there is more to this than meets the eye. The "information" given by Tewari is also not correct. He alleged that Deedar Singh Bains and Yogi Bhajan Singh, two prominent Sikhs who supported the secessionists abroad, stayed with the President at Rashtrapati Bhavan. Checking with Rashtrapati Bhavan sources, I find that the allegation is not true; they never stayed at Rashtrapati Bhavan nor is there any record of their meeting with the President. The union home minister, S.B. Chavan, a few days later informed the Lok Sabha that according to the secretary of the President, none of the two so-called "Sikh extremist" leaders had stayed with the President. Yogi Bhajan Singh had met the President during a visit in January 1983. What Tewari forgot to mention was that when these two Sikhs visited India they met both the former Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi. Bains was publicly honoured at a function arranged by Satyapal Mittal, the Congress(I) Rajya Sabha member, held in the memory of Gurmukh Singh Musafir, a former Punjab chief minister. And Rajiv Gandhi was present at a reception hosted by the World Sikh Council's branch in Delhi to Yogi. But unlike Bains, who changed sides after Operation Bluestar, Yogi is still an opponent of the demand for Khalistan and is very keenly involved in philanthropic projects in the USA.

I personally think that Zail Singh has acted in the country's interest after Operation Bluestar. If he had knuckled down under pressure from the Sikh community and resigned, we would have faced more than a constitutional crisis. Yogi Bhajan Singh was one of those who sent a cable to the President urging him to remain in office for the sake of the country and the Sikh community. Besides, the President's exemplary behaviour came to the fore when his cavalcade was stoned on 31 October 1984 while he was driving down from the airport to the All India Institute of Medical Sciences where Mrs Gandhi's body was lying. He could have very easily created an uncomfortable situation for the ruling party that day by insisting that the Congress(I) Parliamentary party elect its leader formally after Mrs Gandhi's assassination. Instead, he accepted the Congress Parliamentary Board's intimation that Rajiv Gandhi had the unanimous support of the Congress(I) Parliamentary party.

It is because of Giani Zail Singh's insistence that he should in no way compromise the office of the President and the fact that he did not step down from the office of the President after Operation Bluestar, he has had to face a barrage of criticism from the Akalis and a number of other Sikhs. But in spite of this, the President has stood his ground and the threat of excommunication by the high priests—a sword which is always hanging over his head—has not made him change his stand. The Giani may have at times shown more deference to the high priests than he should have as the President of this country, but even the President has the right to hold his own religious views and we must not overlook the fact that he is a deeply religious person. On the whole, he has behaved with restraint and propriety.

This is also reflected in the advice he has been giving the government. In fact, the recent faux pas over the presentation of awards to servicemen who took part in Operation Bluestar would not have taken place if the President's advice had been heeded to. He was against the presentation of citations to armymen for the "work" they had done during Operation Bluestar as it had meant firing on their countrymen.

But often the government's right hand does not know what the left hand is doing. The message did not reach the people in-charge of the publicity and they distributed the brochures which had been printed a few weeks earlier in which the citation, as first drafted, were handed out. At the investiture, no citation presented mentioned Operation Bluestar, Amritsar or the Golden Temple complex. For the bureaucratic bungling that failed to delete these words from the original draft sent to the press, the President had to bear the brunt of the blame and the ire of his community.

The President under our Constitution holds the highest office in the land. The person occupying that office demands proper respect. Giani Zail Singh's past involvement in the Punjab tangle may not have been above reproach, but the time to take that into account was before he was elevated to the office, not now. A campaign against him such as the one witnessed in Parliament may injure the office of President of India beyond redemption.

The Giani may have at times shown more deference to the high priests than he should have as the President of this country, but even the President has the right to hold his own religious views and we must not overlook the fact that he is a deeply religious person. On the whole he has acted with restraint and propriety.

World of Ads

Advertising in India has come a long way (1985: The Year of the Ad, 14—20 April). There is a steady flow of ad campaigns and its overall effect is overwhelming. One writes with a 'Gee flow silver-tipped ball-pen,' eats 'Maggie,' the 'two minute noodles' and rides a 'Luna' which has the distinction of being 'two out of every five mopeds on the roads.' With such consumer involvement the ad world is on its way up.
Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

• The cover story was interesting but I disagree with some of the remarks against BBC serials regarding their popularity ratings. For instance, Vanita Rawal finds the serial Sorry pathetic. To her the serial has no meaning. But to viewers like me it is the story about a dominating mother. It is a tale about a 41-year old bachelor who is over protected about by his mother. The son wants freedom but the mother objects. Similar cases are quite familiar in India, where we have joint families with the mother dominating over affairs. However, it is good that new Hindi serials have come up. But it is a pity that Doordarshan authorities have stopped telecasting foreign serials in the process. I would request Doordarshan authorities to give us more variety programmes interspersed with BBC and American serials. I also request SUNDAY to publish a report on All India Radio and its schemes to face the growing threat from television.
Syed Rashadath Ali, Calcutta

•The cover story by Sankarshan Thakur was educative and informative. The concept of advertising is changing but at whose cost? In a developing economy, consumerism should not be blown out of proportion. It hurts in many ways—our limited resources will suffer and will sow the seeds of confusion, frustration and embarrassment in the minds of the middle class. Moreover, it will enhance the laissez faire attitude in our young people.
Rajani Kant, Hyderabad

•I was pained to notice that the issue devoted to advertising contained an ad which was unaesthetic and vulgar. I am sure that a journal of SUNDAY's standard can well afford to refuse a couple of thousands and reject such ads.
Kamal Mitra, Durgapur

•While I thank Ashis Mitra of HTA for describing our agency as 'brilliant,' I regret that he was wrong in presenting facts. Grant Kenyon & Eckhardt is not a new face in advertising having been incorporated in this country in 1947.
Sandeep Chaudhuri, Calcutta

•I agree with Madhu Jain that Indian TV serials have arrived with a bang. (Be Indian, See Indian) Home-made serials like Humlog, Khandaan and Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi are a welcome change from Lucy and Yes Minister. The Indian TV serials have captured the heart of the average viewer, and I must say, that the 'idiot box,' whose only attraction was the Sunday film, or the Chitrahaar, is now a source of proper entertainment. The articles by Madhu Jain and Ritu Sarin made interesting and informative reading.

Religious Beliefs

Kuldip Nayar's assessment of the conditions faced by the Ahmedias in Pakistan and his plea for tolerance comes at an appropriate time when the mood in India is charged with emotion and anger. (Exclusive, Ahmedias Woes, 31 March-6 April). I fully endorse his views of broad-mindedness and a humane acceptance of each other by different religious groups. At the same time, however, I would like to clarify certain statements made by Mr Nayar which are misleading.

Mr Nayar asks: Why should a 'Kalima' which celebrates the oneness of God, become objectionable if it appears in the places of worship of the Ahmedias? It is so because the Kalima is the password of Islam and the gist of what the religion is. It endorses two truths of the religion with which each Muslim is familiar: that God is one and there is no other; and that Mohammad is his prophet and is the last of his messengers. This is precisely where the Ahmedias break away from the main body of Islamic belief.

The non-conformers have always suffered rejection at the hands of society. The Ahmedias have broken away to reform and make their own tenets which the rest of the Muslim world do not recognise. The Ahmedias while lamenting the treatment given to them, have at times deliberately cultivated this 'separateness.' They are a united and strong economic group and one cannot refute the fact that many intellectuals have emerged among them. An Islamic state like Pakistan with its autocratic President is bound to harass them and sporting the 'Kalima' on badges in protest would be purposeless, besides inciting feelings against them. This chasm between the two communities will not easily be bridged. With their strong economy and closely-knit community the Ahmedias ought to strive for an independent state. Meanwhile they should follow the saying: 'In Rome do as the Romans do.'
Nishat Hyder, Gulbaga

•It was disgusting to read Kuldip Nayar's article on the Ahmedias. It seems he does not know that the basics of Islamic faith is not only the 'Kalima' but also the Khatem-ul-ambia (the last Prophet). Does Mr Nayar know that according to the Ahmedias, one Mirza Bashir Ahmed of village Qadian in Punjab, was the last Prophet? I would like to inform Mr Nayar that Muslims and Christians believe in Jesus (Hazarat Isa). Yet there is a difference: a Muslim accepts him as one of the Prophets, whereas a Christian declares him as the son of God.

Shocking Deal

The investigative report by Shubhabrata Bhattacharya, A Classic Bungle (14—20 April), was an eye-opener. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi talks of eliminating corruption, but it seems that he is up against a wall. The dubious deal to purchase computers shocked me since the education ministry is involved in it.

The Multinational Monster

The cover story on the Bhopal gas tragedy was comprehensive and illuminating (The Cover-up, 7-13 April) It thoroughly analysed the wide spectrum of the tragedy, the long-term effects and clearly established the culpability of the American company, the Indian management and the government of Madhya Pradesh. The Indian government has filed a suit for damages against Union Carbide in America. But it should concentrate on rehabilitating the victims and providing medical aid to those suffering.
P. Govind, New Delhi

• The Bhopal tragedy can only be compared to the devastation at Hiroshima. The aftermath at Bhopal is more dangerous and catastrophic. After the tragedy, I hope the government will not grant permits to such killer-industries without checking up on safety measures It is even more shameful that many people died due to lack of proper medical aid. Thanks to SUNDAY for the eye-opener particularly the post-mortem report by Ritu Sarin
Prabhakar Patra, Koraput (Orissa)

• Unfortunately, the developing and under-developed countries of the Third World are the worst sufferers due to lack of adequate pollution-control devices and efficient maintenance systems in factories like those in the developed countries. Union Carbide cannot avoid its moral responsibility and should give full compensation, though no amount of compensation would be adequate for the loss of life and property in Bhopal.
M.H. Rama, Bhubaneshwar

A premature baby born in Bhopal

• Congratulations to SUNDAY for the superb cover story. However, we would like to make some clarifications on Ritu Sarin's article Scant Relief where she makes a statement about Kishore Bharati's involvement in the activities in Bhopal.

Although it is true that Dr Sadgopal is a senior member of the Kishore Bharati, he along with a few other members of the group decided to work in Bhopal in their individual capacity. As such they do not represent Kishore Bharati. To work effectively, these persons together with a number of local activists from Bhopal and other cities decided to launch a front, Zahreeli Gas Kand Morcha. The Morcha comprises engineers, lawyers, doctors, scientists and some members of the Kishore Bharati. The Morcha has been raising issues of immediate interest such as proper medical care, adequate compensation for the victims, removal of the Union Carbide factory, financial relief during the period of joblessness as well as other issues of far-reaching significance. The Morcha worked to inform the poor about their rights in the face of such a crisis and mobilise them in an organised manner through rallies, dharnas, gheraoes and other means of protest. The dharna mentioned in the article was just one of them. Such activities were not conducted by the members of the Sangharsh Morcha alone or by "activists of Kishore Bharati." In fact, most of the people staging dharnas were residents of bastis and victims of the gas leak, who were mobilised by members of Morcha. This does not mean that Kishore Bharati does not support the Morcha's activities.
Dr. Sushil Joshi, Hoshangabad (Madhya Pradesh), Co-ordinator, Kishore Bharati

• Union Carbide can in no way shrug off its responsibility for the Bhopal fall-out. But the question is: Can the Indian government do so either?. The government's ignorance about the faulty design of the plant is unpardonable. How can the MP government explain their negligence in checking the safety measures of the UCL plant regularly? Why in the first place was UCL allowed to set up a plant to produce a deadly gas like MIC in such a densely-populated place? These are questions to be answered by the Indian authorities and not by the UCL
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

• The Case Against Carbide gives the readers an impression that the safety factor was either overlooked or neglected by the parent company. The CBI report also indicated that the safety factor was ignored. There was also a lacuna in the working of the state government which granted a licence without adequate checks regarding the safety measures. Possibly, the name and fame of Union Carbide gave the state officials the stamp of trust. The trust has been shaken.

Indo-Bangladesh Relations

M.J. Akbar's snide remarks at Enayetullah Khan was not in good taste (Dateline, 31 March—6 April). Many in the Indian print media suffer from a wrong mental fixation about Enayetullah Khan and assume that he is a habitual India-baiter. But most Bangladeshis feel that Enayetullah Khan and his newspaper, Holiday, picked up enough courage to expose Indian perfidy over the sharing of war booty left behind by the vanquished Pakistani army as well as criticise the plunder indulged in by Indian merchants with the help of their indigenous collaborators when Bangladesh's economy was in ruins. Holiday had to pay for its conviction when the paper was closed down and its editor jailed.

On resumption, Holiday picked up cudgels over New Delhi's hesitancy to hand over to Bangladesh the Tin Bigha corridor despite a signed accord as well as India's refusal to give Bangladesh its due share of the Ganga waters. Holiday also criticised India's decision to erect a barbed wire fence along the Assam-Bangla border. Bangladesh seeks good neighbourly relations with India. If Indo-Bangladesh relations have not come up to expectations, the fault lies with India.

Identifying the 'Hidden Hand'

The author of A Period of Fear and Uncertainty (17—23 March) rightly felt aggrieved over the 'assistants of the Central Secretariat Service' being allowed to continue to live and work in Delhi. I have been informed that the assistants get themselves promoted as section officers in a short span of 15 to 16 years. These section officers then 'manage' to become under secretaries—a grade that would normally go to the IAS officers who are rotting in the states The greed of these assistants do not end there. They come up the ladder alarmingly fast to hold such prestigious posts like those of deputy secretaries, directors and joint secretaries.

Arup Pant, New Delhi

• The article highlights the doings of the "hidden hand" without identifying it. The last paragraph of the write-up gives the impression that the "hidden hand" belong to the officers of the Central Secretariat Service (CSS) which, if true, is a reflection on the whole set-up. All the posts of secretaries, additional secretaries and 95 per cent of the posts of joint secretaries are held by members of services other than the CSS. Then how can members of the CSS manipulate senior postings as alleged by the author?

I. Deb, New Delhi

• After having dwelt at length on the doings of the 'Orwellian eye' and the 'hidden hand' the author jumps to the astonishing conclusion that the 'hidden hand' belongs to the officers of the Central Secretariat Service who have 'continued to stay in Delhi throughout their career, formed an old boys' network in every ministry' making 'subtle moves to man all the secretariat posts upto the level of secretary.'

At the outset, it may be pointed out that initial recruitment to the Central Secretariat Service is made not only at the level of assistant but also at the level of section officer through the same examination by which IAS and other central services officers are recruited. Having joined the service through the same examination, the CSS officers spend many more years to reach the position of deputy secretaries and directors than those in the other central services. Thus, their continuous stay at Delhi is at the cost of their career and promotion. The IAS officers have systematically tried to surpress them by shrewd moves like denying promotion to them even when they are due. Unlike the IAS and other services who earn their right to promotion over time, CSS officers have to go through a rigorous selection for promotion at all levels. But, even after they have been thoroughly screened and selected by the competent selection committees, they are not assured of a placement. Their names are circulated among various ministries along with those of officers of other services. It is the sweet will of a secretary to pick or reject an officer of the CSS for a vacancy in his department.

As a result, many officers who are eligible for promotion having been selected by a committee of as many as four secretaries, may not find placement for as long as two years. The effect of this policy of denial of promotion opportunities to the CSS officers has been that their number in the higher echelon in the secretariat has been constantly going down whereas in 1972 they held 9.8 per cent of the appointments of joint secretaries and above, the figure came down to 1.9 per cent in 1983. Out of 99 secretaries, there are none belonging to the CSS: the last CSS officer to reach that level was A. J. Kidwai who retired a decade ago. Among the 121 additional secretaries, there is only one CSS officer and out of 392 joint secretaries, only five belong to the CSS.

As regards unknown persons being appointed to important posts, the mysterious Mr Bhora is none other than B.B. Vohra, who retired as petroleum secretary and there should be no surprise if he was appointed as chairman of the advisory board on energy. Again, it has been stated that H.K.L. Kapoor retired as chief secretary, Gujarat 'more than a decade ago' whereas he retired only in March 1983. In any case, both these officials were illustrious members of the IAS fraternity and it is only they who would be interested in finding positions for their erstwhile colleagues. Surely it could not have been the 'hidden hand.'

Before an IAS officer is deputed to the centre, his consent is obtained. No officer is sent on deputation unless he is interested. If the IAS officers feel that dislocation of their family life and children's education is so great, they are under no compulsion to come to the centre. However, there must be obvious advantages in coming to Delhi because there is always a queue of officers and most of them use all possible means to get a tenure at the centre.

The role of an IAS officer in a developing economy is more important in the states where large-scale development projects and schemes are underway to improve the lot of the common man. The Central Secretariat Service officers were expected to provide continity and assist in the formulation of higher policy for the administration of the nation. The IAS and central services were intended to bring in some field experience and knowledge of ground conditions to the process of policy formulation. Unfortunately, with the passage of time the role of the CSS is being relegated to unimportant functions of administration and house-keeping. The time has now come when the department of personnel and administrative reforms should sit up and examine the role and performance of not only the CSS but also the Cetral Administrative Pool which was once formed and later disbanded. I am sure the highly complex policy-making function requires officers with long experience and knowledge of precedents and rules.

Sitaram Kesri is Clean

The report regarding the production and disbursement of election material is totally unfounded and mischievous, to say the least (Sitaram Kesri to be Removed?, 24 February—2 March). The malicious report has sought to bring a slur to the fair name of some functionaries in the AICC(I).

Needless to say, the AICC(I) has been handling its publicity in a meticulous manner and with a very high degree of responsibility, keeping in time with the highest traditions of the party functioning.

The irresponsible allegation of being a beneficiary in monetary deals against no less a person than Sri Sitaram Kesri is baseless. Sri Kesri is a person of high integrity and has at least 50 years of dedicated service behind him.

Shrikant Varma, MP, General Secretary, All India Congress Committee(I), New Delhi

The Akalis Should Reciprocate

The special report, Punjab: The End Game (24—30 March), was illuminating but one cannot digest the idea that Sitaram Kesri was behind the appointment of Arjun Singh as Governor of Punjab. In fact, Rajiv Gandhi is an able and shrewd administrator as he has proved it in a short span of six months.
R Sahay, Calcutta

• The central government's determination to solve the Punjab problem has been amply demonstrated in the special report. The Punjab tangle needs a political solution and the government has taken bold initiatives hoping the Akalis will reciprocate. The appointment of Arjun Singh as Governor is a master-stroke of political shrewdness. However, the Akalis still continue their confrontanist attitude and with the release of the Akali leaders exremist activities appear to have gained fillip.
P. Govind, New Delhi

• Concrete steps have been taken to rescue the Punjab problem by way of releasing Sant Longowal and seven other Akali leaders and ordering an inquiry into the November riots by Rajiv Gandhi. He has invited the Akalis to the negotiating table which is a step in the right direction. It is time Sant Longowal buried the hatchet and proved that he is a moderate in the real sense of the term. Religious sentiments should never be given little importance when the unity of our nation is at stake.
S. Jayaraj, Coimbatore

• After the various steps the Prime Minister has taken to solve the Punjab tangle since he assumed office in January 1985, one cannot blame the government if the Akalis do not respond to his overtures. First, he set up the cabinet sub-committee consisting of senior cabinet ministers, who were responsible for hearing out the Akalis in particular and the Sikhs in general. Next, he released Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and other Sikh leaders. This was an entirely political decision. It was aimed at renewing talks with the Akalis To start negotiations afresh, he also appointed Arjun Singh as the Governor of Punjab. But it seems that the Akalis are either terrified of terrorists, or are themselves terrorists They should have condemned the deahts of Hindus in Punjab.
Rajesh Sahay, Hazaribagh

An Author's Plight

This has reference to Narendra Kumar's letter Publisher's Plight (Opinion, 7-13 April) I do not know whether I fall in the category whom the author calls "people with ignorance or prejudice maligning publishers and hence far more sinned against than sinning!"

I am working in an acedemic institution and since the career of a person in all acedemic institutions is based on the principle "publish or perish" I had the misfortune of facing the "magnanimous behaviour" of one of the publishers. In 1976, I wrote a book, Perspectives on Indian Banking, which was published by Popular Prakashan. Though the first edition of this book is out of print, the publishers (R.G. Bhatkal is the proprietor) did not have the courtesy, inspite of my repeated requests, to give me the royalty or the author's complimentary copies of the book even after ten years.

Now, will Narendra Kumar, a representative of the publishers, pass a judgement on me as to whether I am ignorant or prejudiced and maligning the publishers?
Gopal L. Karkal, Bombay

Lively Calcutta

I did not understand what Sunil Dutta wanted to convey through his photofeature, Calcutta, Calcutta (14—20 April). I have noticed over the years that lensmen in Calcutta are over-anxious to depict only the uglier side of their city. I would have appreciated an assortment of the good and the bad side of Calcutta.
S.K. Basu, Calcutta

• The PM had labelled Calcutta as 'a dying city.' And now SUNDAY publishes a photoessay of only the murkier side of the city. It was throughly unfair as the magazine liked all its citizens derives its life and breath from Calcutta.
Mrinal Kundu, Belur (WB)

• Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's remark that Calcutta was dying was not an exaggeration as the photographs reproduced in SUNDAY will bear out. The reaction of the ruling Left Front government was that of one with a guilty conscience. Ever since the present government came to power seven years ago, the city is dying a slow death due to lack of planning and development.
M.S. Singhal, Calcutta

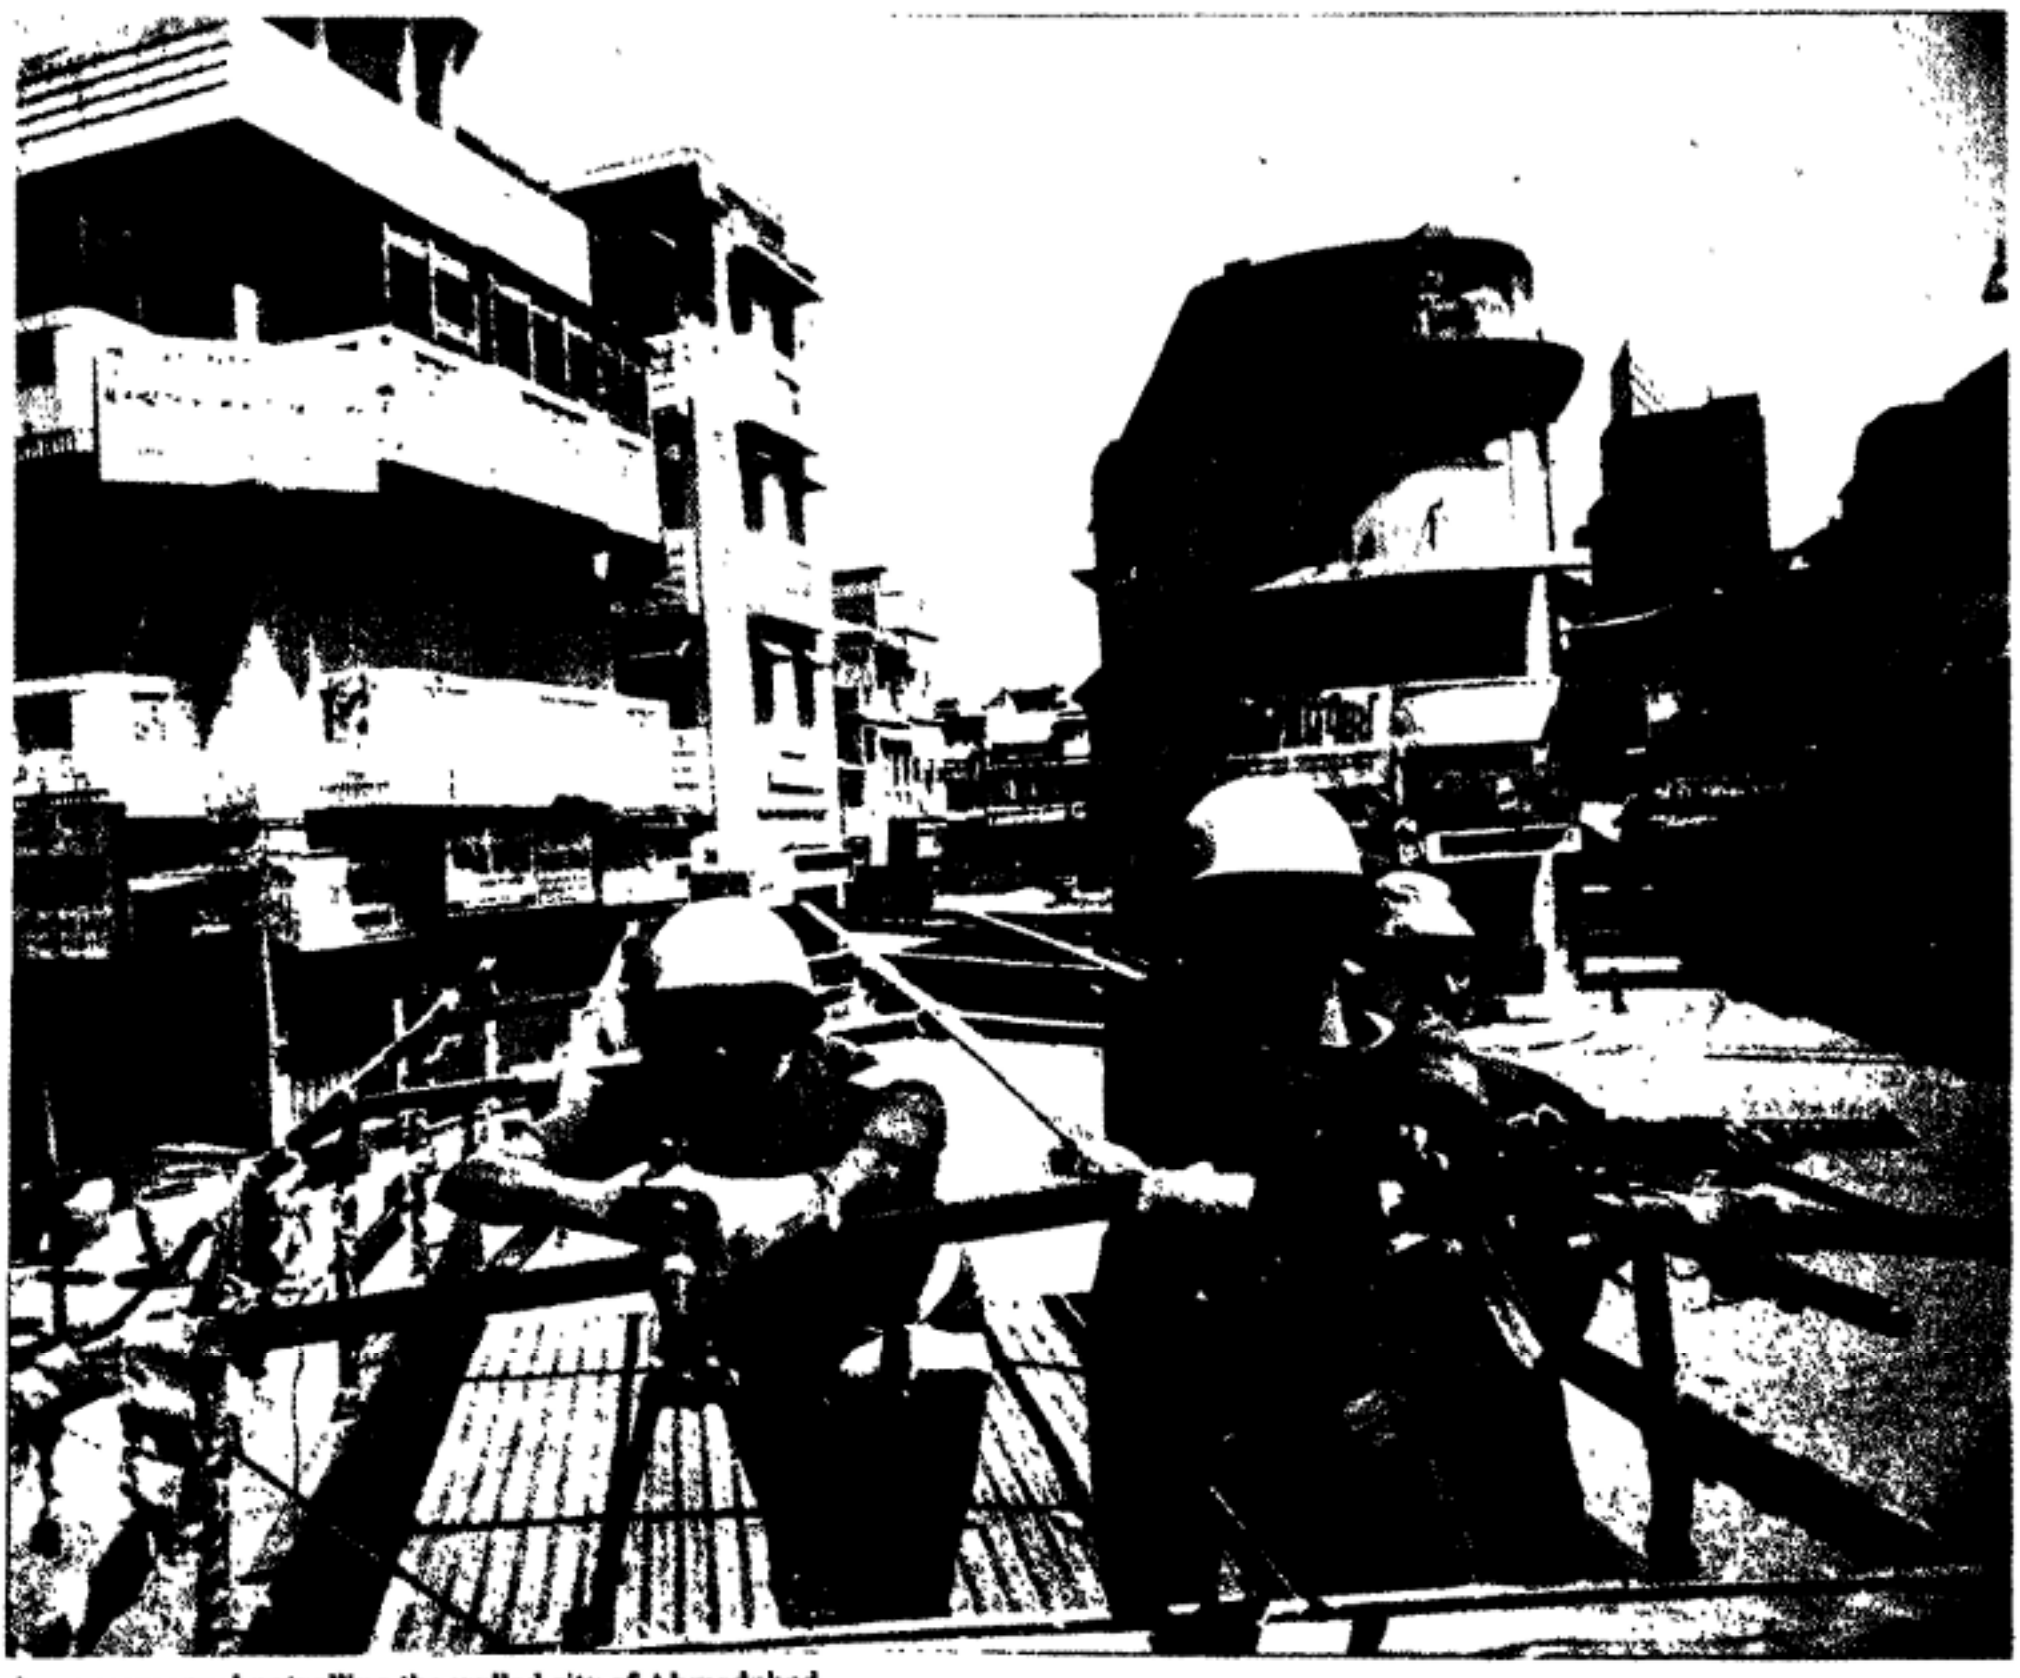
Privileged Minority

I read Khushwant Singh's articles with interest for he always has something new to say But of late I find that he is suffering from a Minority Complex (Gossip Sweet and Sour, 17—23 March). I differ with his view that everywhere in the world the minority community is harassed. I do not know much about what is happening in the rest of the world, but as far as my country is concerned, the minority communities enjoy special privileges. If we keep on harping on majority and minority interests, the concept of national integration will remain a pipe dream.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• Electoral Refoms (Gossip Sweet and Sour, 24—30 March) made a very pertinent suggestion. Most of the voters are illiterate and therefore not capable of differentiating between political ideologies. A couple of rupees is sufficient to buy votes Isn't this a mockery of democracy?
S. Naidu, Sindri

World Champions

Zaheer Abbas paid a fitting tribute to the Indian cricket team for winning the Rothmans Cup at Sharjah ('India has Qualified as the Undisputed Champions of One-day Cricket,' 17—23 March). However, the report was conspicuous by the absence of any good pictures.
Pankaj Basu, Jalpaiguri



• Congratulations to the Indian team for winning the Benson and Hedges and the Rothmans tournament. While Sunil Gavaskar, Kapil Dev and Ravi Shastri were behind the victories, the rest cannot be underestimated. If the Indians keep up the team spirit they had displayed in Australia and Sharjah, I am sure that many more honours will come to them.
G.V. Phaniraj Kishore, Hyderabad

• Zaheer Abbas's word of caution that India is not necessarily the best team in the world stems from his jealousy at our success. Winning two major tournaments is certainly not a fluke or a "patch of good fortune." The sincerity and dedication of the Indian players earned them the victories. Srinjoy Chowdhury's tribute to Jimmy Amarnath was also befitting (Amarnath: Mr Consistent). If I were given the choice, I would have chosen Amarnath to lead India after Gavaskar instead of Kapil Dev.

COVER STORY

POLICE Vs PEOPLE

What began as an anti-reservation agitation in the first week of March and led to communal riots by the middle of April, has taken a new twist today. It is now a battle between the police and the people, with the former setting new records in brutality. Following the death of a constable during rioting in Ahmedabad, Gujarat's policemen took the law into their own hands and, brooking no interference, went on a rampage, mercilessly beating up helpless people and pregnant women, looting and destroying shops and burning down media establishments. It was ultimately the army—once again—which had to be called in to restore a semblance of normalcy. All the while chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki and his government, which has lost its ability to rule, refused to admit the truth or discipline the policemen. Instead the chief minister has defended the lawmen and blamed the media for provoking them. SUNDAY correspondents report from Ahmedabad.

Army personnel patrolling the walled city of Ahmedabad

Photographs: Sondeep Shankar

The 25th of April was the tenth day of continuing violence in Ahmedabad. For most of that time the city lived indoors under curfew. Sporadic incidents claimed more than three dozen lives, hundreds of others were injured and thousands left homeless. The police had revolted, beaten, burnt and killed. Its control room at the Shahibag police headquarters had collapsed, the army had been called in and the entire government had been forced to shift to the Circuit House annexe where the army set up its own control room. But there was no breakdown of law and order in Ahmedabad, because police commissioner B.K. Jha said so. He has his own scales somewhere and all these things put together did not quite measure up to be called a breakdown of the law and order situation. "When did law and order break down in Ahmedabad? Where?" he shot back when asked why things had gone out of hand. Deaths have occurred, he agreed, the police did indulge in rioting, curfew was in force, the army was out on the streets but did law and order break down? No, when? The police commissioner's face breaks into a smile. "The situation in my city is improving, nothing wrong." On the floor above in the Circuit House annexe sits chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki, surrounded by his cabinet colleagues, smiling, posing for photographers. He is just back after being chased out by angry refugees at the Bapunagar relief camp shouting slogans of "Solanki wapas jaao (Solanki, go back)." He had gone there to offer solace but had to return hurriedly. Had the security not been so tight the irate refugees would have roughed him up. When asked how his visit to the refugee camp went Solanki said: "Bahut achha raha (it went very well)." That in itself was a comment on the government's attitude to the Ahmedabad situation. Nothing out of the ordinary has happened in the town. Whatever has is because of the "rumour-monger press" which blew things out of proportion. Did the police do anything wrong? If it did it was only because the force was "excited and deeply disturbed" about the adverse coverage it got in the press. "Let the police do its work, cooperate with it" was the appeal being sent out by the government. "After all," said police commissioner Jha, "policemen are only public servants. Their interest is the interest of the people." These public servants, the custodians of law and order had for days plundered and pillaged Ahmedabad, unleashed terror on the people to "restore peace."

The police in Ahmedabad has itself become a force of anti-social elements. It was a force whose belligerence needed restraining by the army. "Army hatva lenge (we will have the army removed)," is the latest warning being used on the people by the police and it works. That would leave the police alone to do its "public service." How long, ask policemen openly, will the army remain here. You have to face us one day. Ahmedabad lives constantly under that threat.

The Gujarat government is not wrong when it says the police force is angry and agitated over happenings in the last few weeks. Nevertheless, the reasons given for the rise in the tempers of the police are subject to question. Solanki says the press is carrying out a campaign against him for no good reason: an akhbari aandolan characterised by falsehood and exaggeration. The result, according to him was simple: the police could bear the "attacks" no longer and naturally reacted. His police, the Gujarat chief minister maintains, is not to blame; it only responded naturally. But was it "falsehood and exaggeration" that so piqued the Ahmedabad police or was it something else? In a couple of cases reports in the local press did appear exaggerated. One such concerned the alleged entry of the police into a temple in Saraspur while chasing a group of anti-reservationist demonstrators on 10 April. The local vernacular press said that the police had broken open the gates of the temple and violated the sanctity of the holy place which was not exactly the case. The police had gone to the temple, it had broken open one gate but never entered it as reports suggested. That, however, would be all as far as exaggeration goes. There are a series of other incidents for which the police had nobody but itself to blame for the "adverse publicity" it got in the press. It could not even use the Saraspur incident as an excuse for its violent behaviour. It began its terror tactics much earlier.

On 7 April the Akhil Gujarat Vali Mahamandal, the organisation of parents leading the anti-reservation agitation with the Navrachna Samiti of Students, had called its meeting at the Sanghvi High School in the Navrangpura locality of Ahmedabad. Before the delegates could assemble there, the police cordoned off the school, forcing the Vali Mahamandal to shift the venue to the H.K. Arts and Commerce College on Ashram Road. Here too, it was the police that reached first and locked the premises.

All this, without any provocation from the Vali Mahamandal leaders—the government just seemed determined not to let the meeting be held. Harried, the Vali Mandal leaders then reached the Indian Medical Association (IMA) hall but were allowed in only on three conditions: voices should not be raised, police should be allowed in, nobody would clap. The Vali Mahamandal leaders agreed but even as they were discussing their programme of action, a violent pro-reservationist crowd stormed in, disrupted the meeting and beat up Vali Mahamandal members. How such a violent mob managed to get into the IMA hall despite the heavy police bandobust still remains a mystery.

Even before this, in the first days of April, an incident had taken place in Asarwa, a labour colony near Ahmedabad's civil hospital. The police had picked up some boys of the Municipal School and beaten them up about which residents of Asarwa complained to the police commissioner, B.K. Jha, on 5 April. In their complaint they named deputy commissioner of police, Rajan Priyadarshi, superintendent of police, J.S. Jadeja and inspector Chawad. Just as the petitioners were returning from the office of the police commissioner, the police chased them and let loose their lathis. Among those most seriously injured were women who were pulled out from their houses in Asarwa and caned in broad daylight. On being presented with a petition, the Gujarat High Court banned the entry of these policemen in the Asarwa area which, say apologists of the Solanki government, created a lot of "resentment" in the police.

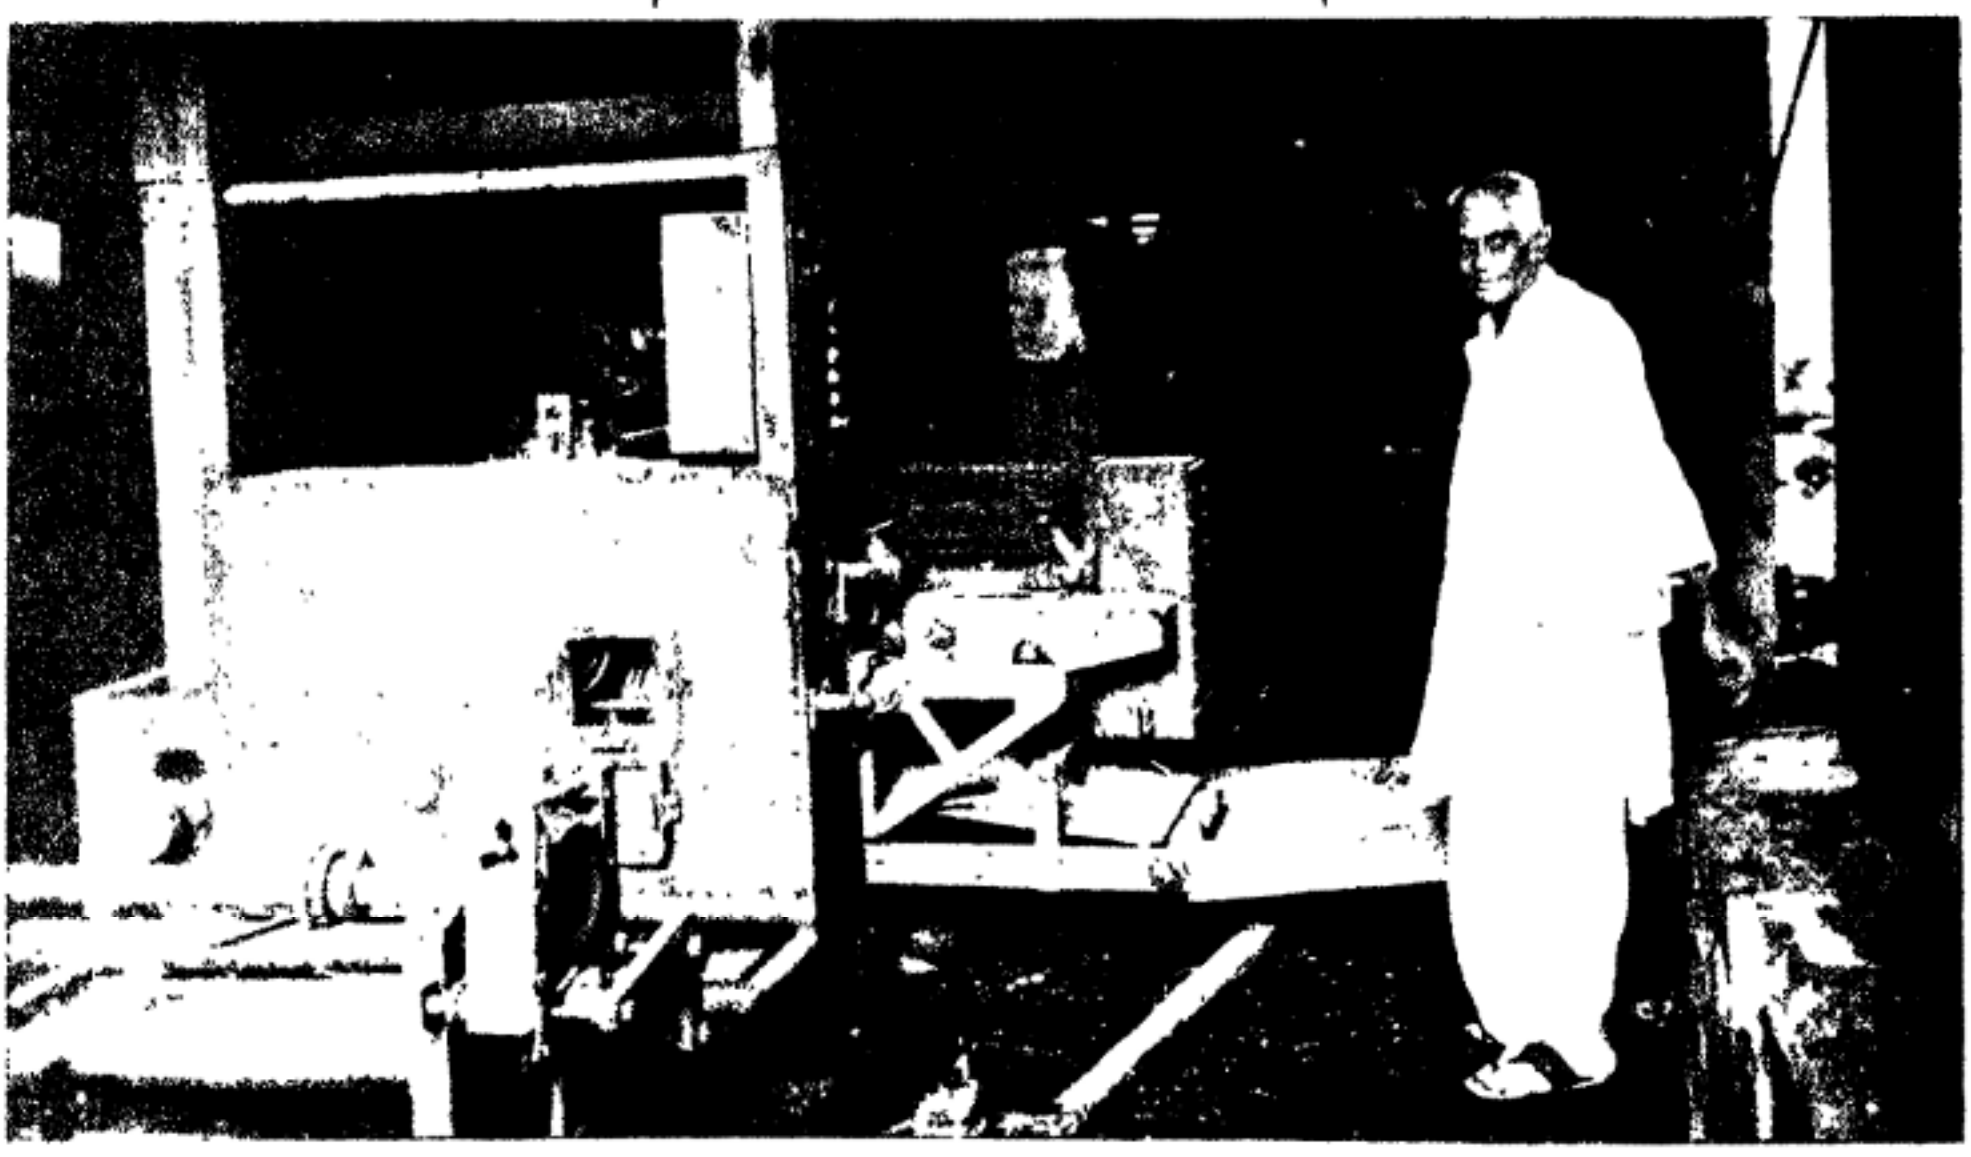
The Asarwa incident was the first real exposure of the police tactics and from then onwards things began moving in a vicious cycle. A "deeply hurt" police force took it out on the city and reports in the press only compounded the "injury to their sentiments," by the middle of April the cause and effect chain had sparked off incidents all over Ahmedabad. Specially affected were localities in the walled city: Astodia, Raipur, Raikhad, Manek Chowk and Khadia. And then came the biggest blow for the police. On 20 April, the High Court, on a petition submitted by BJP MLA Ashok Bhatt and others, banned the entry of certain police officials into these areas and ordered an enquiry into alleged police excesses. The enquiry was to be conducted by R.P. Rathod, secretary in the revenue department of the Gujarat government and J.N. Bhatt, registrar of the Gujarat High Court and submitted by 25 April. The police was incensed. The final spark came on the morning of 22 April while the two-member team was conducting the enquiry in the Raipur area. Head constable Laxman Desai was knived and killed by someone in the crowd.

By 12.30 pm, when Laxman Desai succumbed to his injuries in the Vadilal Sarabhai hospital, the Ahmedabad police was on the rampage. A procession of policemen coming out of the hospital set fire to a row of shops, pelted stones at anything and everything, looted commercial complexes, stopped vehicles and set them ablaze. At the Shahibag police headquarters, the control room collapsed and policemen threw down their arms, ran out and joined others in loot and arson. Among their first targets was the Gujarat Samachar building which they destroyed. They then moved to the Jansatta Bhawan, the office of the Indian Express and Jansatta and tried to set fire to it. The building, however, was left virtually untouched as the army reached it in time. Both newspapers had one thing in common: they had reported in detail the excesses committed by the police in Ahmedabad city.

Khadia is in the heart of the walled city of Ahmedabad, a densely populated, labyrinthine locality built in pre-colonial days. Khadia's psyche has always been anti-Establishment. During the revolt of 1857, Tantia Tope had directed operations from here for a while. A century later, during the Quit India movement of 1942, Khadia had become such a pain for the British that the imperial government had ordered it to be "razed down." Even they did not succeed. R.K. Vashishtha, commandant of the second brigade of the State Reserve Police (SRP) wanted to. He had old scores to settle with the people of Khadia.

On 15 April there had been clashes in Khadia which the police said were communal. But that does not seem to have been the case. What had happened was that around 7.00 pm a police party had gone to raid the den of Balam Dada, a bootlegger in Khatkiwad, a Muslim locality near Khadia. But they were chased away. An hour later, the raid party (some locals maintain it was not a raid but an attempt to squeeze out hafta (illegal cess, from the bootlegger) went again to Khatkiwad. This time they were chased away, too. When residents of Khadia saw the police and the residents of Khatkiwad running towards them, they thought it was an attack. They clashed. The police fired 47 rounds, and five were killed. Khadia, volatile as it is, remained disturbed.

But peace returned on 17 April when residents and the police, under command of DCP Mohapatra, "pledged truce" and exchanged sweets. Then suddenly things went haywire. Even as Mohapatra was reassuring the people, R.K. Vashishtha arrived along with his SRP brigade, determined to teach the residents of Khadia a lesson. He had suddenly been deputed to replace Mohapatra. Vashishtha, after all, was the man who had the right credentials: a "professional" when it comes to handling riots. He has in fact, been used by the Solanki government to quell them on several occasions since 1980. It was he who had "handled" the anti-price rise agitation in Khadia in 1980. His brigade immediately laid siege and the SRP men launched the attack with cries of "Phoonk do Khadiane (burn down Khadia)." The solid, ancient gates of Khadia were rammed open by SRP vehicles and the cops went from house to house, looting, manhandling and ransacking. From the Chowk watched R.K. Vashishtha, sitting in an easy chair, a carbine on his lap: the proud executor of "Operation Khadia," once a plan of the imperial British government itself. Journalists wanting to see him while the operation was going on were told by SRP men: "Saheb ni mijaj bahut garam chhe, tane khatma hone chhe (Saheb is in a very bad mood, do you want to die)?"



Gujarat's Lawless Lawmen

"They have killed my baby. I had reared journalism in Gujarat for 45 years, they killed it in one shot," said Shantilal Shah, editor of Gujarat Samachar, the largest selling daily in the state. He kept on repeating the words as he moved about amidst the ruins of the three-storeyed Lok Prakashan Bhawan. Two days after a mob of irate policemen had set it ablaze, parts of the building were still smouldering. The press, black with soot, was still stuffy with smoke, and the editorial section which had been ransacked, still throbbed with the heat that had ravaged dozens of photocomposing terminals and the entire dark room equipment. The basement right below was a stack of ash: roll upon roll of burnt newsprint. And beside it, in a shed that looks no more like one now, the lino-type units reduced to a heap of scrap. The place is all ash, soot and twisted metal. It took only 15 minutes to wreck the work of 45 years.

Gujarat Samachar was one of the first targets of organised police violence when they struck work and went berserk on 22 April. A little after 1.00 pm that day, policemen arrived at the Gujarat Samachar building in Khanpur in a van and two jeeps and started beating up the security guards and watchmen. They then rammed their vehicles into the locked gate. Once inside, the orgy began. Eight vehicles, a dozen scooters and motorcycles belonging to the staff were burnt down. Other policemen rushed in with stones and Molotov cocktails and set the press on fire. When Shantilal Shah tried to protest from his office window on the first floor, a stone was thrown at him. Fortunately, it hit the glass pane. The 70-year-old editor escaped with minor scratches but some of his staffers in the press were badly roughed up by the mob. The first wave left after doing initial damage. Then came the second attack, this time a much stronger one, which drove right into the lino-type press at the far end of the compound, and set fire to it with petrol and engine oil. Outside the gates, another group kept fire engines, which Shantilal Shah had summoned, from coming in. The firemen were held by the police at gunpoint while their brethren were busy finishing off whatever remained of the press. The fire engines did finally come in but only after the army arrived and the damage had been done. The loss, according to initial estimates, runs into Rs seven crores.

All efforts to call help failed. Said Smritibehn, managing director of Lok Prakashan and daughter-in-law of Shantilal Shah: "There was not one place that we did not try. Right from the office of the home minister and the chief secretary to the office of the police commissioner but nobody seemed to be anywhere. It was as if everything had collapsed." She along with her two teenaged sons and a sick aunt were trapped on the top floor of the building where the Shahs live. "The entire place was choking with gas and we didn't know what to do. We could not go down the stairs since it was all on fire... Ultimately, we had to go down the fire brigade ladder... My God, they would have killed us that day," said Smritibehn, still dazed by the experience.

Shantilal Shah and others in the editorial and managerial sections too had to jump down 15 feet into the backyard because the police-mob had blocked the front entrance. "It was a very well-planned operation," said Shantilal Shah, "timed so well that even the rescue teams came in when they had seen to it that everything had been destroyed." He maintains that the attack was planned and executed by the Solanki government. "This is only an indication of how brutal and vindictive Solanki can be. For the last two years we have been fighting against the corruption and inefficiency of this government and this is what they have given us. They wanted smugglers to run the government, we opposed it and look how Solanki has replied." Shah has no doubts that chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki, once himself a Gujarat Samachar staffer, personally gave the go-ahead for the destruction of his newspaper.

Gujarat Samachar has long been a critic of the Madhavasinh Solanki government, taking it to task at every opportunity. Relations between two deteriorated further when the paper exposed in detail the financial scandal of Jaikrishna Mrugesh, a businessman believed to be very close to the Gujarat chief minister. All through the anti-reservation agitation too, the Gujarat Samachar had been followingwhat it called an "independent attitude" and reported extensively on police atrocities being carried out in various parts of the state. Early in April, Shantilal Shah, his sons, Shreyans Shah and Bahubali Shah, and his daughter-in-law had received several threats to their lives if they "did not stop the false anti-government propaganda." The Shahs had repeatedly requested for security arrangements in view of the threats but they never came. "Why would they give us security when they themselves were hatching plans to burn us alive?" asked Shantilal Shah.

The police assault on Gujarat Samachar was not an accident, not just one of those things that came in the way of "a temporarily agitated police force" as the government is making it out to be. It was a determined attempt carried out to the end with success. The police drove straight to the building in vehicles that carried petrol-bombs, iron-rods, stones and anti-social elements. Their mission accomplished, they drove away. But worse came later. The attack went unnoticed by anyone in the government. Madhavsinh Solanki in fact, sought to defend the act saying that the police had been "deeply hurt" by the adverse publicity it got in the press. That has hurt more than all the flames that gutted the Lok Prakashan Bhawan.

Sankarshan Thakur, Ahmedabad

The same day, on 17 April, another operation was conducted in Gomtipur, on the outskirts of Ahmedabad. This was supervised by additional commissioner of police A.K. Bhargava. According to him, there was a threat of caste war in the area because the harijan basti was under attack. So the police entered Gomtipur at six in the evening. This operation was planned to perfection: Bhargava is a former intelligence officer who was incharge of interrogating insurgents in Manipur before he came to Ahmedabad. Water, telephone and electricity connections were cut off before the police entered, according to a resident of the area. Then they set about spreading terror. They rained lathis on men, manhandled women, pulled down houses: in short, created havoc. Some policemen indeed were seen roaming about with their pants down challenging women of the area in a most lewd manner. Enquiries later revealed that there was no real threat to the harijan basti from the residents of Gomtipur since there is no way to reach the basti from Gomtipur other than one which goes through a police chowki. And the police chowki had not reported any disturbance.

When reports were published the next day on the Gomtipur atrocity, an incensed A.K. Bhargava summoned a reporter from the Indian Express and threatened him. "Do you know what will happen to you journalists if the police goes on strike? Do you realise the consequences of the reports you have been giving?" he asked. This threat of a police strike came five days before the policemen actually struck work on 22 April. Later, Bhargava himself is said to have directed the police attack on selected newsmen.

Allegations that the police strike and terror tactics were planned came from another quarter. Shankarbhai Patel, president of the Akhil Gujarat Vali Mahamandal, said that they had received a similar threat "directly from the government" on 20 April. According to him a meeting of top ministers including home minister Amarsinh Chaudhary, and the pro-reservationist leaders took place in Gandhinagar in which a "plan of action" was decided. Said Shankarbhai Patel: "They conveyed to us secretly on 20 April that if we did not take back our agitation they would burn Gujarat Samachar and Jansatta, ask the police to go on strike, prepare a hit-list of anti government people in the press and provoke caste wars all over the state. By 22 April all this really started happening and we were all shocked." The anti-reservation agitation has truly been pushed into the background by what has been happening in Gujarat since 22 April. The fight is now on several fronts: between reservationists and anti-reservationists, between high caste Hindus and backwards, between Hindus and Muslims, between the people and the police, between the police and the press. But in all cases, the police has been a special tool whether it be a caste war or a communal clash.

Amir Hassan Sayyid is an old man. He has seen several agitations, several communal riots in his time. He survived the bloody communal carnage of 1969 in Ahmedabad. "I have seen the police behave since 1969...I have no faith in them, I have no faith in politicians...you must remain here..." Amir Hassan Sayyid was pleading to Brigadier S.C Katoch, in charge of rehabilitating the Muslims of Indira Garib Nagar and Bapunagar, left homeless after the bloody night of 22 April. Around him, in the Bapunagar Amand Chowk relief camp were 7,000 frightened, dazed faces. Conservative estimates said 25 of them had been killed in one night but the biggest casualty among them was confidence. "The army must remain here...we cannot go back to our homes without you," they pray again and again. At the back of their minds hangs the policeman's warning: "How long will the army be with you, you have to face us some day.."

There are 1,500 huts in Indira Garib Nagar, inhabited mainly by Muslims. On the night of 22 April, it became a battleground and by the next morning, a ghost town. Today it is a huge arc of burnt huts. Pathan Muin Khan (38), a paan-shop owner, was an eyewitness to the events: "They came around eight in the evening...the police, in two mobile vans and two jeeps...I could recognise sub-inspector B.D. Rana, sub-inspector Yadav and sub-inspector Patel and they had several local goondas along with them. rumours had already been spread about an attack from our side and in the day the police had taken away many of my friends. They stopped the vehicles and signalled to a crowd that had already collected in the neighbouring HUDCO scheme colony and Anand flats...they came down, first with bricks. Then when we retaliated, the police started firing on us...our homes were ransacked...our women mistreated...our property burnt...what could we do when the police itself was firing from their side?.I don't know why they did it."

In Bapunagar again, the planning was perfect. Army patrols in the area

"The Situation Has Slipped Out of Hand"

Indubhai Patel, president of the Gujarat Pradesh Janata Party, spoke to Sankarshan Thakur

Indubhai Patel, beaten up by a pro-reservationist mob on 23 April, lay in private ward number 8 of Ahmedabad's Vadilal Sarabhai hospital with skull injuries. His eyes were bloated red with blood. He could hardly see or talk but he was alert enough to evade all queries on the stand of his party and the opposition on the reservation issue. Excerpts from the interview with SUNDAY.

Q: Why were you attacked by a pro-reservationist mob ?

A: I do not know who they were. It happened so suddenly I could not even find out. The day Gujarat Samachar was burnt down I spent the whole day in their office trying to arrange help. I even rang up Madhu Dandavate in Bombay and told him that the situation was very dangerous and that law and order had completely broken down. Even the fire brigade was prevented from coming to Gujarat Samachar for quite sometime... (we were all very desperate Finally, we had to send messages to the military to rescue us. The next morning at around 7.00 am I left home and was driving down to the party office when at Majurnagar we saw about three thousand people indulging in looting and arson. We slowed down our vehicle and immediately stones were thrown at us. I was hit by a big one on the head. After that I have been in this place (the hospital)... the situation has slipped completely out of hand.

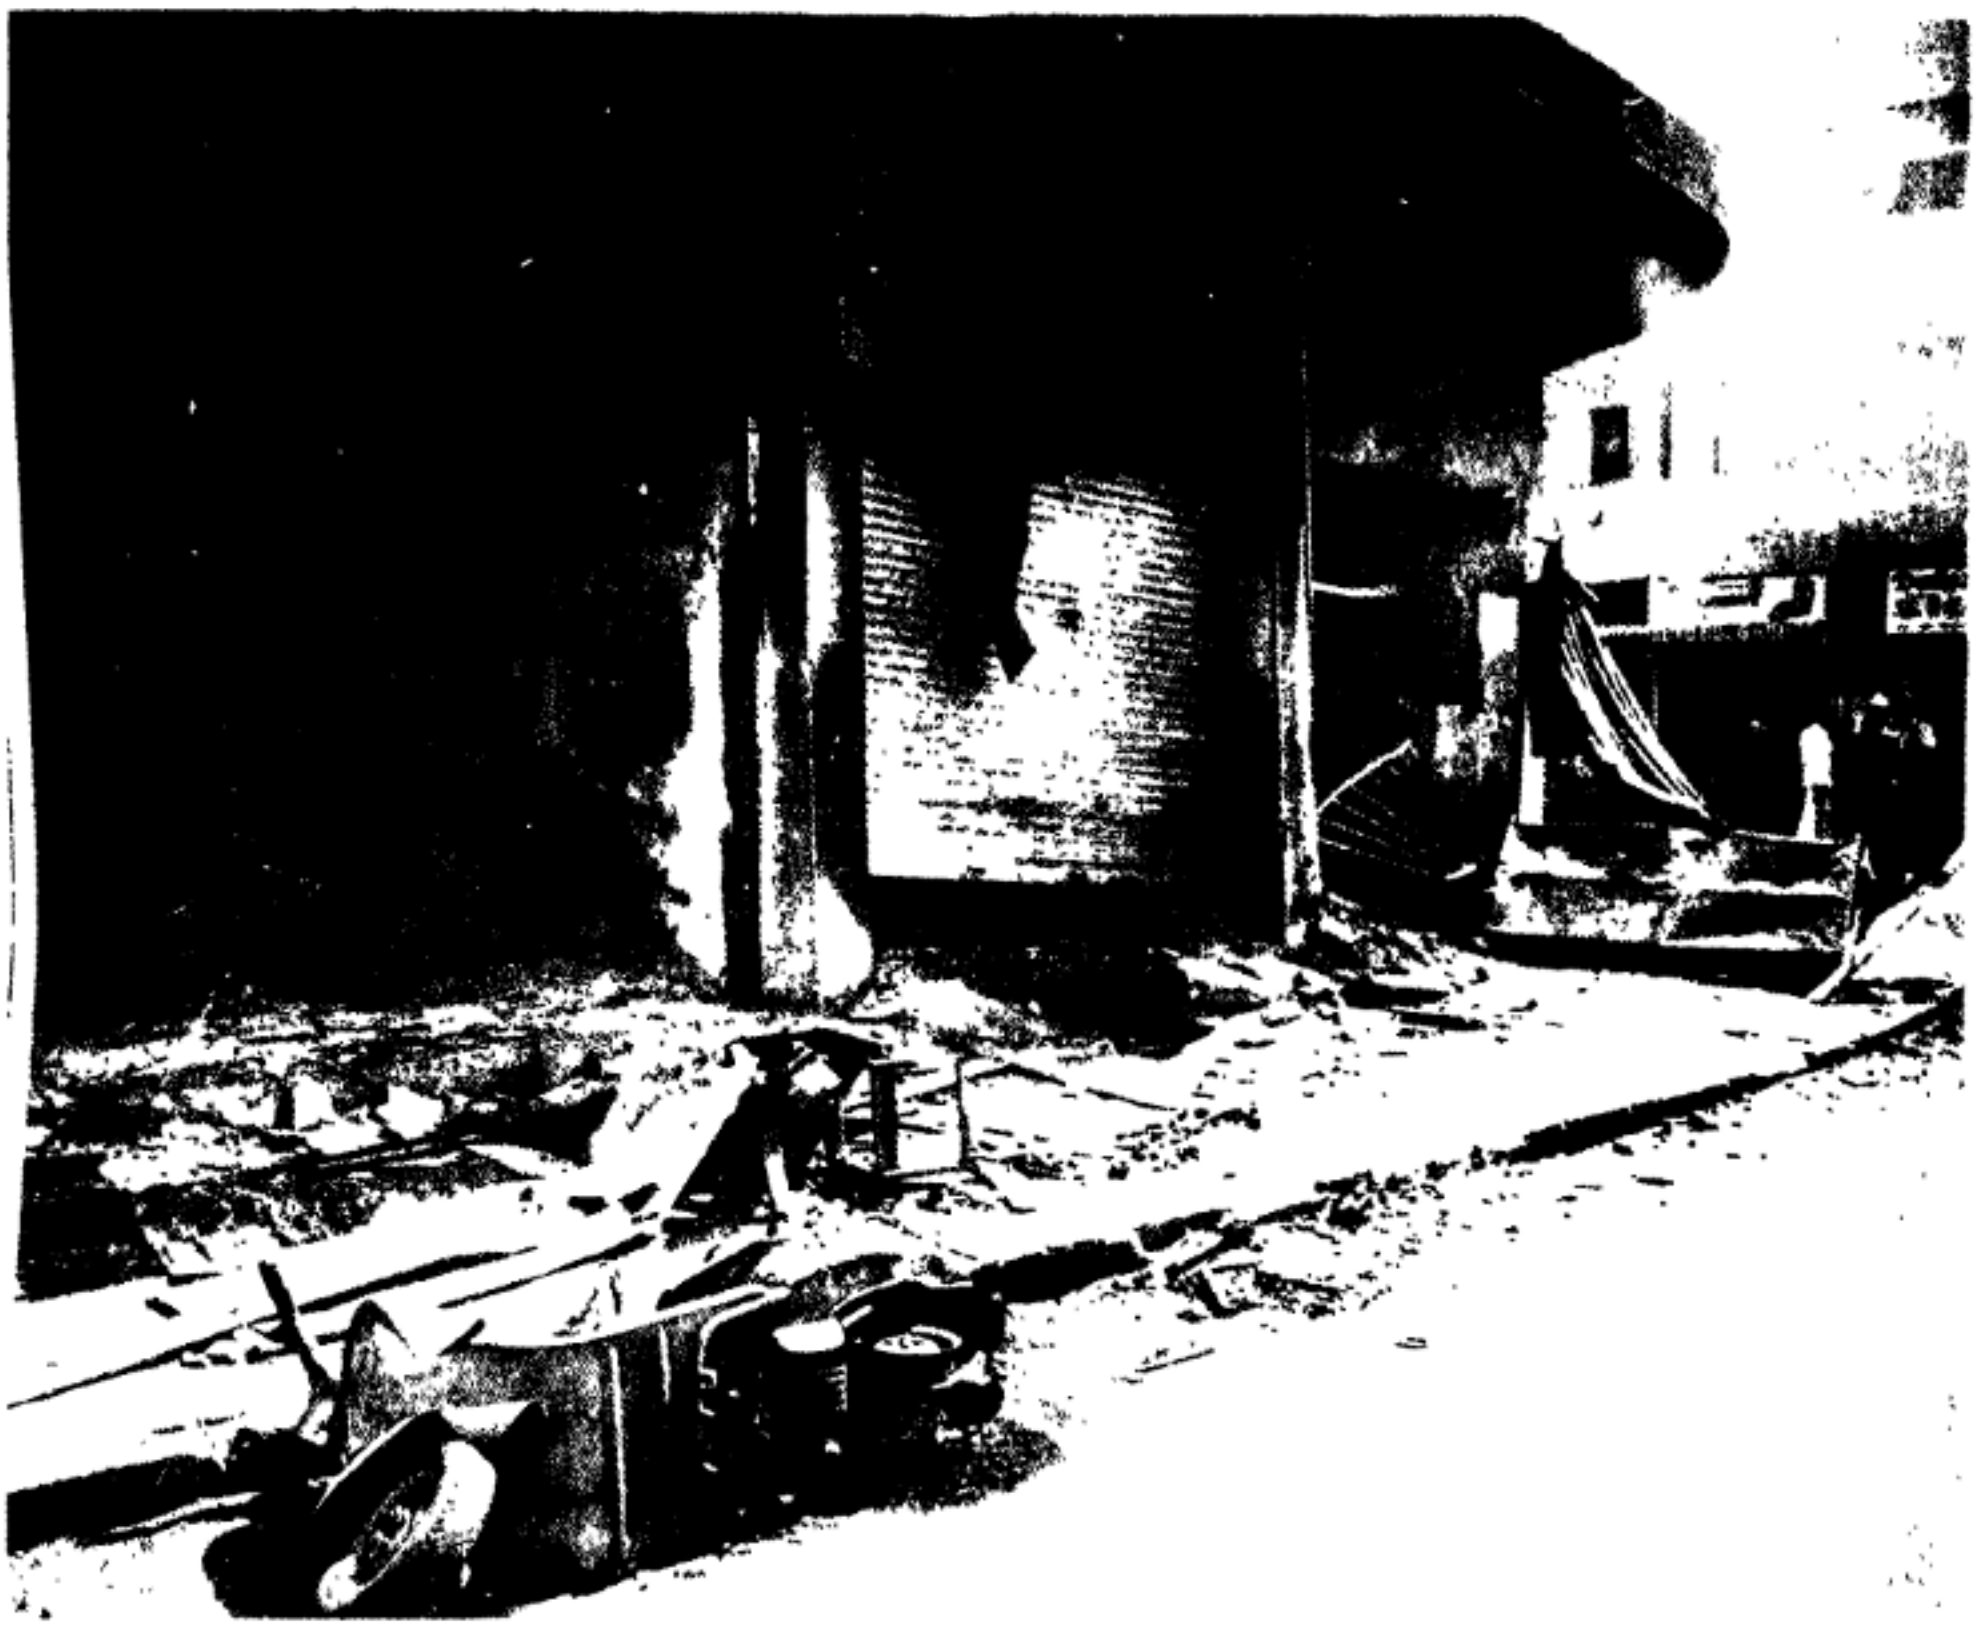
Q: Why?

A: Because of the government. Because of the cold attitude of Madavsinh Solanki and his men. Because they thought they could control the people by resorting to oppressive measures. All the violence in the state over the last few weeks has been planned and organised by the government of Solanki The police have been rioting. Who will control the situation? I met Madhavsinh Solanki and told him that he should try to solve the matter in a peaceful manner but he would not listen to me. I told him then that his policy of attack will not pay and the results are before him today.

Q. What is the stand of your party on the reservation issue?

A: We have always wanted an amicable settlement of the problem. The government should try and negotiate with the agitation leaders. It cannot afford confrontation. But instead of that, I am sorry to say, the government has lost all confidence of the people by acting in the way it has, by organising and encouraging violence.

Q: What makes you think the government is organising violence?



A: Who else is? This is my firm belief Every time the agitation leaders hold a major peaceful programme, violence is mysteriously triggered off somewhere. The pattern is very similar. The government is using violence as a tool to suppress the agitation. It even gave a free hand to the police to go on the rampage and cause so much damage.

Q: What is going to be the role of your party in the days to come? Your stand on the reservation issue has been rather unclear...

A: As I said, we are trying for a peaceful solution to the problem. We have to create an atmosphere in which talks can take place between the government and the agitation leaders. We are for creating normalcy in the state and helping the people. But the government has adopted an impossible attitude. No state can allow this kind of thing to happen. We have to smoothen out the situation as the government continues to play with fire....I really cannot tell what is going to happen.

Injured BJP leader Indubhai Patel

were misdirected by the police (this was confirmed by army jawans) and sent to another area so that the operation could go smoothly. M.L. Ansari, one of the residents who ran to a neighbouring locality and tried to contact the police could not get through. "Nobody seemed to be there in the police headquarters," he said. The apprehension of the people is that as soon as the army goes away, there will be fresh trouble from the police.

Not that there are no problems today. There is an undercurrent of tension between the police and the army—perhaps because their missions are so different—there is duplicity, the orders are unclear, the areas undefined. "What can we do?" asked an officer from the Madras 18th brigade. "There is so much confusion. Two control rooms, two sets of forces and the police is bent on doing a different thing altogether...these guys just run amok." The army in Ahmedabad is openly critical of the police.

The reasons behind what the army officer called "the odd behaviour of the police" are not far to seek. There are interesting aspects of the police set-up in Ahmedabad. Chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki apparently thinks he has a very good team of policemen working for him because he has not changed a single senior police officer in the city for quite sometime now. The same people have been in the same posts since before the Lok Sabha elections in December 1984 The only change that has taken place was at the top Police commissioner Y.B. Jhala, already on a two-month extension made way for B.K. Jha when the former retired on 31 March 1985. There is quite obviously a level of cooperation that the government of Madhavsinh Solanki and the police have reached from working so long together. And, to make things run more smoothly during the recent disturbances, Prabodh Rawal—Solanki's former home minister who was denied a ticket this time—has virtually been made the "super home minister" of the state. He has a "better relationship" with officers in the Shahibag headquarters and around the 18 police stations of the Gujarat capital because he had worked with them as home minister for so long. So Rawal was brought in—even to the circuit house annexe, the temporary headquarters of the government where he not only briefs the press and "assists" the present home minister Amarsinh Chaudhary with his work but is also known to be taking important decisions in cooperation with senior police officers who are "close" to him. Apparently the Congress high command's denial of a ticket to Prabodh Rawal has not affected his standing in the Solanki administration.

COLLAPSE IN GUJARAT : HOW? WHY?

A look at the factors which led to the violent agitation rocking the state

Ahmedabad has emerged as a perfect mirror of the fractured Indian society, showing up the most frightening images in the past two-and-a-half months. The anti-reservation stir, launched by students in protest against an 18 per cent hike in the quota of seats in government jobs and education for the 82 socially and educationally backward classes (SEBC), has changed colour so rapidly that even the most seasoned observer of the Gujarat scene has been left confused and bewildered. First, the delayed reaction to the hike itself was timed to derive maximum advantage. Then came the 18 to 22 March communal turn to the stir that left at least 13 dead. The advent of April made many, including the government, think the agitation was petering out when on the night of 15 April yet another bout of violence claimed at least 13 lives. In between, there have been fears of a caste conflict with harijans and others threatening to launch a counter-agitation to protect the reservation policy.

The most notable aspect of the continuing unrest is that the main adversaries in the agitation have often been relegated into the background with others like communal forces and anti-social elements exploiting the situation. The climax came on 22 April when a mob stabbed a police head constable, Laxman Desai, to death in the Chhabila Hanuman area within the walled city, triggering off a mass walkout from their posts by part of the police force. For nearly six-and-a-half hours they stayed away from duty, during which time terror reigned supreme.

The police were incensed by a barrage of criticism and court action for alleged atrocities while trying to enforce law and order during the disturbances in the city. The building and the press of a leading Gujarati language daily, the Gujarat Samachar, were gutted in a fire started by policemen on 22 April Its owners allege the instigation came from those who did not like the daily which has been a strident critic of the Solanki ministry. Journalists too were the targets of police wrath because of the detailed reportage of what many of them said were fabricated stories of atrocities. Several of them, irrespective of whether they belonged to papers pitted against Mr Solanki or to papers sympathetic to him,were beaten up and threatened. One of the first victims, some days before the police strike, was Rakesh Sahay, a photographer and correspondent from Delhi who was covering the stir for Ravivar.

The anti-reservationists have suspended their agitation in view of the latest turn of events, just as they had done when the first communal troubles broke out in March this year. But the operative word in their announcement was "suspended," which means it could be resumed later. In a span of some 70 days, the Solanki government was witness to an upheaval that surpassed all past agitations in Gujarat, including perhaps the most famous of them, the 1974 Nav Nirman movement that toppled the Congress(R) government of Chimanbhai Patel. What was most noteworthy in the chain of events was that nobody had foreseen the latent dangers lurking below the surface in society It was not just the danger of a caste war between the upper castes and the lower castes Enmeshed were dangers of communal outbursts which in turn were quickly used by goondas for a spree of arson and looting, of general restiveness, of the police being caught in a crossfire of charges, of the policemen losing their tempers, of the people turning upon the police and the police taking their revenge on the press. Together the scenario made up a frightening picture of unrest in which a gulf of distrust between the authorities and the people was created

Politically, it left the Solanki ministry neck-deep in trouble, underlining the point that inspite of its massive majority in the 182-member Gujarat Assembly with as many as 149 members belonging to the Congress(I), the government was not only helpless, but hapless as well. It made feeble attempts at mobilising Congressmen "to explain to the people the real facts about the reservation policy." But, the Gujarat Pradesh Congress(I) Committee being an emaciated organisational wing, its impact was only peripheral. Not only the president of the PCC, Mahant Vijaydasji but his general secretary, Prof. Hasmukh Patel, have gone to the legislature and new appointments have not been made

The resultant reliance on official machinery has been counter-produetive because it gave an appearance that Solanki was fighting a lone battle. In the 1981 anti-reservation stir, he had an enemy in Jinabhai Darji, one-time ardent supporter of the chief minister and now a dissident. In the 1985 Assembly elections, most of the dissidents, including the finance minister, Sanat Mehta, were denied tickets. The list was full of Solanki's supporters, but equally without people who could speak out and be heard.

The agitation leaders assert that they have been maintaining a low profile all through the past two-and-a-half months, avoiding a 1981 type situation when clashes between the upper castes and lower castes took place The Congress(I) has said that the Bharatiya Janata Party, and its younger leaders were behind the scene in masterminding troubles in Ahmedabad and elsewhere. On their part, the BJP men said some elements in the ruling party itself were fanning the troubles for the chief minister.

In the maze of charges and counter-charges, it was difficult to determine where exactly the blame lay. What appeared more puzzling was that whatever turn the situation took, goondas were always waiting in the wings to join in. The more than 500-year-old city of Ahmedabad has been a city where Muslims and Hindus have lived beside each other. Once known as the Manchester of India, it also has been a premier textile and trade centre The Gujaratis have a very strong trade and entrepreneurial instinct, with hundreds of thousands of them living all over the globe. The character of the main city would understandably be that of a conservative, tolerant and profit-conscious society, comprising elements that would make up a generally peaceful city. And it is, save when mass madness erupts. A number of non-Gujaratis who have worked and lived for some years in Gujarat, and in places like Ahmedabad and Baroda, have opted for these places upon retirement rather than go back home

And still, in 1969 Ahmedabad saw the unparalleled communal riots that left hundreds of people dead. In 1974, the Nav Nirman movement, that brought the late Jayaprakash Narayan back into active politics started in Gujarat, and a government with a clear and massive majority had to leave. In 1981, the first anti-reservation stir which turned into a caste war, took place in Ahmedabad. Now the second anti-reservation stir, has left people dead, the population frightened, the government shaken and the society in turmoil.

If this is the mirror of India's fractured society, it is all the more frightening for one more reason. There was no valid reason for all the ugly turns to the situation to take place in the past two-and-a-half months. Is communal harmony so fragile? Are the goondas in a constant state of readiness to exploit every turn? Are leaders of society—not just of the government—incapable of providing a leadership that would inculcate a sense of tolerance and mutual dependence instead of hatred and destruction? And, finally, if this happens in Ahmedabad today, can it be ruled out from any other area tomorrow?

There is little doubt that the 18 per cent hike in the reservations for the SEBC was patently political. It was announced on 11 January 1985, just before the Assembly elections were announced. The hike was based on part-acceptance of the Rane Commission's findings But the government did not publish the report itself, although a decision came nearly two years after the report was given. Then, came the first twist. Although the government had announced the hike, it had not implemented it. It was clear the carrot had been dangled with a view to attract votes from the backward classes who are not among the scheduled castes and tribes which have statutory reservations.

The anti-reservation stir took formal shape some six weeks later, on 18 February. The timing was perfect as far as gaining momentum for the agitation was concerned. Had it been started immediately after the 11 January announcement, it might have failed to click because it could not have involved students, nor could it have had the tacit approval of the opposition parties which would have feared a loss of votes from the backward classes in the elections if they spoke up against the reservation policy. After the election, the Congress(I) could feel emboldened to implement the decision, but curiously it did not feel so.

Actually, as some political observers have pointed out, the reservation quota hike for SEBC (as distinct from the quota for harijans and tribals) looked very much like a decision belonging to the era of late Indira Gandhi. Around the time of the Assembly elections Rajiv Gandhi had made a remark in Hyderabad to the effect that perhaps the reservation policy needed a review. The remark came much after the hike decision had been disclosed. But it threw the Congress(I) in a dilemma in Gujarat. What Rajiv Gandhi thought of the whole thing at that time was not known. (Later the Prime Minister clarified he was in favour of a national consensus and not a review but that was on 23 March by which time the situation had worsened in Gujarat.)

Actually, ever since the 1981 agitation against reservations there have been complaints from communities which have thought themselves to be backward but were not included on the list of the 82 SEBC groups identified some years ago by the Baxi Commission. The Rane Commission was set up to identify new groups for adding to the list and suggest the percentage in the reservation quota. The commission gave a majority report recommending a hike in the quota by 18 per cent to take all the reservations to 49 per cent. But it also recommended the adoption of an economic criterion to determine backwardness rather than taking caste as a basis, arguing that consideration of caste factor tended to reinforce the caste barriers instead of demolishing them The commission was not against the reservation for Harijans and tribals, provided by statutes The government did not agree with this and followed the lone official member's dissent note to continue following the Baxi Commission criteria. The government has been emphatically saying that the Baxi formula included economic criteria too but was not the sole criterion.

Mid-February is a time when annual or preliminary examinations in schools and colleges begin in Gujarat. The agitation sparked off on 18 March, with a call to boycott the examinations. The call was a success. Once the examination schedules were upset, the government had a tactical disadvantage. It had to face the agitation against a decision that it had never implemented and about which Rajiv Gandhi had vaguely hinted at. On 16 March, after having tried persuading the students to return to their classes, the government made the first retreat. It said the quota hike had been postponed for a year and that a review would be made. The retreat came close on the heels of the Akhil Gujarat Navrachna Samiti of the students—which had been conducting the stir—being joined by the Akhil Gujarat Vali Mahamandal. the parents' association. The two together gave a call for a bandh on 18 March. In spite of the concessions announced on 16 March, the call was not withdrawn. The government, anxious to avoid a violent confrontation with the students and parents, asked the police to handle the bandh with kid gloves. Much of the force that day came from lathis. The communal twist came on that night in Dariapur and Kalupur areas and the orgy of violence against the police bandobust, marked by the use of burning rag balls, cement balls studded with nails, manhole covers and other missiles like stones, led to four days of communal rioting and left 13 dead.

The government anticipated that the anti-reservation stir would peter out. The agitators had postponed their stir as soon as communal riots began to rock the city. The Prime Minister made an airdash to the city, preceded by the union home minister, S.B. Chavan. The Prime Minister spoke of the need for evolving a national consensus on the reservation issue and blamed the opposition for the communal twist. The opposition in turn hit back by pointing an accusing finger at the Congress(I). Later, the BJP was identified by the ruling party as the force behind the ugly situation. But the verbal political onslaught on the BJP was matched by an action of the administration which breathed fresh life into the anti-reservation stir. Three student leaders who were going to submit a memorandum to the Prime Minister were arrested. Two days later a judge ordered their release on personal bond. As they were coming out,

'The Government Has Unleashed Violence to Frighten Us'

Shankarbhai Patel, president of the Akhil Gujarat Vali Mahamandal, told Sankarshan Thakur

Till sometime ago Shankarbhai Patel (48), was an unknown man. He was simply a lecturer of sociology in the L.D. College of Arts, Ahmedabad. Today, as president of the Akhil Gujarat Vali Mahamandal (All Gujarat Parents' Confederation) which is one of the organisations spearheading the anti-reservation agitation in Gujarat, he has suddenly shot into the limelight. When SUNDAY met him, he was literally "underground" with some of the other agitation leaders in a basement parlour in central Ahmedabad. Excerpts from the interview:

Q: Why has this agitation been marked with so much violence?*

A: Not because of us. We only believe in peaceful means of protest and our major protests have been peaceful. But every time the government has engineered violence to defame us and terrorise us.

Q: But why is it that communal clashes are taking place during such an agitation?

A: How do I know? It is a deliberate attempt of the government to give the whole issue a twist and create terror among the people so that the agitation dies down. These tactics will not pay. The government has lost all its popularity by the way it has behaved over the last month or so. I have reason to believe that the police was intentionally sent on strike and given a free hand. There was a secret understanding between the government and the police.

Q: What makes you think so?

A: Look at the way they have highlighted the murder of the police constable and used it as an excuse for all the violence that the police indulged in. To top it, the chief minister and even the union home minister defended the police. It was very wrong of them. Also the burning of the Gujarat Samachar. It reflects the mind of the chief minister himself because he had been against the paper for a long time and had been openly saying that the anti-reservation agitation was being carried out mainly by the daily newspapers... so they burnt it down.

Q: Why have negotiations broken down?

A: The government initially was (being) very difficult to deal with. They kept on arresting our people on various false charges, I agree that now they have agreed to most of our preconditions for talks but still they are putting conditions that are not acceptable to us. They say there should be five representatives from both the pro-reservation and the anti-reservation side in the talks. We will not agree to that.

Q: Why?

A: Because that would always be unfair to us. The government is trying to do Bandar nyaya. Can't it decide for itself what it has to do? We will not accept such conditions. We want a direct meeting with the government; no other parties should be involved.

Q: But is your demand for complete abolition of reservations not unfair? How can you expect it to be done immediately?

A: We never said it should be done immediately. The government should at least accept it in principle and then implement it gradually. But yes, the programme of abolition should be time-bound. the last phase should be implemented latest by 1989.

Q: For the moment, have you suspended your agitation?

A: No, no, no. Make no mistake. We have not suspended the agitation. (We have suspended) only our public programmes keeping in mind the disturbed situation. The agitation is going on and will go on

Q: What if the government disagrees?

A: This government has already shown us what it is capable of doing. They have unleashed violence to frighten us away. But we are ready to face them.

the student leaders were taken into custody under the National Security Act. Junior doctors, who were in the vanguard of the 1981 stir too, went on strike and the government issued sack orders on hundreds of such doctors.

The administration appeared to believe that the stir would soon fizzle out. The government had also attracted a lot of criticism for police inaction during the communal violence in March. The government took a hard line and told the agitators to come to the negotiation table and then raise their demands. The agitationists had put forth three preconditions: release the NSA detenus; withdrawal of the sack orders on junior doctors, and inquiry into allegations of police excesses reported from some areas like Asarwa and Saraspur. Later, the demand for the inquiry included alleged excesses in some other walled city areas like Khadia. Newspapers started publishing stories on these alleged excesses. Citizens, probably advised by social and political workers, took recourse to a new device against the police, of moving a court of law against specific police officers for atrocities and getting them barred from going into the area.

If the government had learnt a lot from the agitations of the past, the people too had drawn valuable hints. The 1974 agitation had forced Indira Gandhi never to concede to any such agitation again, be it in Assam or Punjab. The idea was that sooner or later agitations developed fatigue and would peter out.

The current agitation is marked by an understanding of this fact by the agitators themselves. The anti-reservation stir itself has been conducted on a low profile, collectively by the two committees. In course of time, committees were formed in other towns and cities too and when the situation took a communal turn in Ahmedabad, the stir was suspended in the city but was continued in other areas of the state. Also, in day-to-day programmes, the agitators seemed to have taken care to ensure that the confrontation did not rise to a peak on its own: the logic being that if there was a peak there also would be a valley. Such ups and downs could kill an agitation. The stir was continued on an even keel, the ugly turns notwithstanding.

On 15 April, R.D. Pradhan, union home secretary, made a sudden air-dash in the evening to Ahmedabad to hold talks with the local authorities for an assessment of the law and order situation. Quick on the heels of his departure in the night, a fresh bout of rioting broke out in Raikhad and Gol Limda areas. It was reportedly triggered by a raid by the police on a gambling den and took on a communal colour with groups of people involved in battles with the police. It was soon followed by a fresh spate of complaints of police high-handedness. The BJP workers moved the High Court and got a two-member panel appointed to probe the charges. This seemed to have caused widespread resentment in the police which was evident from reports which came in. The reports said the police stood by quietly even as curfew orders were broken by people. The government promptly denied any police strike. Two days later on 22 April came the final straw that broke the police patience. A head constable was stabbed in the walled city. His death caused resentment and anger in the police ranks who left their posts for the hospital where the dead body of the policeman had been taken. The hours that followed saw lawlessness in the city without the custodians of law and order on duty.

In the meantime, on the night of 18 April, the government conceded a major demand of the anti-reservationists by ordering release of seven leaders detained under NSA. The next day an hour-long talk was held between six representatives of the stir and Madhavsinh Solanki following which the acceptance of the two remaining preconditions were announced. The agitationists said the government had released their leaders, agreed to withdraw sack orders on medicos and look into the charge of police atrocities. But, they asserted these were only preconditions to start a dialogue and did not automatically mean the stir would be withdrawn. Their basic demand was that reservations should be phased out and abolished. This is quite different from the 18 per cent hike that touched off the agitation. It is also doubtful as to how far chief minister Solanki can go in meeting this demand, because to do so is not in his hands.

The worst crack in the fractured society in Ahmedabad is the wall of distrust that has come up between the police and the people. There may be a grain of truth in the allegations that it was a politically motivated campaign against the police that led to this. But the moot point is that this distrust has to be demolished soon before it gets stronger. Neither could be allowed to drift farther apart. How to do this and restore tranquility in the state is a question that cannot be dodged anymore.

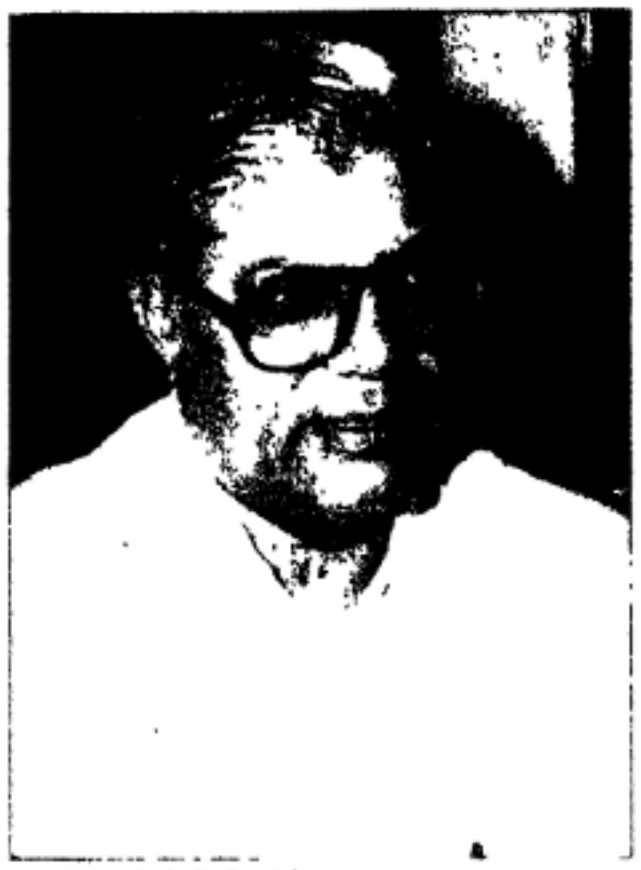
Why Solanki Must Quit

The Gujarat CM's inability to govern the state has led to chaos

Prabodh Rawal, the home minister of Gujarat in the first five years of Madhavsinh Solanki's rule, was denied a party ticket when the Congress(I) high command decided to undertake a weeding-out operation before the Assembly elections early this year. Having been denied the party's nomination, Prabodh Rawal cannot be a minister now. In Solanki's second term as Gujarat's chief minister, the de facto home minister, however, is Prabodh Rawal. The new home minister, Amarsinh Chaudhary, is only there in name. The circuit house annexe of Ahmedabad has become the seat of power of the Solanki regime these days (the state's capital, Gandhinagar, being far from the scene of disturbance in Ahmedabad). Prabodh Rawal runs the affairs of state from this double-storeyed red-brick complex. Amarsinh Chaudhary's tasks are performed by Rawal, even the newsmen are briefed by him. This is only one of the irregularities of the Solanki regime. Not only is popular mood disregarded, even the judgment of the Congress high command is questioned.

The control of Rawal over the state apparatus has not been accentuated due to his appeal among the masses. Rawal is said to be popular among Gujarat's police officers. He is liked by the policemen because during the five years he was home minister, he protected them and let them go scot-free whenever scandals broke out. R.K. Vasishtha, the commandant of the State Reserve Police (SRP) who conducted "Operation Khadia" on 17 April, was under a cloud sometime back. Rawal had seen to it that Vasishtha was not harmed. On 17 April, when the police went berserk at Khadia, therefore, Vasishtha knew that no harm could come to him because Prabodh Rawal continued to be at the helm. Rawal, however, was sent "underground" for a few days when a central team of the Congress(I), comprising Chandulal Chandrakar and Tarun Gogoi, visited Ahmedabad. In the period of the team's visit, Amarsinh Chaudhury was allowed to brief the press, to meet the officers minus Rawal and behave like the home minister. (Rawal, of course, lurked behind the scenes and ran the show.) Apart from flouting the high command's judgment about Rawal, Madhavsinh Solanki is also adept in the art of deception. While Gujarat burns, hide-and-seek is played with facts. If Madhavsinh Solanki has to go, then a major reason for his departure can be the Rawal factor.



The Gujarat agitation of 1974 was the ominous precursor to the events which followed in 1975. Gujarat, therefore, should not be taken lightly. The Solanki regime has been singularly marked by a series of agitations which have taken their toll on the state over the last five years. Now, the policemen of Gujarat have been misbehaving with impunity. They have attacked the people when they are supposed to protect them. It is indeed a disturbing feature that the military has to be relied upon to discipline the uniformed guardians of law. The press in Gujarat has been attacked. The media had played a major role in exposing the links between Solanki and businessman Mrugesh Jaikrishna, who is now behind bars because two of his employees were nabbed by the Bombay customs sometime back while trying to leave the country with Rs 46.63 lakhs worth of foreign exchange. When the press speaks the truth, as Gujarat Samachar did, the only way to quieten it, the Solanki way, is to let the police run amok, take on the role of an unruly mob and burn down the press. Madhavsinh Solanki must go, because if the media is silenced by mob violence, then the basic edifice of democracy is threatened.

What has Madhavsinh Solanki done to restore the people's faith in the police? The credibility of the state was best summed up by a senior journalist, who was reluctant to move out of his residence during the curfew. Normally, reporters brave curfews to fulfil their professional responsibilities. The journalist, to whom this correspondent spoke on trunk telephone, commented: "How can I go out? If I show my press card, the police will attack. And if I do not identify myself the people will beat me up." Indeed, the terror tactics of the police has been driven home so far that senior journalists of Ahmedabad's newspapers were ringing up police officials and even the home minister (Amarsinh Chaudhury) to get their stories cleared, lest there be trouble. So far, there has been no word of regret from the chief minister of Gujarat for the happenings.

The misfortune has been compounded by the fact that even the union home minister, S. B. Chavan, has not reacted firmly against police hooliganism. Chavan's concern for injured policemen has hurt the sensibilities of everyone who cherish democracy. While attacks on policemen must be condemned, the circumstances leading to such incidents have to be looked into. The policemen who raped Maya Tyagi in Baghpat, the uniformed sadists who blinded prisoners in Bhagalpur, those who broke limbs of Varanasi's undertrials, the anarchy of Uttar Pradesh's Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) on Id day of 1980 in Moradabad: these acts cannot be pardoned. Gujarat's policemen unfortunately today stand in the dock for similar crimes. When the guardians of law become predators, normal behaviour cannot be expected of the members of the public.

Rakesh Sahay: victim of police brutality

The main grouse of Gujarat's policemen is that the press exposed the police atrocities. Had Ravivar's photographer Rakesh Sahay not returned to Delhi with broken limbs and a scarred body, the capital's press corps would not have had the opportunity to witness the bestiality of the Ahmedabad police. Why was Sahai battered? He saw a pregnant woman being assaulted with lathis in the city's Manekchowk area (close to Khadia). When he photographed the incident, he himself was a victim of assault. The press in Gujarat, like Rakesh Sahay, was reporting what was happening. And the price which it paid for its professional vigilance was that while the police attacked, the government looked on, perhaps, admiringly.

Madhavsinh Solanki's government has become the symbol of everything which is the opposite of democratic decency. At first Solanki tries to play with a sensitive issue like reservations for electoral gains. Then, he allows lawlessness to prevail. Anarchy stalks the bylanes of Ahmedabad and Baroda today. A chief minister who is insensitive to people's hurt feelings and protects those who perpetrate the law of the jungle must go. The union government had to virtually thrust the army on Ahmedabad to control the policemen. Perhaps, it could have acted more harshly, if Governor B. K. Nehru was present. It is a shame that while Gujarat was aflame, the Governor was holidaying in Switzerland and had to be summoned back. An insensitive Governor and an unpopular chief minister cannot provide the healing touch, which is required in Gujarat today.

ESSAY

Populism and Its Aftermath

By Romesh Thapar

Last November, soon after the near genocidal attack on the Sikh communities in the north, an old, distinguished citizen of Delhi who had been abroad during those terrible days came over to get a blow-by-blow account. He listened to me in silence, and made only one comment "Today, it is the Sikhs. Tomorrow, it will be us."

Every morning, when I pick up the newspapers, invariably crowded with items of disturbance, assault and violence, I remember this warning. The total failure of the police during three days of carnage in Delhi, ordered or otherwise, is now beginning to repeat with a certain monotony. Ahmedabad is the latest example, and with new sinister manifestations—the press is under direct assault by the police because it has dared to expose their criminalities. Journalists are being battered and their offices set on fire as a first warning.

But is it really the "first" warning? There have been so many cases of police vendettas against intrepid reporters. The press itself has been tenuous in its exposure of such acts and not really anxious to confront a corrupted force. Local "sanction," after all, is very important in these times of insecurity. Several journals and news-sheets of opposition groups have been silenced. Copies of the People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) report on the Delhi riots, an indictment of the police force and the politicians tampering with it, have been seized in various areas. Persons who have translated this report have been charged with "sedition."

Our understanding of free expression, whether at government level or among ourselves, is in a state of considerable disarray. A reporter doing his duty to the best of his ability, and responsible to his editor, is pilloried for dissenting views and often, I am afraid left to fend for himself through the jungle of court procedure. We are not stirring to support the rights of the dissenter. We are as guilty as the police who go on a rampage because they have been reduced to gang leaders and know no better.

The situation is much worse in the so-called "provinces" of our sprawling sub continent. It calls for battle against political dadagiri and its close links with a largely criminalised police unable to live on its wages and compelled to "offer its services" to the highest bidder. Small wonder, then, that some editors (even reporters) are persuaded to carry arms for self-protection. We are, in fact, acknowledging that our systems of law and order are collapsing. The fear is infectious. Already in India, there are too many guns around, licensed and unlicensed—a commentary on our condition. With every new eruption in our massive urban sprawl, now covering some 200 million people in crowded, unhappy conditions, self-protection is becoming an obsessive matter And in our communalised and casteist conditions, self-protection usually means the ability to wallop or eliminate anyone who stands in the way of our amoralities, of which there are endless variations.

The populism of our political parties, the attitude of drifting with those who are mobilised or organised, irrespective of what they stand for, is the gut problem of our national life. The police force, and all its extraordinary variations in para-police and para-military formations packed with unemployed aliens sponsored by our netas, is a plaything in the hands of the local politicians surrounded by toughs and bully-boys. Every urban centre is a festering focus of this "alliance."

The walled city of Ahmedabad has been ravaged, and now a warring people, blinded by casteism (even communalism) have turned on the police—and the police tear on in renewed frenzy. What of Bombay, for years under the shadowy control of smuggler "dons" and killer squads who are protected because they provide the finance for our political parties. If you think Calcutta and Delhi are so very different, take a sampling of so many "incidents" from bride-burning, to miniature dacoity, to running vendettas in the teeming mohallahs. We don't even have a record of what goes on. No society which describes itself as democratic would tolerate this state of affairs. We lack vital concerns. Our people are faceless. We think only of ourselves, and one day in a fast, deteriorating situation this thinking too becomes irrelevant. Let us not forget that the terrible brutalities against the Sikh communities finally made us sensitive to such suffering and compelled us to demand compensation for ruined families. I am haunted by the fact that not a single case of compensation was recorded or fought for until then, in hundreds of riots against Muslims and harijans

We are entering an extremely dangerous phase in India. Thirty-seven years of development have transformed the aspirations of the people. The knowledge that political clout only comes from an organised presence is central to the agitational, even violent, approach to each problem because these are not carefully analysed, assessed or elaborated.

The walled city of Ahmedabad has been ravaged, and now a warring people, blinded by casteism (now communalism) have turned on the police since the transfer of power in 1947.

It is imperative that the sternest possible measures be taken to warn mobsters, and their political instigators, to keep their hands off the press, its reporters and photographers. However, to expect that the public will warm to this task when the press itself has been a more or less silent witness to the destruction of the democratic system, failing repeatedly to highlight the attack on free expression, is to expect too much in our present demoralisation.

The notion that "investigative journalism" is the be-call and end-all of courageous reporting is a lot of hooey. The exposure of the loot-maar situation in high places is nothing in comparison with the dogged, daily coverage of the misuse of power at the base of our society, in out-of-the-way mohallahs, in isolated villages and hamlets. The small paper, the broadsheet, the tiny pamphlet, doing this job is vital to our future—and, here, there is no protection for the articulator of the people's needs and demands. The democratic system has been so shattered by near-criminal political practice at almost every level of living, particularly in the urban sprawls, that a correction is not possible without major initiatives by the centres of political power in our land. The police, para-police and para-military will have to be drastically reorganised and restructured along the lines suggested by the Police Commission. Those recommendations are fundamental to the future and must have the support of the major political parties—and that means finding the finding for the reform. It is necessary to underline this because there is a reluctance on the part of the populist politician to discipline himself on the question of manipulating the police system for his own ends. It is here that the press and its active reporters have to stir to break the power of the populist politician.

Armymen take up position in the walled city of Ahmedabad

This is done not by editorialising but by detailing the interference and demanding the termination of the political careers of these rapscallions.

A tall order? Yes, very much so, but what prevents the increasingly dominant electronic media from moving out into the country to research the real state of our democracy or from opening a wide-ranging debate on the political failure to buttress the forks of law and order or from organising our people to act in the defence of their basis rights? Formulate these questions in all their sharpness. If Akashvani and Doordarshan are departments of government and cannot play this role, then surely it is time to open the electronic media either to genuine autonomous control or to competition. Interestingly, this demand is hardly voiced in our press or by our normally excitable political parties. Clearly, we do not know, and are very far from democratic debate. Our anger is bolted up inside us, ready to burst at every provocation. It would be revealing to research the coverage of the electronic media on so many issues which are tearing us apart. How much of the Punjab tangle has been freely argued to preserve dialogues between Hindu and Sikh and to widen areas of understanding? Was the aftermath of the assassination covered in depth to turn us into sensitive human beings? Were issues, and not personalities, the theme of the coverage in our most critical election month? Has communalism ever been faced frontally on radio and TV? Was the Bhopal tragedy probed in all its enormity and how many teams set out to record this disaster? Is there no chance whatsoever of tangling with the terrorists, even in jail, to find out what makes them into killers? And what about probing all the sleazy and cowardly posturings of politicians gathering votes on communal and ethnic appeals? The list is endless. Is there someone around to listen?

The electronic media must face uncomfortable questions, and many more, together with the press. Only when we get these exercises under way, and move programmes and reportage out of the damnable studios and editorial officer, will we be able to create the climate for a thinking citizenry capable of seeing that the police, para-police and para-military are unable to play the role for which they were designed. Otherwise, it looks very much as if we are going to slide deeper and deeper into a mire of our own making. In terms of this internal crisis, we place too much reliance on the military. Its tasks are dramatically opposite to those being thrust upon it. If every internal disorder is to witness a police riot or breakdown, the military will soon be damaged beyond repair—and, what is worse, politicised. Then what? Here again, the press indulges in too little thought and too much patriotic mumbo-jumbo.

What is more worrying than the urban eruptions (which in normal circumstances it should be possible to control with a certain degree of coordinated force, for we are the world's most highly-trained riot-controllers) is the spread of disorders to rural India, self-policed largely, and living under panchayat direction. Then, the fat will be in the fire, army or no army. I hope this truth can be pushed into the pig-headed politicians who are busy digging their graves, and ours. It is stupid to imagine that the incendiary material which ignites communal and caste passions is confined to the congested urban areas. Liquor and gambling dens, video "parlours" with their brutal pornography, the growing collusion between police and criminals, the respectability offered to this collusion by the influential families of the area, and the general acceptance of these behaviour patterns create the basis for public indiscipline and outrage. It has been suggested that the enormity of the problem of policing India needs the formation of an elite force of national guards (composed of the best cadres drawn from the multitude of para-police and para-military establishments, and mixed with selected elements of the highly trained, prematurely demobbed from the military some 60,000 each year. The national guards would assume the role that the army is called upon to play in the situations which turn ugly for the police. Whatever the merit in this proposal, at least the trained personnel retiring from the armed forces should be given preference and priority in any recruitment to formations designed to assist the police force.

We are entering an extremely dangerous phase in India. Thirty-seven years of development have transformed the aspirations of the people. The knowledge that political clout only comes from an organised presence is central to the agitational, even violent, approach to each problem because these are not carefully analysed, assessed or elaborated. A competition in populist rhetoric and muscle-power is seen as the only way because governance is messy and insensitive. In the past, what goes by the broad terminology of "government" could cope with one or two simultaneous eruptions. But, now, the eruptions are too many, and too widely scattered. Management is becoming difficult. The mantram, "send the army," cannot work. A backlash of dangerous dimensions can develop, much to the embarrassment of the armed forces. The response which we formulate will have to synchronise at many levels through institutions which are reforged to project behaviour patterns in keeping with a responsible democratic society. Citizen, politician, press, judiciary, police force, the administration and the professional in whatever he or she does, will have to fuse their efforts. We are very far from this consummation or even of the vivid detailing of the present divisiveness.

Young women have to battle with police to register bride-burning cases, now fairly extensive and unreported in many parts of the country. The parents of the threatened girls have yet to show some concern. The whole underworld of smuggling, drug-trafficking, liquor-peddling and gambling, is in cahoots with the police not only in Bombay city—and big money is involved. Legislation like FERA is not used against the masters of the parallel economy, but against minor offenders who have no protectors, even against the innocent, and the government of India is powerless to control its minions, or so it would appear. Undertrials rot in the jails because the press lacks the energy to pursue its exposures and to frame charges against those who are violating their powers. The courts too, cannot escape their involvement in the destruction of the basic tenets of justice. This mess of democratic thinking is then able easily to produce rationalisation for decorating military men for actions against their own people (from Nagaland to Punjab) and to spark the madness that honours assassins on some medieval notions of ethnic history. Within this web of self destruction, politicians who battle for illegalities are honoured and win votes. Priests, whether Sikh or Bohra, claim the right to ex-communicate in a democratic polity. We stand everything on its head whether it is our right to occupy the pavements (and the roads), or other people's properties, or to stretch a marriage shamiana across a main thoroughfare. And so it goes on, this wilful drift into chaos, with majorities and minorities only too happy to oblige on the off chance of gaining an advantage here or there.

Where will the re-focussing come from in this populist jungle? Clearly, from the media, electronic and otherwise. But the quality that must inspire it will have to be plain and simple courage. There will be bashings and killings—not only from the police force—but the media must exercise its power for triumphant assertion. Without this courage, which is the opposite of our codes of good behaviour, we will go down as a failed democracy. We are very near this point of no return.

"We are Not Pawns of the Super Powers"

Yasser Arafat told M.J. Akbar

The charismatic chairman of the PLO, Yasser Arafat, had an extremely tight schedule when he came to Delhi for two days to attend the extraordinary ministerial meeting of the Non-aligned Coordinating Bureau on Namibia. But he made a little time to talk to SUNDAY:

Q: The Palestinian people particularly in the last three years, have made enormous sacrifices, the worst phase being in the Lebanon war. Has your dream come any closer to realisation after all this suffering?

A: No doubt. Dawn comes after the greatest darkness.

Q. Would you call the Lebanon war the worst period in the history of your struggle?

A. No. A part of this Lebanon war, the siege of Beirut, was the worst. Because we were facing a double siege—the Syrians from the land, and the Israelis from the sea and air. But not to forget that the other confrontation was very important for the Arab-Israeli confrontation. The siege of Beirut was one of the miracles of the Palestinian struggle, small groups of the Palestinian and their allied Lebanese, with heroic steadfast, facing this huge Israeli-American force alone for more than 88 days! And after this heroic resistance, the Palestinian-Lebanese resistance against the Israeli troops, for the first time they (the Israelis) were obliged to leave and to withdraw. And you can imagine that it was the only war, the only Israeli war, where there is no hero among their generals.

Q. Yes. In fact Sharon has been ..

A. Sharon was demanding that he be made the hero of this war. What happened? He was obliged to leave. (Menachem) Begin was imagining that he would be a hero. He was obliged to resign.

Q. Yes, psychologically he was destroyed. Do you think the PLO has been used as a pawn by the Super Powers?

A. No. We are not pawns. We have our struggle. We will continue our struggle, because we are facing this oppression, this apartheid, this terrorism, from this Israeli military junta against our people, against Palestinian people, against the Arab people.

Q: Don't you feel despondent sometimes?

A: You see, when we started our revolution we knew that it was not going to be easy. A long-drawn struggle. (But we also) know that we are not alone. People all over the world are supporting the Palestinian people and their struggle, which for us is enough.

Q: But the support does not seem to be effective when a death struggle begins, as in Lebanon.

A: Yes, yes, we were obliged to carry on our own struggle, we know that. It is not easy. That period was not an easy period. It was our own decision to carry on. In the beginning we had succeeded in making a ceasefire agreement with the Syrians. After the fourth day, we were offered another proposal for us to withdraw under the white flag. But we refused. So it was our own decision to carry on the war. I told my guards that if I became weak and accepted this proposal, they should shoot me. And we refused this proposal and we continued this 88-day difficult struggle and confrontation.

Q. Why are the Arab states continuing this effort to sabotage the Palestinian struggle?

A: Not all the Arab states.

Q: Not all of them, but most of them.

A: Even not most of them. These two regimes—we have to speak about two regimes only, the Syrian regime and the Libyan regime. But not all the Arabs. The Syrian people completely support the Palestinian struggle and the Libyan people support the Palestinian struggle.

Q: Do you think the feudal Arab kingdoms are really interested in seeing a liberated and progressive Palestine which would obviously radicalise the whole of West Asia?

A: You see, we are looking for the support of all the Arabs and all their regimes. And not to forget that we are a full member of the Arab League at the same level as all these Arab countries, be it a kingdom or republican.

Q: Why has Iran turned hostile to PLO and to you?

A: You have to ask them and not to ask me (laughs). Maybe they are against my mediation (in the Iraq-Iran war). The PLO is participating in two mediation committees-in the Islamic mediation committee and non-aligned mediation committee. They are against this mediation because they want to carry on their war. We are trying to stop this bloodshed between two Muslim countries two nonaligned countries—they are both in the nonaligned movement, in the third world.

Q: And that's why you think Iran has taken...

A: Yes, yes. But not Iran: only a part of the rulers of Iran. A part of the rulers.

Q: You don't think that even all the members of the ruling elite are behind Ayatollah Khomeini in this anti-PLO stance?

A: No, no, definitely not at all. You have to go yourself to Teheran to see what is the meaning of the PLO, what is the meaning of the Palestine revolutionary movement. See, we have a very good relation (with the people) You know that during their struggle against the Shah, we were co-operating with them.

Q: Do you think that support for PLO is growing within Israel?

A: After their failure of the invasion in Lebanon, after the heroic struggle of the Palestinians, (this was) the longest Arab-Israel war, 88 days, and this (current) very successful war of attrition in the south of Lebanon by Palestinians and the Lebanese against the Israeli troops: this had made a new atmosphere among the Israelis. You remember the long march of the Peace Now in Israel movement--more than 4,00,000 were participating in the demonstration. And also some groups, progressive democratic groups, began to understand that what their Egypt leaders were looking for, to eliminate and to liquidate the PLO, was a false dream. We are the most important figure in the Middle East dilemma and equation. We are there. And nobody can hide the sun with his finger.

Q: Have you changed the previous PLO policy of attacks even against Israeli civilians?

A: We, the PLO, are against any attack against the civilians We are against it. And we have declared it many times.

Q: What is the significance of the accord you have reached with King Hussein (of Jordan) recently?

A: You see, we have this agreement so that we can go together, we can cooperate together, to achieve our land for peace.

Q· Have you forgotten Black September (the massacre of the Palestinians in Jordan in September 1970)?

A: You see, we have a big target, a holy target, to liberate our holy land. And for this target, we are ready to open a new page with everybody.

Q: That was an astonishing massacre, wasn't it?

PLO chairman Yasser Arafat talking to journalists in Beirut

A. Yes. Not only there, in many places.

Q: What was Gen Zia's role during that time—in 1970?

A: You can ask them, not ask me. Okay?

Q: How do you view our Prime Minister?

A He is following in the footsteps of his great mother. He is now one of our great leaders. Not only for India, but also for the non-aligned countries movement. What had happened yesterday, with his participation in this solidarity conference for the sake of the people of Namibia and South Africa, means a lot. This is an important sign. We have to remember that Mahatma Gandhi had started there. And Rajiv Gandhi has come to back it. Which is most significant.

Q: Lastly, what is your real name?

A: (Surprised) Why?

Q: Because nobody seems very sure.

A: (Smiles) My real name? You see, my name is Mohammad Yasser Arafat al-Husaini. You see, that is my real name. They call me Yasser Arafat

We will continue our struggle, because we are facing this oppression, this apartheid, this terrorism, from this Israeli military junta against our people, against Palestinian people, against the Arab people.

Ex-MPs in Search of Homes

Over 60 former MPs face eviction from government bungalows in Delhi

As many as 61 ex-members of Parliament living in government bungalows in the posh areas of New Delhi face the possibility of being forcibly evicted from their houses by officials of the directorate of estates and the police. Several others occupying flats may also be thrown out if they do not move out on their own. Two CPI(M) MPs from West Bengal—Sudhir Roy and Purna Chandra Malik—were evicted from a flat in Delhi's Vithalbhai Patel house even though they are sitting members of the Lok Sabha The flat had to be cleared because it was allotted in the name of a CPI(M) ex-MP, Nirmal Sinha. Sudhir Roy and Purna Chandra Malik protested, but in vain. Dozens of such evictions might have to be carried out in the coming weeks as ex-MPs are refusing to move out.

After the December 1984 Lok Sabha polls, 76 bungalows and 141 flats were to be be vacated by members of the seventh Lok Sabha who had either lost their seats or had not contested at all. All of them had been sent notices to give up their houses within one month from the date of the dissolution of the seventh Lok Sabha: 31 December 1984. But 127 ex-MPs immediately filed in requests for the extension of the deadline giving various excuses. Eighteen reported sick, another 18 wanted to retain their houses because their relatives were sick and others said they wanted to continue because their children were being educated in Delhi Makineedu, an ex-MP, wanted to retain his house because he had fever, K. Lakappa said he wanted to stay on because of the "court cases of his sons," N.K. Shejwalkar needed the bungalow for "storing luggage," N. Selvaraju because his "cousin is ill." Surya Narayan Singh had "some personal difficulties"andSwami Indravesh did not want to leave "due to certain circumstances." Six others including Subramaniam Swamy and Ram Jethmalani,wanting to be certain of a roof above their heads, filed cases to obtain stay orders.

On the other hand, the newcomers to the Lok Sabha have only temporary accommodation in hostels of the external affairs ministry and whatever accommodation was available in the Western Court. They have been pressing the house committee of the Lok Sabha, which allots houses to Lok Sabha members, for permanent accommodation. Four hundred and two MPs of the eighth Lok Sabha have sent in detailed preferences, right down to the number of the bungalow or flat they want. Almost 90 per cent of the MPs have put in requests for bungalows, which are not available in such large numbers. Besides, a large number of requests also contravene the criteria laid down for the allotment of residential quarters for members of the Lok Sabha.

According to the rules, bungalows are to be given only to those MPs who have been members of the Lok Sabha for three terms or more or who are ex-ambassadors, ex-Governors, ex-chief ministers, ex-judges, ex-speakers or ex-ministers (either at the centre or in the states). All others are eligible only for accommodation in flats. The list of requests, however, contains first and second termers who have demanded bungalows. One MP has asked for a bungalow because he has been awarded a Padmashree. Others have demanded bungalows because they happen to head committees or enquiry commissions at the state level. It is also learnt that Congress (I) MP Vyjayanthimala Bali, a first termer, has been demanding a bungalow perhaps because of her status as a top star. Some of the MPs have justified their demands by stating precedents that are readily available. Even a first term MP like Rajesh Pilot had been allotted in 1980 a big bungalow (3 Safdarjung Road, next to the former residence of the Prime Minister).Shalinitai Patil continued to occupy the bungalow allotted to Vasantdada Patil even after he went back to Maharashtra as CM. In the case of Chandrashekhar Singh, the former chief minister of Bihar, his family retained the house at Rajendra Prasad Road despite his becoming the chief minister of Bihar. Members of the House committee and the directorate of estates have been trying to set things right but more often than not, they have faced a number of problems. Raj Narain stayed at 6, Teenmurti Lane, the residence of Maniram Bagri all through the term of the seventh Lok Sabha. When Bagri lost the elections this time, he vacated the premises but Raj Narain did not. In fact, when a squad from the directorate of estates went to evict him he shouted that he had been given the house by Indira Gandhi and that nobody had the authority to remove him!

Bungalows need to be vacated as they are in short supply. The Lok Sabha pool has only 147 bungalows, 50 of which are already occupied by members who have been in the Lok Sabha for more than three terms. About 60-odd are held by ex-members. An estimate prepared by the house committee of the Lok Sabha says that even if the rules are strictly followed, at least 107 more Lok Sabha members will have to be given bungalows. The nearly-impossible situation has been made more difficult by the fact that most people occupying the bungalows beyond their terms are political bigwigs. Many of them have also not been paying their rents regularly. Leading the list of such defaulters is Bhishma Narain Singh, the Governor of Assam. His allotment order for 1, Teen Murti Marg was cancelled on 15 May 1984 but he remains in possession of the house and on 28 February 1985 he owed Rs 73,959 as rent. Others who have been occupying the coveted Type-VIII bungalows and owe rent as on 28 February 1985 are:

- A.B. Vajpayee: Rs. 6,984.84
- Mallikarjun: Rs 3,301.90
- Fatehsingh Rao Gaekwad: Rs 2,740.10

The shortage of accommodation has been accentuated by the poor condition of some of the bungalows that are available. A couple of them on Telegraph Lane have zinc-roofings which are unacceptable to any member of Parliament. There are plans for the construction of some new bungalows but at the moment the house committee is considering plans for refurnishing nearly 200 bungalows and flats. The estimate for the first phase is Rs 42,91,000. What happened to the earlier sets of furniture, nobody knows.

GUEST COLUMN/CHANCHAL SARKAR

Venezuela's Experiments With Intelligence

The bolivar, not so very long ago, was the hardest currency in the world. And that must be all that Indians know about Venezuela. That and Bolivia being the birthplace of Simon Bolivar, Latin America's liberator from the yoke of Spain. The pricking of the oil bubble and three devaluations later the bolivar does not ride high any longer, but its past glory is visible still. In Caracas it takes a lot of searching to find an old building. Everywhere, as the oil money cascaded in, glass and chromium skyscrapers shot up. Simon Bolivar's home and the National Assembly were two of the very few relics spared and one or two lovely homes of Spanish grandees now used, with the period interiors, as restaurants.

It wasn't tourism that took me to Venezuela. I had gone to evaluate, as part of an international team, a most fascinating experiment being attempted there. About four years ago the Venezuelan government set up a ministry for the development of intelligence. Behind it was a conviction, expressed at different times by distinguished researchers in various world laboratories that, by certain stimulations and interventions, human intelligence can be heightened irrespective of the children's environment—provided, of course, one started early enough and devised an adequate programme.

In putting this experiment across to the Venezuelan public the Family Project (Proyecto Familia as it is called) has used the mass-media extensively. In fact, about 50 per cent of Proyecto Familia's total spending was on the media. Evaluating that was my special task.

Venezuela, which has the largest national and per capita GDP in Latin America, is very lucky in its media set-up. In the urban homes of its 16 million people, TVs are owned by 96 per cent (73 per cent of the people in areas other than urban own TVs). Radios are owned by 96 per cent of the homes throughout the country (98 to 99 per cent of radios are owned by those in cities). Of the four TV channels, two are owned by the government. The government (along with the public sector) is the largest advertiser on all the four channels. It is natural to assume that the TV channels would be at the government's disposal. But neither the extensive use of TV nor of radio, films and video tapes on Proyecto Familia has made a significant impression on the people. As far as we could foresee, there were several good reasons for this.

Although the scheme said it was meant for children irrespective of their economic status the marginal families are not being specially sought out. The TV programmes, for instance, reflect a setting far removed from Caracas's jhuggi population. There are whole hillsides jammed with slums, where sanitation, health and living conditions are bad—light years away from Caracas's Country Club or the homes of the 'Miameros,' (those who own property in Miami).

The media was being worked to a frazzle in the sense that there were frequent spots over TV and radio and a number of "talking heads" programmes of 30 minutes. One estimate has it that 1,740,000 people see every week the promotional programmes about PF put out over the cinema. The new mothers (25 per cent of them in the two districts of Venezuela where PF is being tried) received their education—on the day after the birth of their children—in hospital and were being instructed through video cassettes at the bedside. Trained "facilitators" do the instructing. We watched them at it. Some were good, some incredibly boring. And remember, a mother is not at her best 24 hours after the delivery of her baby. The results were less than what we had expected. Media can bring awareness and that, in Venezuela, was intense. But practice is a different thing. Back from hospital, most mothers did not visit the clinics where the training in stimulation was to be continued. And, anyway, world scientific opinion is not agreed on the amount of growth in intelligence that can be induced. There was little interpersonal contact once the mothers left the hospital. Radio was not used enough. The posters were attractive but again unsuitable for the slum barrios. Print was an underestimated medium.

We met the key figure in the concept, Dr Luis Alberto Machado. He had been the first minister in the world to head a ministry for human intelligence. That was in the previous administration which changed in December 1983. Dr Machado parried many questions put by our team of sociologists, paediatricians as well as by media people like me. He said that the laboratories of the world had a wealth of achievements that could be put to work in the field of human intelligence. We were left unconvinced. Where we felt the scheme had gone wrong was in treating intelligence separately from health and nutrition: in fact, from a programme of health and basic needs of the Venezuelan child. As part of a Programme for the Child, PF could be a forceful weapon; without that ambit it is a hothouse plant.

Media can bring awareness and that, in Venezuela, was intense. But practice is a different thing...Radio was not used enough...Print was an underestimated medium.

SPECIAL REPORT

Santhals in Terror

Police firing on tribals protesting against exploitation by usurers in a Bihar village leaves 15 dead and several wounded

Fearful numbness has come over thousands of terror-stricken Santhals in Bihar's hill-dotted Sahibganj district. Ruthless oppression by a powerful mahajan (money-lender)-police clique has now given way to brute force: on 19 April, after a month of tension between the tribals and Dikus (the Santhal name for non-tribals), armed Bihar Military Police-men took up positions on either side of a road in the village of Banjhi, 11 kms from Sahibganj, to open fire on a mob of Santhals sporting bows and arrows. Twenty-five rounds were fired, killing 15 and injuring many. Among the dead was the revered Santhal leader and former Lok Sabha MP from the area, Father Anthony Murmu. Apparently, Father Murmu and Madan Murmu, another local tribal leader, had been called to the village panchayat bhavan by the district authorities for "talks" to pacify the mob. No one ever saw them again. Three days later on 22 April, the Santhals learnt that they had both "died in the trouble."

The tribals had been protesting against exploitation and a reign of terror unleashed on them by the local mahajan, Motiram Bhagat, whom they accused of killing one of their kinsmen from the nearby village, Savayya, and throwing his body into a pond. In a bid to avenge the murder, they had gone on the rampage, burning and demolishing a number of Bhagat's houses and the post office (where one of Bhagat's men worked) at one end of the village. It was open defiance that followed a bit laha —the Santhal edict to destroy a person's property as punishment for his crime against the tribe, a course the Santhals take to when they lose their faith in law.

The Santhals of Banjhi had been growing restive for quite some time. A series of quarrels between the Dikus and the district officials on one side and the Santhals on the other had led to occasional violence. The Santhals had been coming under increasing economic strain of late, thanks to a rather poor kharif crop and the Dikus' unscrupulous business practices. A number of them had been forced to mortgage their belongings to Motiram Bhagat. Tribal discontent over the poor prices the Dikus were offering for their forest produce—sal and kendu leaves and wood—had added to their woes. Besides, Motiram Bhagat had been unwilling to allow the Santhals to fish in the pond that had been auctioned to him by the administration.

For the tribals this was a cruel blow: normally, it is the practice for those who hold temporary ownership rights over stretches of the Ganga and tanks in Sahibganj to lift their catch just once or twice at the peak of the fishing season every year and allow the Santhals to fish in them for the rest of the time. This does not leave them with much fish. For a people who are so inextricably tied to nature and live as a part of it, fishing and shikar have a tremendous emotional appeal. And when Motiram Bhagat broke tradition by asserting his rights over the water the Santhals were furious. Eventually the Santhals were asked to fish in the southern end of the pond; the Santhals would not agree. They claimed he was trying to save their fish from them. So they moved up north and lowered their nets—only to find a decomposed corpse floating on the water. They immediately recognised it as Majhli Murmu, a eunuch from Savayya. The incensed tribals now say why Motiram Bhagat would not let them fish at the northern end which was thick with tall grass and jungle. It was probably he who had got Majhli murdered to steal the ornaments he wore and then threw his body into the water at the northern end where it could not be easily spotted. The call against exploitation now became a call for vengeance. The Dikus of Banjhi were boycotted, the Santhals refused to do any more business with them and would not allow them to hold the weekly haat—the mahajan's chief weapon of exploitation. They also wanted back all the property they had mortgaged to Motiram Bhagat free of cost.

At this point, the SDO Sahibganj, Harinarayan Prasad, intervened. He promised the Santhals that he would have their property returned free of cost. The Santhals consented. The SDO also provided fair price shop facilities to the Santhals for their weekly haat—without the Dikus. The Santhals had also demanded a ban on the sale and consumption of liquor in the haat. The SDO, surprised as he was, agreed immediately. But above all the Santhals wanted revenge on Motiram Bhagat for the murder of Majhli Murmu. And revenge they would have. A call was given to the Santhals of the area; the road from Sahibganj was blocked with felled sekua trees; and 10,000 hate-crazed tribals set out in a bid for justice. The police, however, had got to the village after removing the barricades—but not before a number of Bhagat houses had been burnt and destroyed. Soon gunfire met the tribals' bows and arrows and a number of them were felled. Panic spread and ever since the Santhals have been wary of vehicles coming to Banjhi with visitors. Most of them do not speak about what happened on 19 April—either pleading that they did not know Hindi or that they were not in the village at that time or that they did not step out during the day.

Ranju Marandy (25) lay back on his bed on the first floor of Sahibganj's ramshackle district hospital, staring blankly at the ceiling. A stoic silence is all he can offer to a newsman's queries. His thigh was hit by two bullets. His brother who stood by his bed spoke in broken Hindi, "Hum kutumb ja raha hai dekhta nahin hai ghar mein nahi rahta unnis tarikh ko (I was on my way to my in-laws on the 19th). "I was not in the village when it happened," said Chunda Murmu who was also hit by two bullets in his leg. Another old Santhal had his arm in a plaster.

The Santhal quarters of Banjhi—a village where the Santhals are completely segregated from the Dikus—some distance from the post office and the panchayat bhavan, close to where the Bhagats live, now wears an almost deserted look.

A little distance from the school, at Father Antony's residence, an eerie silence prevailed. The Santhal leader's widow, still shocked at her husband's death, also denies knowing anything about what took place on 19 April. "Babulal Soren was with him that day. He knows the full story," she replied in Santhali to a question from a local Congress(I) MP, Mr Embram.

There did not seem to be anyone around among the tribals willing to talk. Finally we traced them to the house of Jetha Murmu, the sarpanch of the village. We were greeted with cold stares. In the crowded room was Babulal Soren, who served as Father Murmu's bodyguard. His tone was excited: "It was just after 8 am on the

Shikhar Hansda of Kandar village, an old Santhal injured in the firing

19th. Both Father Murmu and I were with Sadiq Miya in the village bazar. We were discussing the impending trouble. Father Murmu said that if the trouble started it would be difficult to stop it. So it was best to nip it in the bud. So we walked back to Father Murmu's house. Father said that he would take a bath and he asked me to bathe too. But just then we could hear the dug-dugu (drumbeats), a sign of restlessness among the tribals. Father said we would bathe and go out and pacify the crowd which had already started collecting in the village. I went off home to bathe. But then three or four boys came and told me to accompany them to the gathering. They said they needed leaders. For the next two hours a massive crowd collected. People came from all the villages nearby. Then five of us went to the authorities in the panchayat bhavan to reason with them—Father Murmu, the sarpanch's brother Madan Murmu, two others and I from here. We told them that we did not want to fight. We discussed three points. The SDO asked Father Murmu what he wanted and why we had collected in such large numbers. Father said that three gunshots had rung out of Bhagat's house and some people had been hit. The SDO replied that they were not bullets but patakas. Father Murmu said he could prove what he was saying. At that time Gopal Bhagat, one of the dalals, entered the room. An altercation followed. The SDO was roughed up, Bhagat was thrown out of the room, our talk was over. We were about to leave. But all of a sudden without even warning us the police opened fire on the crowd outside. They trained their guns on the people as they stood defenceless. I felt a stab in my heart. People were being mowed down before we even realised what was happening. The police fired at least 60-70 shots. I ran away. People began running for their lives. I left Father Murmu and Madan there. I do not know what became of them after that. It was around 2 pm and then people ran home. Now no one even comes out. There is no haat any more. People do not go to the bazar. There will never be any more bazar in this village." The indignation was evident.

The SDO, Harinarayan Prasad had quite a different story to tell. The district official was obviously at pains to explain the killing of the 15 Santhals. The SDO said, "On the 25th when they were fishing in Motiram Bhagat's pond they found the body of an adivasi hijra in the water. When they saw the body they were convinced that Motiram had killed the hijra. They stopped fishing and went to the police station in Boreo and gheraoed the officer in-charge, R.P. Singh. A bit laha was done on Bhagat's house that day. While all this was going on we despatched an armed force and an executive magistrate to the village along with a DSP. It was a hatia day (a day of the haat). Excitement was running high. Some of the Santhals were attacked by a group of Dikus. But this fact came to my knowledge only on the 26th when I was negotiating with them (Santhals). This was because the Santhals had declared their intention to avenge the attack—they stuck up some sal leaves on a stick and waved it for all to see. This is a notice that trouble is coming. The waving of the leaves is followed by the sound of drumbeats. On the 26th I got to know that the tribals were gathering around 11.30 am. I spoke to the DC and SP and rushed to the spot. I found a crowd of about 5,000-6,000 of them gathered near the pond beside the Damin bungalow in the village. I stepped out of my car and walked straight into their midst.

" I reasoned with them after I got to the bungalow but they would not listen. Then I warned them that if they were bent on violence then their arrows and my bullets would ring out together. However, there were three people in the crowd, Father Murmu, Madan Murmu and the sarpanch, Jetha Murmu who knew what I was saying. Most of the others did not understand my Hindi. It was a communication problem; Jetha was helpful. But even as we negotiated the diggas were sounding. I was dragged later for 15-20 yards by the crowd. I realised they were going to do a bit laha of Bhagat's house in front of me. The rest of the police force were waiting for me in the panchayat bhavan. The Santhals were crying for revenge. Finally, I agreed to go with the Santhals to see the dead body. I said that they deserved their revenge if one of their tribe had been killed. This surprised them. They asked me to say this in writing. I agreed. They showed me the corpse of the sari-clad hijra floating in the pond. And I even wrote out an undertaking. But it was something quite different from what I had told them: it said that you adivasis have lost a member who was killed. If it is possible we will see that his killer is hanged. I also wrote that the pond belongs to the adivasis and they reserved the right to fish in it. Their ownership of the waters would later be regularised by a court order. They had also demanded that they would not hold their market with any Diku. I assured them of all assistance."

But even as Mr Prasad was busy making these concessions to appease the enraged Santhals, some of the tribesmen from adjoining villages came and told the Santhals of Banjhi that it would be cowardice to give in; if Motiram Bhagat had killed a Santhal he should be punished. So the diggas were sounded again. "The Santhals told me that they did not trust me. They said if one of their members could be killed in front of me, what protection could I offer them? I got furious. I told them I was no Mahatma. I could see what I could do for them. But they must let me go. They seemed satisfied." Mr Prasad later went around the village on 26 March with Jetha Murmu distributing money to those injured in the clashes with the Dikus. "To some I gave Rs 10 or Rs 20. I took four of them to Sahibganj hospital. The attendant of one of the four was a ferocious sort. He did not understand a word of Hindi. But when I brought them to Sahibganj and gave them food, he smiled at me. I thought the worst was over."

It was not. On the 29th, which was another haat day, Mr Prasad visited Banjhi again to see if the haat was going on well. "I helped the women sell their wares and buy their food. I supervised the whole operation. But I noticed that there were no Santhal men around. I asked the women where they were and I was told they were holding a meeting in Bara Raxhau. I rushed to the village. Diggas were sounding. But I was greeted there. They brought me a chair." Mr Prasad was told that the Santhals now wanted a haat. But not with Dikus of Banjhi but the Dikus of Savaya. What if they did not come to Banjhi. "No, we will call them," the Santhals told him. Mr Prasad agreed to provide ration shop facilities. He was also told that liquor would be banned from the market—its consumption and sale—and that the Santhals also wanted back all the belongings they had mortgaged to Motiram Bhagat. Mr Prasad worked out a compromise on the demands which the Santhals were happy with. "I will help you. Do not take the law into your own hands," he told them. He continued his visits to the Banjhi Bazar to see that nothing went wrong with the arrangements he had made.

On 15 April came what the authorities call the "provocation." At a largely attended public meeting in Raxhau village addressed by the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha (JMM) leader Sibu Soren, Masi Soren of Barhet, Father Anthony Murmu and Jetha Murmu, the Santhals were asked to close their ranks and fight for the tribal cause. Sibu Soren had allegedly told the gathering that Santhals in the region far outnumbered the Dikus, and that if all the Dikus were cut up and distributed, each Santhal would get "only a small piece of flesh."

Burnt house of a Diku

Sibu Soren himself does not deny having said this. Mr Prasad insists this was inflammatory language. Soren had also gone on to say that the Dikus were surviving only on the blood and sweat of Santhals and that the latter ought to strike back. The meeting had decided on an independent investigation into the trouble at Banjhi. Simon Marandy of the JMM was to file a report by 24-25 April. "On the 19th at about 11.00 am," said Mr Prasad, "I was informed that the road to Banjhi had been blocked and there had been some firing in the village. At 11.30 am we left Sahibganj. It took us two hours to reach the village where I saw flames shooting up from houses on the south side. The crowd in the marketplace was enormous. As we approached, three or four people from the crowd came menacingly towards me. I warned them to stop and retreat, but they would not listen. Arrows were flying in our direction. I asked the force to step back. Tear-gas shells were fired to cover up. There was a lathi charge. But this only brought down ten or twelve of them. What are lathis before arrows ? So I again sounded a warning and then ordered firing in four different directions to prevent the adivasis from surrounding us. The first five rounds were fired. Then another ten, followed by another ten. I ordered the police to aim at the men who were leading the adivasis. But it was only 10 minutes later that I realised that some people had been killed." A strange realisation indeed!

The dead include Anna Murmu (40) of Raxhau, Anthony Murmu (55), Madan Munshi Murmu (23) and Bara Bharwa (33) of Banjhi, Ishwar Murmu (55) and Kundao Soren (35) of Paharpur, Thakur Tudu, Dunuj Besra and Tribhuvan Marandy of Kari, Dukhna Tudu and Chunka Tudu of Savaya, Badgao Soren (20) of Kandar and Munshi Mavayya of Bara Kandwa. A number of them have left behind widows and children who are now anxiously awaiting a government decision on compensation, which till the time of filing this report was yet to be made. Even the chief minister and the inspector-general of police's visit to Banjhi was a sham from the beginning to the end: despite all the "concern" for the victims, not a single Santhal house was visited on 22 April when the two VIPs drove to the village and drove back. "We were all waiting to tell the chief minister our side of the story," said Jetha Murmu, "but he went back from the road near our side of the village."

ANALYSIS

The Hindu Dilemma in Punjab

By Harcharan Bains

We often tend to overlook the basic fact that no enduring solution to the Punjab tangle can ever be found without taking into consideration the Hindu psyche in the state. In trying to understand the community's viewpoint it would be worthwhile to have a quick look at the philosophy of Hinduism in so far as it can help restore a sense of sanity in the circumstances. This will also help us understand the genesis of the Hindu dilemma

As a creed, Hinduism is unmatched in cultural richness. It encompasses a boundless spirit of tolerance, an infinite moral and intellectual liberalism and an astounding capacity for reform. Only the religion of the ancient Greeks and Buddhism can touch the moral and spiritual wealth of Hinduism Since it sets itself no boundaries and is essentially ethereal in nature, it tends to spill across the bounds of other religions. It is in the nature of air that flows into vacuum wherever it finds one. It is due to this that religions built around exclusivity of beliefs sometimes react violently to the presence of Hinduism at close quarters.

Because of its essential openness, Hinduism has freely imbibed influences from other religions including Islam, Christianity and, lately, Sikhism However, at times, it has also fallen a prey to avoidable distortions in the faith Paradoxically, the Arya Samaj, for instance, while being admirable in its reformist zeal and bold in its progressive experimentalism, was at the same time the first really retrogressive development in Hinduism. It tried to throw this religion within set bounds and definitions Its emphasis on Hindu identity made Hinduism—perhaps, for the first time—a religion like any other Till then, it had transcended the narrow religious confines and had always been a living, ever-renewing culture that could take extreme opposites in its fold. The Arya Samaj stress on exclusivity and "repurification (shudhikaran)" ran counter to the healthy comprehensiveness of the Hindu creed. After the Arya Samaj movement, Hinduism became a distinct stance, a personality rather than a soul, a certain—if glorious—spiritual zone rather than an abiding immanence.

It is interesting to note that the Sikhs were among the first to embrace the Arya Samaj. But the marriage soon broke up, for some inexplicable reason, because the Sikhs began to be described as "Hindu derelicts" who needed to be purified and brought back into the Hindu fold The Arya Samaj's call—"back to the Vedas"—was inevitably accompanied by a glorification of the Sanskrit and the Hindi languages. The Hindu Punjabi's attitude to the Punjabi language is also attributable largely to the influence of this movement and the Sikh insistence on a separate identity also dates back to the same period

The Arya Samaj was perceived as a "danger" to the Sikh identity which was answered by an equally belligerent Singh Sabha movement. The Sabha tried to counter the Samajist "invasion" through an aggressive assertion of the Sikh culture. The two movements often clashed, producing acrimonious sparks of communal violence, though these were confined mainly to a violence of minds. The Samaj's less-than-charitable references to the Sikh Gurus and their scriptures were answered with equal vehemence by the Sabha followers. Neither was true. The Hindu-Sikh alienation today is a continuation of the Samaj Sabha acrimony. This particular phase of history has played havoc with the secular spirit of the region.

Fortunately, Arya Samaj is not Hinduism. It is only one strand of the spiritual tapestry of this creed in which pantheism and monotheism, idol worship and pure meditation happily coexist. Its liberal imagination is limitless and it is futile to try to set boundaries around it or even define it.

The question then is: Why does the Hindu Punjabi appear to be so unworthy of his religion? Why, of all the people, should a Hindu appear to be so intolerant, aggressive and insensitive to the feelings of his brethren from other communities? The answer lies not in bland communalism nor in hegemonistic majorityism. The attitudes and the historical factors that have shaped it need to be considered sympathetically.

We do not often understand the stress and strain of being a Hindu in Punjab. While the character of our national politics, except in the past few years, has remained generally secular with the communal Hindu parties being routed by Nehru's Congress which swore by genuine secularism, politics in Punjab has never freed itself from communal clutches. This was somewhat inescapable in view of the presence in the state of a strong religious minority and its fears of being absorbed into the dominant religion of the country. No one has ever tried to assure the Sikhs that their separate identity would be respected under all circumstances. The more the majority insists that Sikhism is not a separate religion, the greater the suspicion of the Sikh towards the motives of the majority community. This has led to a hardening of attitudes.

Some of the leaders of the Sikh community, especially in the Fifties, accused the country of a breach of trust with the community. Without going into the merits of such an accusation, one can make a guess about the impact of such an attitude on the Hindu Punjabi who has had to bear the brunt of the Sikh wrath against the centre.

The Hindu attitude to the Akali Dal, the main political party of the Sikhs, also needs to be understood sympathetically. To begin with, they complain that it never functions as a mere political party but as a religio-political front for the Sikhs. This charge is difficult to answer. In the circumstances, the other communities cannot be expected to identify themselves with the aspirations, struggles and ideologies of the party. The Hindu aloofness from the Dal is at least partly due to the Dal's own refusal to broaden its base to include the non-Sikhs. Even the intelligent and liberal Sikhs sometimes feel left out of the political mainstream of the community. The Dal should adopt an attitude by which the great secular tenets of the Sikh religion are properly projected. It can indeed be done without the Akali Dal having to change its essential character as a Punjabi or even a religious party. Fortunately, the Dal has enough secular nerve in its composition to achieve this. Indeed, it has often done so in the past. One should not refuse to acknowledge that at some crucial moments, the Dal has really transcended narrow religiosity. A very recent instance was their offer to launch a morcha jointly with the Hindus in Punjab to protect the cow immediately after the "beef tallow scandal"—that is, in a period marked by uncommon communal frenzy in the state. That made the gesture all the more admirable.

But the gesture was lost in the all-enveloping darkness of communal killings. The tension and insecurity of the Hindu Punjabis during those days account for their new-found arrogance now. They lived through three years of near-encounter with death and find it hard to forget their travails. This is understandable. But they should also remember that a large number of Sikhs got killed simply because they refused to adopt a communal attitude towards their Hindu brethren. A Sikh layman reacts with horror even today at the prospect of innocent people being killed. This is why the state, especially the Sikh-dominated countryside, remained free from communal riots when extremism was at its height.

The trouble now is that our perceptions have been ravaged by the disturbing nature of recent events: When eyes are bloodshot, the vision is narrow. If we get over our fanatical agitation and try to understand each other's problems with a compassionate approach, the solutions will be much simpler than we think. All we need is the courage to confess our mistakes and the vision to understand the reasons for those of others.

Take the language question, for example. The Hindu attitude to the Punjabi language needs to be understood in the proper perspective. It is not as if no Hindu reads or writes Punjabi. On the contrary, many of them have voluntarily opted for the language as a vehicle of serious expression. Anyone familiar with the trends in modern Punjabi literature will bear out that the Hindu contribution to the language is immense. It was a Hindu—Shiv Kumar Batalvi—who lifted this language out of its seeming limitations and restored to it its totally world-class richness. The way the Punjabi language blossomed and expanded at the touch of Batalvi is something all Sikhs are proud of. One of the greatest Punjabi playwrights is again a Hindu: Balwant Gargi. One of the most popular Punjabi folk songsters—Nand Lal Nurpuri—was also a Hindu. Again, it is not as though these are stray instances. The number of Hindus writing in Punjabi is nearly as large as that of the Sikhs doing the same. Amitoz, Dhani Ram Chatrik, I. C. Nanda, R. L. Ahuja, Lala Kirpal Sagar, Kripa Sagar, Bhushan, Lok Nath, Prem Kumar, Kanwar Chauhan, Ram Saroop Ankhi, Niranjan Sharma, K. L. Garg, Paritosh Gargi, Pritam Dass, Charan Dass,

Forgotten past: Hindu and Sikh youths on the streets together in Amritsar

Parkash Sathi—the list is endless. Can one really doubt the outstanding contribution of the Hindu writers to modern Punjabi literature and language? Sometime back, the SGPC honoured Asha Bhonsale for her rendition of the Sikh Gurbani. The Punjabi theatre is being served with a missionary zeal by two young Hindu experimentalists, Ashwani Chatley and Tripta. These are just a handful of examples of how the Punjabi Hindus have done their mother-tongue, Punjabi, proud.

This, of course, is not to gloss over the ill-advised attitude of some members of the Hindu Punjabi community who refuse to own Punjabi as their language. They are unable to give one good reason for their attitude and, consequently, they emerge communal. It is for them to do something to rebut this charge. In mentioning Hindi as their mother-tongue in the census records, these people were guilty of an outrageous lie (they know it too) and they do not even have a good enough reason for it. In addition, the exercise is self-defeating. Perhaps, it was due to an emotional attachment to Sanskrit, but how many of them have taken the trouble to learn, to read, write, speak or even understand Sanskrit?

Initially, it was born of an opposition to Punjab being reduced to a Sikh-majority area. But, ironically, by refusing to register themselves as Punjabi-speaking people, these elements ensured a communal redemarcation of the state. Had all of them spoken the truth about their mother-tongue, the vast Punjabi-speaking but Hindu-dominated areas now left outside Punjab would have remained with it, thus ensuring a Hindu majority in the new Punjab. Communalism can indeed backfire.

The language syndrome has another pitfall. By insisting on Hindi as their mother-tongue, some Hindus unwittingly bestowed on the Sikhs the status of a full-fledged separate cultural unit, something they themselves refuse to acknowledge now. The attitude also helped the protagonists of the "Sikhs-are-a-separate-nation" doctrine, because they could then claim to have clinched an important item of separation from the Hindu religion. The cultural alienation of the Sikhs from Hinduism was completed by the refusal of some Hindus to share a common language with the former.

But at the same time, it is necessary to view this attitude against the background of strong ethno-centrism of the Sikhs. Perhaps, in reaction to the proselytising mission of the Arya Samaj, the Sikhs shrank away from Hinduism into ever-diminishing boundaries. There was a time when, in essence, Sikhism was the only religion of Punjab with the Hindus being the Sehajdhari Sikhs. Many a Hindu family looked upon Guru Nanak and the Holy Granth as parts of their own cultural heritage. It was the custom for many Hindu families to have their eldest male child christened a Sikh. The two religions often overlapped producing a glowing cultural harmony.

Unfortunately, all this is now a thing of the past. The greatness of a religion should be judged by the degree to which it is acceptable to those belonging to other faiths. By this yardstick both religions pass the test handsomely but their followers do not. The Sikh religion, in its purest essence, towers above all the rest in secular appeal. It has been found to be acceptable to such mutually-antagonistic communities as the Hindus and the Muslims.

In fact, the Sikh religion is, more than anything else, a mission against the division of societies on the basis of religious beliefs. Guru Gobind Singh made a creed of spiritual catholicity describing the variety of religions as "merely a product of environmental differences." He went to great lengths to explain that his fight was not against Islam or any religion but only against "some policies of a king misled by a caucus." He showed a healthy respect for Islam and reminded his Muslim adversary that the latter was deviating from Islam. Such magnanimity to one's sworn enemy and such clarity of vision about the actual issues at stake is very rare in world history, especially in the history of religions. It was no wonder, then, that a large number of Muslims also joined the Guru's ranks.

This catholicity, this clarity of vision regarding our actual problems is missing today. There is nothing wrong with a Hindu revivalism or a Sikh revivalism as long as its pursuit is directed towards what Dr Radhakrishnan calls "discovery of the profound in the universe. The most profound is the most unique, and the most unique is the most universal.' The uniqueness of each religion is nothing objectionable. Consider the Gita: "Better is death in one's own religion than life in another's/The religion of another brings danger." Or, take Swami Vivekananda, for example. "The Christian is not to become a Hindu or a Buddhist, nor a Hindu or a Buddhist to become a Muslim. But each must assimilate the spirit of the other and yet preserve his individuality and grow according to his own law of growth." Is this separatism? Let the Hindu respect the Sikh identity and let the Sikh harness this identity towards making India the envy of nations the world over.

This is merely to say that the need of the hour is not a Hindu or a Sikh revival but a cultural revival in which respect for truth is placed above loyalty to a narrow interpretation of one's religion. People who sacrifice truth for religion can sacrifice religion for communalism and community for their own selfish ends. A person who is not honest about truths and facts is irreligious.

First, let us be honest to facts in Punjab. The Hindus in Punjab have a point when they protest that their Sikh brethren have been presenting the state's case in strictly religious terms; all in the name of keeping politics and religion together. In order to understand their views one should imagine the existence of a strong ethnocentric Hindu political party operating from the premises of the Durgian Temple in Amritsar as its headquarters and using a strong religious terminology in presenting Punjab's case. It is interesting to consider how the other communities would react to it. To the Sikhs who are basically a religio-political community, the mixture of religion and politics seems a natural enough combination. But it will be educative to reflect on the possible fate of the nation if all religions start using the same mix. In fact, this has already started happening and the Sikhs have been at the receiving end of its impact. In a communalised atmosphere, the arithmetic of democracy will always work to the disadvantage of the minorities. Therefore, it is even more important for the minorities that politics be secularised.

Perhaps, the peculiar nature of Akali politics also poses as a stumbling block for the Hindus in understanding the Sikh viewpoint as essentially sane and rational. As a political party, the Akalis are subject to the dynamics of democracy in which every party has to face rough and abrasive criticism. Unfortunately, because of a confusion between their religious and political identities, any criticism of the Akalis appears to hit the religious sensitivities of the Sikhs. This is not to suggest that parties based on religion should be disbanded, but their roles in the two capacities should be clearly demarcated to avoid confusion. Thus, while it is perfectly right for the Akalis to launch a morcha for the redressal of grievances of the community from the Harimandir Sahib, agitations on political aspirations in which they want other communites and parties to support them may have better chances of success if they are launched from a secular platform. The Akalis should not find it difficult to work it out, since their political integrity and belief in secular ideals can never be doubted, regardless of the propaganda against them.

The Hindus in Punjab suffer from a minority psychosis. It is a strange kind of a psychological phenomenon in which they sometimes do and sometimes don't accept their minority status. Because of their emotional attachment to their creed sprawling across the length and breadth of the country, they find it difficult to accept with grace their inevitable status as a minority community in Punjab. But the charge that the Hindu Panjabis' attitude to the state is colonial or that they are mere time-servers is so much nonsense. Perhaps, some of them may have thought of moving out of Punjab just as some Sikhs have had to migrate to Punjab under similar tensions. But, by and large, no Punjabi can help being proud of his state. Emotionally and culturally, a Hindu Punjabi has more in common with his Sikh neighbours than with his coreligionists from other parts of the country. This becomes amply clear when the two meet each other outside the state. Punjabi sub-nationalism like Tamil sub-nationalism is a strong enough sentiment to embrace people from different communities, including the Muslims.

The Hindus in Punjab suffer from a minority psychosis. It is a strange kind of psychological phenomenon in which they sometimes do and sometimes don't accept their minority status.

The main problem of the Hindu Punjabi is that there is no one to articulate his privations in a plausible but non-communal way. As a result, his pent-up stress often explodes in communal aggressiveness The plethora of militant Hindu organisations in the state has done more harm than good to the Hindu Punjabi. The militant communalism of these organisations tarnishes the image of the common Hindu as much as that of his Sikh compatriots. Quite unnecessarily, a Hindu Punjabi is asked to prove that he is not a traitor to Punjab.

When a Hindu Punjabi goes out of the state, he often finds his Punjabi background somewhat of a handicap. This fact needs to be understood by the Sikhs. An educated Hindu Punjabi told me recently, "Outside Punjab they hate us because we are Punjabis. Here you hate us because we are Hindus. Where should we go?" He had a point. In speaking about his anguish, he also neatly summed up the Hindu dilemma in Punjab. The answer to his question lay, perhaps, in that while the Sikhs should do something to stop the Hindus from feeling like "hostages", a Hindu himself should be more a Punjabi than a Hindu. And both should understand that their common state binds them together more strongly than their separate religions can divide them.

The recent controversy over Punjab being merged with neighbouring states is likely to lead to a fresh spate of communal tension in the state. The idea is fraught with dangers and we must be vigilant against its disruptive implications. The militant Hindu organisations in the state have rushed to welcome it knowing full well that this will only deepen the wounds of their Sikh brethren. It is one thing for all of us to campaign for the national good but it is strange for a Punjabi always to be seen advocating the case of other states against Punjab, as some trouble-mongers are doing now. Its impact on the fractured social fibre of the state could be disastrous.

They allege that the Sikhs want to make Punjab a Sikh-dominated area. Of course, what they do not clearly say is that, conversely, they want to make it a Hindu-dominated area. Perhaps, in national interest and in keeping with the secular ideals that we preach, no one should really act horrified if one or two states in the country remain Hindu-minority areas. This is why the merger idea, aimed clearly against Punjab, should be resisted especially by those Hindus who want to convince the minorities that India is not a Hindu rashtra and that the dominant community of the country is not bent on crushing the minorities wherever they have a chance to enjoy political power within the Indian Union

A special responsibility rests on the Hindu Punjabis and the Sikhs. Otherwise, in the welter of confused and confusing factors, both will manage to get themselves misunderstood, especially if they continue to let communal elements speak for them. They need to do justice to the endearing freshness of the state's magnificent culture. The fields of Punjab and its skies are open enough for various religious sects, beliefs and aspirations to breathe and flourish in. We need to resurrect the traditional Punjabi cosmopolitanism. The future of India is being shaped in Punjab.

Shireesh Kanekar of Syndicated Press profiles a singing phenomenon

Chalte Chalte
Merey Yeh Geet Yaad Rakhna

Kabhie Alvida Na Kehna

And so shall it be. Even though at 56 Kishore Kumar has finally taken his leave of the tiresome routine of Bombay's fast-paced film world, for the millions he has regaled for decades, on and off the screen, as comedian, hero, and melodramatist, he will be an unforgettable face and voice. The man whose songs were on the lips of every schoolboy and collegegoer for years, the only singer who could withstand the mighty Mohammad Rafi wave has finally decided to settle down to a quieter life in his native place Khandwa in Madhya Pradesh with his fourth wife Leena Chandavarkar and second son Sumeet. According to him, he has had just about "enough of films."

The announcement did not raise many eyebrows in the world of film music. The reason: the industry does not take the man seriously. Even the most shocking statements are not beyond him. People in the industry say Kishore Kumar had once angrily declared that he would not sing for Amitabh Bachchan because the superstar had failed to make a guest appearance in one of the films he produced. This time, however, both his wife and son are convinced that he has called it a day. When this correspondent sought an interview, Kishore Kumar was as evasive as ever. His elder son, Ameet Kumar, was more forthcoming. "Well," he said on the telephone, "my dad will retire after a couple of months once he completes all his assignments, including two of his own films which are on the floor. He will continue to sing in concerts in India and abroad. He will also record a few songs."

So, it will be a partial retirement for today's most sought after male playback singer—the only one to have made a comeback. Before one Aradhana (1969) was made, Kishore Kumar was an actor who sang his own songs for the films he acted in. After Aradhana, his voice became the voice of every hero. Three leading lights of the Hindi screen, Dev Anand, Rajesh Khanna and Amitabh Bachchan, owe their success partly to him. While Kishore Kumar has been singing for Dev Anand for long, Rajesh Khanna became a box office hit with the song "Mere sapnoki rani" and Amitabh Bachchan with the popular "Khaike paan Banaraswala."

How does one describe his singing voice? If Rafi's was metallic, Manna Dey's trained, Talat Mehmood's silky and Mukesh's melancholic, then Kishore Kumar's voice was versatile. But this was the same epithet people used for the voice of Mohammad Rafi. If Rafi was ever given a ghazal, a geet, a qawali or a bhajan to sing, he showed his proficiency equally with each. But Kishore Kumar appealed to fans of all sexes, age groups and social strata.

It was, however, strange to witness Kishore Kumar slipping back to the position of an also-ran at a time when Rafi was getting more offers than he could cope with. In fact, the film industry dealt with the two singers quite unpredictably. After a long stint, Rafi was unceremoniously ignored and sidelined and replaced by Kishore Kumar. Aradhana was a watershed in two careers: it marked the emergence of Rajesh Khanna as an actor and the reemergence of Kishore Kumar as a singer. People seemed unconcerned about the fact that there were singers like S.D. Burman, who had better records than Kumar. Aradhana was a hit, and with it, Kishore Kumar's versatile voice.

S.D. Burman once said of him, "His singing style is simple. He has no qualms about it. He gives every bathroom singer an impression that if he ever was to sing, he could sing like Kishore. Nothing could be further from the truth. But the reason why Kishore is stupendously successful and popular is because a common man can easily identify with his voice." Composer Anil Biswas, one of Kishore Kumar's ardent admirers, feels the same. In the late Sixties, Biswas had declared that Kumar was the best singer of the day. Not everyone agreed. But then he went on to add that Rafi was a "Bhendi bazar singer" without a seasoned voice. This infuriated Rafi's numerous fans. There was an uproar. Eventually, Kumar was forced to say that he was himself an admirer of Rafi, and he had been shocked by what Biswas had said.

There are others who dislike Kumar. Sajjad Hussain, a temperamental music director said, "Kishore can't sing. If you want to call somebody walking on the opposite footpath, he has the kind of voice you need to yell at him. I don't know why he sings." But the industry has never paid attention to Hussain's comments. (It was Hussain who once said in praise of Lata Mangeshkar, "Lata gaati hai, baaki sabroteyhai," meaning only Lata sings, the rest weep.)

Surprisingly, most composers found Kishore Kumar at his best when he recorded songs which he was to render on the screen himself. Anil Biswas in Fareb, Sajjad Hussain in Ruksana, C. Ramachandra in Asha, O.P. Nayyar in Naya Andaz, Shankar-Jaikishen in Rangoli and Madan Mohan in Bhai Bhai, all relied on Kishore. The results were delightful. Even the late S.D. Burman, in the days before Aradhana was made, always used Kishore Kumar to sing for Dev Anand.

It was in 1948 that Kishore Kumar started singing for films. Among his first film songs was Marney ki duwaye kyon mangu, composed by the late Khemchand Prakash for the film Ziddi. It was the first time Kumar had lent his voice to Dev Anand. The association lasted. Kishore's acting, however, was never taken much notice of. His desire to become a singing star like K.L. Saigal remained a dream.

The three brothers: (from l to r) Anup, Ashoke and Kishore Kumar

Nobody can sum up Kishore the way his dada (elder brother) Ashok Kumar can: "He is a freak. Look, I have studied classical music and he hasn't. But see where he has reached with his music. He knows his soor by intuition. This is not to suggest that he didn't work hard for his success."

Kishore Kumar composed the music for all the films he has made, except the first, Chalti ka Naam Gaadi. But today, even as a man with a large number of hits to his credit, Kishore still cannot write musical notations. As an actor, he brought rare spontaneity, humour and individual charm to the roles he played. Early in his career, he was branded a comedian, and in order to escape being stereotyped, he started making more sober films. It was a desperate attempt to change his image, but it failed. The audiences were not interested in seeing him try his hand at glum-faced roles. His comic appearances, too, were none too popular; the audience had learnt to expect only buffoonery. Often, he would be jeered at if he played a serious role. Even in Hrishikesh Mukherjee's award-winning film Musafir, in which he acted as an unemployed youth, Kishore's work went unappreciated—because it wasn't funny.

Kishore did not ever plan his career. He took roles when they were offered to him He was never choosy about his heroines. Working with actresses like Meena Kumari and Madhubala did not prevent him from acting opposite unknown heroines.

Although he had worked in the industry for over three decades, Kishore Kumar never really belonged to it: he jealously guarded his privacy, which made him inaccessible. With Raaj Kumar, he is one of the most eccentric persons in the film world. A tabalchi (drummer) once recalled the moment when the singer walked in for a recording with a toothbrush in his mouth. A leading arranger narrated a story of how Kishore had come late to a recording once, aped the composer, conducted the orchestra, walked out of the studio and driven back home. He is also said to speak rather loudly over the telephone, and set his dogs on uninvited visitors. People often said "he has gone mad." One person who does not agree is Lata Mangeshkar, who has known him since 1948 when she first sang a duet with him: "Nonsense. He is as sane and sensible as any other person."

Battle for Freedom

On 9 May 1857, 85 sepoys at Meerut were punished for refusing to accept greased cartridges on religious grounds. The next day, their compatriots rose in revolt and released them from prison. That triggered off the bloody uprising of 1857. The notion that religious prejudices alone fuelled the sepoy mutiny could not be further from the truth, writes Bhola Chatterji

A century had rolled by since Plassey and few Englishmen, and still fewer Indians, could even imagine that the wretched sepoy might rise in rebellion against an empire on which the sun did not set. Yet that was precisely what the sepoy did when, on 10 May 1857, he hailed Bahadur Shah II as emperor. And the sepoy did it for freedom. No matter how one looks at it, in 1857, "the people of India", as K. M. Panikker observed, "made one last effort on a national scale to recover their freedom."

That urge for freedom was the basic factor which motivated the 1857 struggle is too obvious to be disputed. To suggest that religious prejudice, symbolised by the controversy over cartridges smeared with the fat of the cow or the pig (the one taboo to the Hindu and the other to the Muslim) provoked the sepoy to set the Ganga on fire would be utterly ridiculous. Benjamin Disraeli, the Prime Minister of England, surely knew what he was talking about when he said, on 21 July 1857, in the House of Commons that the "decline and fall of empires are not affairs of greased cartridges. Such results are occasioned by adequate causes, and by an accumulation of adequate causes."

Nothing could be more correct than this. There were causes rooted deep in the soil that led to the 1857 uprising. Indians were in a despondent mood and they intensely resented the way the white man was going about his business. It did not escape the notice of whoever, black, brown or white, had not set his face against the hard facts of life. In the words of a British army officer, "there was, we repeat, in India at the time of the outbreak of the mutiny, such a breathless suspense and smothered excitement of inward feeling, among all the natives, as to what they should really do, that no human being can now at this distance of time ever realise the pent-up picture of insecurity ..that was written on every countenance. The tidal wave of the aroused feelings of a mighty nation hung as it were in the balance, not knowing exactly which way to flow. Whether it should still revert in fidelity to Great Britain...or break loose. .from the domineering spirit of haughtiness that had so long trampled upon all that was sacred to it, was, at the moment, what no man in India dared with certainty predict."

The army on the move with elephants

Britain was racing against time to consolidate its gains that had started piling up since fate and circumstances thrust Robert Clive into the possession of the subcontinent. It was in a hurry to beat into shape an empire and just did not have time to bother about the reactions of those that did not belong to the charmed circle of the recipients of largesse from it. At this stage the empire-builders were impervious to what the Indian thought and felt. They hardly took any notice of the Indian who tilled the land, slaved on the indigo plantation and for a pittance undertook to do the donkeywork for them. The white man took it for granted that India had never known what freedom was, that the Indian was unaccustomed to any existence other than that of a helot. The exhaustion of the people, their apparent servility and the demonstrative gratitude of the emerging English educated middle class convinced the Englishman that nothing could go wrong with the empire.

Unmindful of the fact that India also had a tradition of civilisation, of freedom, of rational polity, the British fondly believed, some honourable exceptions apart, that Indians were all a bunch of evil men who remained immersed in the darkness of ignorance, superstition and bigotry. They had to be rescued from this ungodly existence. Moreover, they had to be acquainted with the benign ideas of Western enlightenment. The rulers had convinced themselves that they were on a mission civilisatrice.

The Indian thought otherwise. He had reached the end of his tether. His patience with the intruders had exhausted and he was not particularly careful to hide it. Across the subcontinental landmass evidence kept accumulating that clearly pointed to the direction in which the wind was blowing. The Santhal rebellion and the Mopala agitation in 1855, the ferment in Oudh, and the raj's armed confrontation with the Rohillas and the Gumsurs in the Deccan and Madras respectively were only the tip of the iceberg, nine-tenths of which remained submerged. If British rule imposed a measure of superficial peace in certain areas of the country it also brought in its train the odious consequences of colonialism. There were not many takers of the idea that imperialism was the "main process by which civilisation has been diffused."

The perceptive observer could hardly fail to see that the Indians were arguing as to which method they should adopt to get rid of the British. There were "two models of political change...current in India at that time. One was the original Hindu and Muslim model" that would have the white man forcibly thrown out of the country. The other was the English educated Indian's "new and improved model" that would persuade the Briton to smoothen the country's passage ultimately to "constitutional self-government."The two sides, the native and the intruder, seemed to stand eyeball to eyeball and it was a question of time before they would clash.

A hard look at the political scene in the years between 1757 and 1857 would indicate that British rule was no substitute for peace, progress and stability. It would be idle to expect that the colonial masters came to this country only to do its children a good return. The frills and trappings on the fringe apart, British rule was given as unabashedly to tyranny and exploitation as any colonial rule anywhere. Even after nearly one hundred years of British rule this is what some missionaries had to say: "In many districts of Bengal, neither life nor property is secure, that gang-robberies of the most daring character are perpetrated annually in great numbers, with impunity, and that there are constant scenes of violence...the rural population of Bengal...commonly live in a state of poverty and wretchedness, produced chiefly by the present system of landed tenures and the extortion of zamindars, aggravated by the inefficiency and the cruelties of the peace-officers."

Comments are unnecessary. Nor would it serve our present purpose to dwell at length on the nature of British rule in the years preceding the uprising. Evidence could be marshalled in support of the observation that the British did not unoften put to shame the so-called oriental despot.

The fact that 1857 was a non-event in Bengal did not indicate so much the success of British arms as that of the good Lords Cornwallis and Macaulay, the authors of the Permament Settlement and English education respectively. As Lord Bentinck put it, "If security was wanting against the popular tumult or revolution, I should say that the Permanent Settlement, though a failure in many other respects and in most important essentials, has this great advantage, at least, of having created a vast body of rich landed proprietors deeply interested in the continuance of the British dominion."

And the basic objective of the English system of education was, according to Macaulay, to create a class of brown sahibs who would operate as "interpreters between us and the millions whom we govern." The Permanent Settlement, English education and all that went with them had persuaded their beneficiaries that the liquidation of British rule would be detrimental to their interests. The fear that a successful termination of the rebellion would bring back Muslim rule inhibited Bengal from casting in its lot with the sepoys.

The 1857 struggle was an attempt at national liberation. It is just that the dramatis personae came from the feudal nobility and that the circumstances obliged them to rely on force to achieve freedom.

The Bengalis were apprehensive because, according to Bepin Pal, they "belonged to a generation that had seen and suffered from the anarchy and disorder of immediate pre-British rule." The establishment of British rule was supposed to have brought about qualitative changes in the situation and the Bengalis did not want that to be disturbed. Thanks to the Permanent Settlement and English education, Bengal had come to enjoy certain privileges which it loathed to risk.

It would call for a particularly warped view of history to suggest that the 1857 struggle was essentially an affair of the sepoys who had grievances of a private nature and with whom the remnants of feudalism had made common cause. There was no centralised organisation, enlightened leadership, mass participation nor any feeling of nationalism. The entire business was feudalism's last fling at recovering its lost land. As such it did not deserve Bengal's involvement.

Without going into any detailed argument it may be said that the rebellion had mass participation in a large number of places, a national leadership, though loosely constituted,and that the sepoys and their leaders readily vowed their loyalty to the rightful but dispossessed claimant to the Delhi throne. The leadership doubtless was provided by the feudal nobility. But should this be enough to merit rejection of the struggle, despite the then obtaining social, economic and political conditions, then the freedom struggles of many other countries, not excluding those of 19th century Poland, would have to be similarly treated.

In this connection one may recall what the Hindoo Patriot, established in 1853 and edited by Harish Chandra Mukherjee, the first Indian to distinguish himself as a journalist, from 1854 till his death in 1861, observed on 21 May 1857: "It is no longer a mutiny, but a rebellion. Perhaps, it will be said that all mutinies, when they attain a certain measure of success, rise to the dignity of rebellion. But the recent mutinies of the Bengal army have one peculiar feature—they have from the very beginning drawn the sympathy of the country. The sepoys...have hazarded all their most valuable interests; and their countrymen view them as martyrs to a holy cause and a great national cause. The mutineers have been joined and sided by the civil population .There is not a single native of India who does not feel the full weight of the grievances imposed upon him by the very existence of British rule in India—grievances inseparable from subjection to a foreign power.. At present, the conviction is ineradicably strong in the mind of every native—save the small circle in Bengal of those who have been indoctrinated into the mysteries of European civilisation—that the British government is actuated by a fixed purpose of destroying the religion of the native races and of converting them to Christianity."

The 1857 struggle was an attempt at national liberation. It is just that the dramatis personae came from the feudal nobility—who would deny that the "first blow to the French monarchy proceeded from the nobility"—and that the circumstances obliged them to rely on force to achieve freedom.

BYELECTIONS

A Congress(I) Debacle

A much-needed boost for the opposition

From the Lok Sabha poll to the Assembly elections in 11 states to the byelections held in April,the Congress(I)'s fortunes seem to be following a pattern of diminishing returns.The euphoria created by the triumph in the Lok Sabha, when Rajiv Gandhi bettered the record of Jawaharlal Nehru and Indira Gandhi and in the process battered the opposition, did not last ten weeks. When the Assembly polls wereheld, the non-Congress(I) parties had more than made up for the lost ground. In the April elections, which too were held on a national scale, with 26 Assembly and four Lok Sabha seats being contested over as many as 11 states, the Congress(I) has taken yet another drubbing.

Only seven of the 26 Assembly seats have been won by the party. While the non-Congress(I) parties have held their ground in Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka and West Bengal (where the respective ruling parties have swept the poll), the Congress(I)'s showing can best be illustrated by the fact that the party was humbled at Khurda, a seat which had been won by Orissa chief minister Janaki Ballabh Patnaik in the last poll. (Mr Patnaik had won two seats, the byelection was caused by his resignation.) If chief minister J.B.Patnaik could not make the party retain a seat which he himself had won in March, then the less said about the influence of the ruling party in Orissa, the better.

Of course, in Rajasthan, after the good showing of the non-Congress(I) parties in the Assembly poll, the Congress(I) can take solace from its victory at Amber. The BJP leader, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat had won from Amber, but as he too had won two seats, elections had to be held again here. This small jubilation apart, the party's performance has been dismal. It has won two seats in Rajasthan and one each in Madhya Pradesh, Orissa, Uttar Pradesh and Bihar.

The Janata Party, which had emerged as the second largest national party (in terms of seats won and representation in number of states) after the Assembly poll, has won six Assembly and one Lok Sabha seat this time, thereby keeping up its number two position. The BJP has won a seat in Rajasthan and wrested the Bareilly seat from the Congress(I), defeating a former minister, Ram Singh Khanna. The Left Front's supremacy in West Bengal, the Telugu Desam's reign over Andhra Pradesh and the Janata Party's dominance in Karnataka have been reaffirmed bythe byelection results.

One opposition stalwart who has proved his standing and shown the effectiveness of United Front politics is Congress(S) president Sharad Pawar. After the Congress (Socialist)-led Progressive Democratic Front (PDF) emerged as a strong opposition party in the Maharashtra Assembly and elected Pawar as the floor leader, he resigned the Baramati Lok Sabha seat. While doing so, he proved his commitment to unity of opposition parties by letting the Janata Party contest the byelection on behalf of the PDF. The victory of Sambhajirao Kakade from Baramati is not only a personal triumph for Sharad Pawar but also an affirmation of the people's faith in United Front politics, provided the Front partners show political maturity. The Baramati results will have far reaching implications in the years to come. For one, an effective United Front approach, as opposed to a "one party-one flag-one symbol" approach may be the guiding spirit of opposition politics from now on. Moreover, the "dominant party" theory, which was the bane of non-Congress(I) party unity talks prior to the Lok Sabha poll, has received a setback, thanks to the commitment shown by the Congress(S). Apart from these, being the prominent leader of a major state like Maharashtra and a contemporary of Rajiv Gandhi in terms of age, Sharad Pawar's Baramati triumph is bound to be reflected on a national scale soon.

Sharad Pawar

The opposition parties(that is how the non-Congress-I parties have to be referred to in the national context) are in a state of total disarray. The debacle for the Congress(I), therefore, has to be seen as a sign of weakness within the party. The slow but sure erosion of the party's image is too evident: the diminishing returns in terms of recent poll performances speak for themselves. The prices have been steadily rising. The wavering over Punjab—the blow hot, blow cold approach—has given away the mazboot hai haath, akhand hai desh(the "hand" is strong, the nation is united) image. The tragedy of the 400-plus verdict of the Lok Sabha elections is that the Congress(I) cannot even fall back on the "strengthen the hand" slogan. The electorate had given the "hand" strength beyond the imagination of Congress(I) leaders themselves. What is needed today is a show of quick results. The spy case has blown over; the trial is being held in camera. Showbusiness may be good for sometime, but people want results.

Even more disquieting than the recent poll results are the signs of disenchantment within the ruling party. It is common knowledge among the political elite now that in March, 109 Congress(I) MPs met at the residence of a former union minister and openly criticised the functioning of the party. A close aide of the Prime Minister was the target of attack. Inaccessibility to the powers-that be is the major complaint of the party MPs. A number of old faces were dropped from Parliament and the Assemblies during the weeding out done at the time of distribution of tickets. This has also led to disenchantment in the party. The Anti-Defection Act may be able to control the elected representatives, but the party discontent can come to the forefront during the party meetings. The victory of J.K.Jain in the parliamentary party elections despite orders to defeat him is an ominous pointer. Rajiv Gandhi has to look beyond old school ties, if the popular mandate given to him has to be effective.

Uncompromising Akalis

Sant Longowal makes capital on Delhi visit

Sant Longowal

The day Prakash Singh Badal was brought to Chandigarh, the Akali Dal president Sant Harchand Singh Longowal was in New Delhi, making his first scheduled visit to the capital after almost a year. Immediately after his release in March, he had passed through the capital but that was only during transit to Amritsar. This three day trip to New Delhi which began on 26 April had more political significance attached to it. Longowal had come to "see and share the grief of the Sikhs" in the areas affected by the riots following the assassination of Indira Gandhi on 31 October 1984. He was also, during the course of his stay in the capital to speak at several important places including the Delhi University, the Jawaharlal Nehru University and the India International Centre, on what he thought of the situation in Punjab. It was expected therefore that Longowal's visit would be a statement of the Akali Dal's policy in the light of the latest developments itself. Major issues, it was claimed would be cleared up by the visit.

The tone was set within an hour of Longowal's arrival in New Delhi on the evening of 26 April at the house of Trilochan Singh Sarna at Punjabi Bagh in West Delhi. Amidst slogans of "Longowal zindabad" and "Raj karega Khalsa" Surinder Singh, the head ragi of the Durbar Sahib said, "Satwant Singh and Beant Singh are the saviours of the Sikh community .They killed the wicked sinner(Indira Gandhi)." He later went on to compare them to Bhakt Pralhad and said that Satwant Singh and Beant Singh had come down as God's chosen angels to rescue the Sikh community in distress. Continuing in the same vein, Surinder Singh warned that anybody who tried to harm the Sikhs would face the same fate as "that wicked sinner."

When Longowal got up to speak to the packed gathering in the Punjabi Bagh Singh Sabha gurdwara, he only took over where Surinder Singh had left off. "The time has come," he said "for the Sikh community to prepare for its third great battle." The first two had been fought with the Mughals and the British. Now the Sikhs must fight the "Delhi Takht," which had according to him, become prejudiced against the community and branded it secessionist and terrorist. He had a long list of complaints to make

Speaking in detail about the contributions of the Sikh community in the country, he said that they had sacrificed the most for the country: during the partition, during the wars that the nation has fought and even in peace. But he regretted that the "Dilli Sarkar" had now "systematically branded the same community as extremist and anti-Indian." He urged the Sikhs to fight this. His speech was also an indirect endorsement of whatever Surinder Singh had said before him for he made no attempt to counter or criticise the vitriolic speech of Surinder Singh. Every word of his was applauded by the people listening to him.

Sant Longowal also endorsed Gurcharan Singh Tohra's stance that the Akal Takht, destroyed during Operation Bluestar and rebuilt by Baba Santa Singh who undertook a kar seva, would again be demolished for the construction of a new one. He did not speak of the Akali Dal's official reaction to the steps taken by the centre. He also gave no indication whatsover of the Akali Dal's intentions to sit down for negotiations. On its part, the government too has moved in fits and starts, resorting to a concession-a-day kind of tactics which have made the Akalis wary of dealing with it. The agreement to some Akali demands have come—instead of a package deal that was promised initially— piecemeal, creating all kinds of apprehensions in the Akali mind about the "designs of the centre." The most crucial factor in Punjab is of course the restoration of confidence but far from any signs that mutual trust is beginning to build up, the centre and the Akalis are continuing to drift apart.

The Beginning of the End?

Basant Biswal's revolt may prove to be costly for J.B. Patnaik

On the day the Congress(I) rebel candidate Prasanna Kumar Patsani filed his nomination papers for the crucial Khurda byelection he declared, "This is the beginning of the J.B Patnaik government's end." It was not just an emotional outburst by the saffron-clad Maharishi Mahesh Yogi devotee, who is also a reputed writer. The results of the three byelections, particularly the one in Khurda, are likely to prove to be the turning point in J.B. Patnaik's five-year-old supremacy in the state's political affairs. While the high command's attitude towards him will be a major factor, the other problem he faces is the increase in the number of disgruntled elements in the State Congress(I) who have found an opportunity to assert themselves against his leadership. The dissidents' efforts to ensure the party's debacle in all the three constituencies are too significant a factor to be overlooked by the leadership.

The strength of the dissidents increased with the entry into their ranks of Basant Kumar Biswal, once the "super chief minister" in the Patnaik ministry, who recently parted company with the chief minister when he was denied a ticket to the state Assembly. Biswal, according to sources close to him, realised that his former mentor J.B. Patnaik had joined the "plot" to oust him from power as the chief minister felt threatened by his increasing influence among the partymen including the legislators. Although Biswal has not criticised Patnaik openly, he is believed to be waiting for an opportunity to "avenge the humiliation." According to his supporters, Biswal will come out openly against Patnaik once his pressure tactics are successful.

Biswal and his supporters, including a sizable number of legislators, were happier than the opposition politicians over the Congress(I)'s debacle in the byelections. It was a way of forcing the Congress(I) leadership to recognise "the fact" that the party cannot move without them. They maintained a low profile initially but when Biswal was finally ousted they struck with all the force at their command. Biswal and his followers, particularly those who were denied renominations to the Assembly elections, did no campaigning for the Congress(I) and also worked for the official candidate's defeat. Some of them even established contacts with the Janata Party leaders to achieve their purpose.

Patsani's candidature came as a boon to the dissidents. First, it was an opportunity for Biswal and his supporters to refurbish their images, under which Biswal, Patsani and some others were dropped from the 'candidates' list for the March polls. The Biswal faction also wanted to prove that the revenue minister Niranjan Patnaik, elder brother of the chief minister's son-in-law was no substitute for Biswal in "effective management." It was Niranjan Patnaik who was Biswal's first target. According to him, Niranjan Patnaik and a few others, including union minister K.P. Singh Deo were instrumental in ousting him from power and J.B. Patnaik sided with Niranjan Patnaik against Biswal. Unfortunately, Niranjan Patnaik's "management" of the byelections not only in Khurda and Kakatpur but also in his home district, Keonjhar, has failed miserably.

Political observers are keenly watching the next phase of relations between J.B. Patnaik and Biswal. Will the chief minister bring Biswal back as his party manager and chief adviser on government affairs? Or, will he stick to his policy and eliminate him from whatever eminent position he still enjoys in the party as the PCC(I) treasurer? If he chooses the latter course, Patnaik definitely runs the risk of losing his grip on the party which may destroy his power base. Moreover, a caste factor has begun dominating the state's political scene with the khandayat (farmers) uniting under the leadership of Biswal. The Biswal group's jubilation over the results of the Khurda and Kakatpur constituencies also stems from the fact that Patsani and the Janata Party candidate in Kakatpur, Surendranath Naik, are both khandayats.

CONGRESS(I)

A New Youth Leader

Anand Sharma succeeds Tariq Anwar

The youngest-ever member of the Rajya Sabha has now taken over as the Indian Youth Congress(I) president. Anand Sharma (32) who set a record last year by being elected to the Rajya Sabha, has succeeded Tariq Anwar, a second term Lok Sabha member as the IYC(I) chief. This is for the fourth time since 1980 that the organisation has a new head. Tariq Anwar, who had been the president since 1983, had expressed his desire to quit the post sometime back and speculation had begun about his successor two months ago. Two names which clearly stood out were those of Anand Sharma and Debaprasad Roy, both Rajya Sabha members and IYC(I) general secretaries. But an element of uncertainty crept in when a section of the party's leadership, in order to stop Sharma and Roy, put in an extraneous consideration into the selection process. It was argued that the new incumbent should be from a state which does not have a Congress(I) government, and that too preferably from the South.

In the range of choice, no such name was available. For a while, the Maharashtra youth leader, Gurudas Kamat's name was mentioned. P. Rangarajan Kumaramangalam, the MP from Salem, too was considered. But Rangarajan, a former president of the National Students' Union of India (NSUI) and a former general secretary of IYC (in Priya Ranjan Das Munshi's team), had been out of touch with Youth Congress affairs since 1975. He had drifted into trade unionism (and successfully led transport strikes in Madras) and a fulltime career in law. An effort was also made to induct people who were not directly associated with the Youth Congress movement. This had the backing of a section of the leadership which had been opposed to the Youth Congress since the Sanjay Gandhi days, when the organisation had suddenly become very powerful in Congress politics.

The selection of Anand Sharma has been seen as the victory for traditional elements in the party. He has grown in the youth and student movement. Having headed the Himachal Pradesh University Union in 1973, Sharma first came into the limelight when he was made a general secretary of NSUI's central body in 1975. Three years later, in 1978, when the Congress was out of power, Sharma became the Himachal Youth Congress president. In the Janata days, he led a number of movements in Shimla. Police cases registered by the Shanta Kumar regime were not dropped against Sharma and the Himachal Youth Congress members by the regime of Ram Lal, though the Congress had returned to power. In 1981, while chief minister Ram Lal was accusing Anand Sharma of spearheading the campaign exposing forest rackets (in which Ram Lal's relatives were involved), Sharma was made a general secretary in the IYC central office. The appointment of Sharma in Delhi was seen as a triumph for the anti-Ram Lal faction in Himachal politics, headed by Veerbhadra Singh, then an union minister. After this, the anti-Ram Lal campaign was stepped up and Veerbhadra Singh was made the chief minister. (The success of the politics of this group can be judged by the fact that in the Himachal Pradesh Assembly elections, the Congress(I) has improved its position in 1985)

The choice between Anand Sharma and D. P Roy was difficult. Roy too has grown from the lower levels in the organisation in West Bengal. He has been heading the IYC's development centre, which looks after cadre training. Roy's name had come up when presidential changes were made earlier. He was also tipped for the post after Ram Chandra Rath but Ghulam Nabi Azad was appointed. Later, when Tariq Anwar replaced Ghulam Nabi Azad, Roy's name was considered again. This time, the age factor was in Anand Sharma's favour (the Youth Congress president has to be less than 35 years old). For Tariq Anwar, a position in the party's organisation is round the corner.

FILMS

"It is a Statement Against the Criminalisation of Politics"

Ramesh Sharma, director of New Delhi Times, tells SUNDAY

Life can imitiate art—or even life itself—and be successful. Sitting at the India International Centre, Ramesh Sharma took out the stills from the black folder. Were they photographs of the riot scenes of Ahmedabad? Sharma's photographs were of communal riots all right. But these riots had been "staged" in Bombay's Film City, with the stills being taken by Raghu Rai.

Ramesh Sharma (34) has just finished filming his first feature film entitled New Delhi Times which has been described by the publicists as a political thriller. Earlier, Sharma had done a few documentaries including the prize-winning Rumtek, on a Sikkim monastery for which he got the President's award as well as the Commonwealth Award. SUNDAY spoke to him recently. Excerpts:

Q: Why is your film being called a political thriller?*

A: The film is a statement against the criminalisation of politics and the nexus between politics and industry. In India we are heading towards an insidious form of fascism without realising it—fascism in the form of democracy that is. The film tries to explore this within the structure of entertainment.

Q: What kind of democratic structures?

A: The so-called elected representatives who are supposed to serve the people make the people the instruments of their service. Whenever politicians are in trouble they end up manipulating—using the divide and rule principle—and then make it into a law and order situation. Look around: Assam, Punjab, Gujarat...in this film, Hangal who plays the father of Shashi Kapoor—he is the executive editor—tells his son that divide and rule was not a British formula: "Hakumat ka tha"—'and, it is being employed with as much subtlety and cleverness as during the days of the British....' New Delhi Times is a record of our times. The political thriller label is there as it is a murder mystery film about contemporary India.

Q: Your riots were engineered as well?

A: The riots were engineered because of the power play between two politicians. One of them realises that the best way to discredit the other group is to create a law and order situation. In small towns or in rural India the embers of communal passion are there, perhaps suppressed, but the ruthless politicians ignite them. The man in the mob or the group thinks that he is fighting for a cause, but he is being manipulated. The only rationale on the part of the politician in the film is to grab power, if not through the ballot box, then by creating a division between people.

Q: Where does the investigative press come in?

A: There is this idealistic executive director, Vikas Pande, played by Shashi Kapoor. He feels that the newspaper can be a forum to expose the ruthless political chicanery. He believes that he can render a service and cleanse the country. But he ends up getting sucked into the vortex and realises, perhaps a little too late, that when men are determined to subvert democracy in order to achieve their aim, a mere journalist cannot stop their onslaught

Q: This still photograph of the politician has a very smug smile He is the winner, isn't he, in the end?

A: The film ends with a shot of him, with this smile It is a game of compromise as far as the politician is concerned—survival at all costs, in spite of the belief that the dissidents will come to certain solutions amongst themselves. Everybody else becomes the victim when the highest powers come together. They can still scream and write and think that their newspapers are mirrors reflecting the misdeeds of the politicians But that is about all.

Q: Quite a pessimistic conclusion No glimmer of hope anywhere?

A: Ultimately, people have to become aware of what has been done to them. The press can play a pivotal role by keeping a vigil... But even the most well-meaning journalists can develop blind spots, which can be exploited.

Q: Are you happy with the film?

A: Unfortunately, the structure is too commercially-oriented. I did want to reach out beyond a personal circuit Showing films in film societies or film festivals is no more than preaching to the converted. My aim is to entertain as well, and the film can be seen, I hope, on many levels I chose Shashi Kapoor and Sharmila Tagore because the former has produced some of the better Hindi films like Junoon and Kalyug, and Sharmila because she is a talented actress and has cut her teeth with Satyajit Ray. I was lucky that I had a good team. Subroto Mitra has often been accused of fastidiousness and for being slow. But then he puts in all that effort to make the film better . the stars, I think, felt that I paid more attention to the cameraman than to them but then they should realise that to me a film is as much the medium of the cameraman as much as for the actor or the director ..the director is like a conductor with a symphony orchestra, to bring out the music he wants and to integrate it at the end...the script needed a tremendous amount of visual treatment. Subroto Mitra is a perfectionist There should always be somebody in the unit who is fighting until the last moment for perfection, long after the chalta hai attitude creeps in

Q. Have you sold the film?

A: To overseas video and in a few territories

KERALA

UDF: Stronger After Survival

No-confidence motion helps UDF ministry to close ranks

Few governments have welcomed a no-confidence motion as much as the 34-month-old United Democratic Front (UDF) ministry which very effectively used the opportunity to strengthen its ranks The Congress(I), the major constituent of the UDF, has warned its minor partners that if the ministry falls, they will also vanish The strategy was more than successful as the Front gained one more member from the opposition DMKP—Sakthan Nadar—MLA—on the eve of the voting. The National Democratic Party and the Ezhava-backed Socialist Republican Party which were clamouring for the resignation of their own ministerial nominees, also voted against the motion, which was defeated.

The immediate provocation for the CPI(M) to table the no-confidence motion was the criticism against the "most corrupt ministry Kerala has ever seen," by the state Youth Congress(I) president and MLA, G. Karthikeyan. The opposition felt that Karthikeyan was only voicing the feeling of the high command. They did not guess that it was part of CM Karunakaran's strategy to end the bickering among the small but crucial constituents of the Front.

The opposition realised their folly a day before the debate was to begin and this was reflected in the performance of its debators including the otherwise acid-tongued M.V Raghavan, of the CPI(M) who had tabled the motion. By defeating the no confidence motion (the second in its three year stint), the UDF has won for itself some respite from squabbles and will attempt to whitewash its image sullied by unproved corruption allegations.

The opposition's allegations of corruption were confidently refuted by treasury benchers who challenged the opposition to go to the anti-corruption cell formed by the government What dominated the two-day debate coming at the end of the budget session was the performance of the Jyoti Basu government in West Bengal. At least four ruling Front speakers including KPCC(I) president C. Padmarajan quoted from a recent issue of The Illustrated Weekly of India which had reported on the suspension of veteran Marxist leader Manoranjan Hazra following his charges against the party leadership in the Bengali daily Bartaman. However, the Marxist leader K.R. Gowri further weakened the opposition cause by pleading for the slowing down of revenue recovery proceedings against liquor company owners McDowell's in Palghat. Gowri argued that the government should not have let the arrears stockpile to nearly Rs nine crores. Ruling Front speakers quickly grabbed the opportunity to mock the new-found capitalist friend of the Marxist party. "I could have understood if Gowriamma was arguing the case of poor toddy tappers," ridiculed IUML member Seetni Haji.

It was left to Baby John of the RSP and E.K. Nayanar to rescue the opposition's case. Both had statistics to support their charge of maladministration and the resultant financial squeeze the state was passing through. The treasury benchers pointed to the financial situation in West Bengal as a reply. Nayanar said that his party had not accepted the anti-corruption cell as it was a facade as all their suggestions regarding its composition were vetoed. The MLAs said that the aim of their party is to establish a single party rule in the state which is the only way out from the political morass the state is now in. But with scores of parties with their own pockets of influence which are mainly communal, the chances of either the CPI(M) or the Congress(I) being able to grow out of the unholy alliances they have now, are dim. If either of them try to go it alone the other Front will sail through with communal backing. And at the moment none of them are in a mood to risk it.

JAMMU AND KASHMIR

Will the Abdullahs Reunite?

Behind-the-scenes moves are on for a patch-up between the estranged members of the late Sheikh Abdullah's family, although positions taken by the two warring sides suggest that these moves will not materialise, at least for the time being.

Tariq Abdullah who defied his elder brother on the eve of the latter's ouster last July and became a propagandist for the breakaway wing of the National Conference headed by their sister Begum Khalida Shah has again come into the former chief minister's fold. He has not only apologised to Farooq Abdullah for what he did during the past few months but has also sought his forgiveness. Some family members, including the Abdullahs' younger sister Begum Suraiya Mattoo, are happy over Tariq's "homecoming." But Farooq Abdullah believed that the damage done by Tariq would be hard to set right. His "homecoming" has not made any difference at least for Farooq Abdullah. It may have caused embarrassment to Shah and his Congress(I) allies who had made it a point to overplay Tariq's unconvincing utterances.

According to sources close to the Sheikh's family, Tariq Abdullah had held a series of meetings with Farooq Abdullah before formally announcing his decision to quit the ruling National Conference and as director of the prestigious Sher-i-Kashmir International Convention Complex late last month. This was seen as a bid to reunite the family. But as admitted by Tariq Abdullah himself, his endeavours could not succeed "because of the positions taken by the two sides." The criticism of the split in the ruling family has been worrying some family members and their well-wishers. This is why Begum Khalida has also been trying hard to meet Farooq Abdullah and their mother Begum Akbar Jehan in order to mend fences with the two. Though she could not meet her brother as he was "not willing to see his traitorous sister," Begum Khalida succeeded in meeting her mother a few times. They met at the residence of Begum Suraiya Mattoo, who is married to a practising doctor and is also showing a keen interest in attempts to bring the family together. She also believes that the family feud has tarnished the reputation of the Sheikh's family and says she is pained because of criticism against the family in Kashmir.

Tariq Abdullah

Farooq Abdullah

But Shah's son Muzaffar Shah claims that it was Farooq Abdullah who has been trying hard to make it up with his sister and brother-in-law. Whatever be the case, the fact remains the Sheikh's family is divided today. Begum Khalida Shah, also president of the ruling National Conference broke off with Farooq Abdullah a year ago in support of her husband Ghulam Mohammad Shah, who had differences with Farooq Abdullah. The Sheikh's family was split in two groups following the parting of ways. While Begum Sheikh Abdullah and her daughter Begum Suraiya Mattoo and her younger son Mustafa Kamal, also a doctor, supported Farooq Abdullah, Tariq Abdullah sided with his elder sister Begum Khalida. Now Tariq is back into his elder brother's fold and publicly supports his cause.

DOWRY DEATHS

When Justice Triumphed

The killers of Debjani Banik are sentenced to death

On 11 April in Calcutta, the additional sessions judge sentenced to death Chandranath Banik and his son Chandan Banik for murdering Debjani, Chandan Banik's wife on 28 January 1983. The three other accused—Ashim and Sumitra Banik and Jayanti Das—son and daughters of Chandranath Banik were given life sentences. Bitra Banik, a minor daughter of Chandranath Banik will be tried by the juvenile court.

The judgment created a sensation in the city as it was a clear case of "bride murder" which is on the rise even in a "progressive" state like West Bengal. Judge D.N. Sen, while delivering the 87-page judgment observed, "This case will go down in the history of crime... It is not only unique for its magnitude and brutality in killing a housewife of a so-called millionaire living in a multistoreyed building but also the subsequent conduct displayed by the accused. Even after killing the housewife they could merrily go on taking their food, keeping the dead body wrapped up in beddings."

Debjani Banik alias Banu was the only daughter of Dhanapati Dutta, a businessman from Burdwan. In August 1975, she was married to Chandan Banik, the owner of a multistoreyed building in Hindustan Park, a posh locality in South Calcutta. The relations between the two families turned sour in 1978 when Debjani's elder brother refused to marry her younger sister-in-law, which Chandranath Banik considered an insult to his family. Matters grew worse over the years over a clash of business interests between the two families. Tension mounted when Chandan Banik started a cold storage in Burdwan with the help of a bank loan. After the business failed and losses accumulated, Chandan Banik was left with a debt of Rs 68 lakhs. It was at this juncture that he and his father started pressurising Debjani to make her father buy 25 per cent of the shares of the cold storage. But Dhanapati Dutta, Debjani's father refused.

On 28 January, 1983 the Banik family held a puja at home. Chandan Banik began abusing his wife from the morning. Desperate, she rang up her father in Burdwan and pleaded with him for the money. "Baba, tumi aamar katha rakle na." (Father, you didn't keep my word)," she sobbed over the phone. That was the last time she spoke to her family. The telephone was snatched away by her father-in-law who started abusing Mr Dutta. That day, at 2.45 pm both Chandan Banik and his father began beating up Debjani Banik while her brother-in-law Ashim and her sister-in-laws, Jayanti and Sumitra looked on. Hearing her cries, the servants came running but were sent away by Sumitra. Even the priest who had come to perform the ceremonies was shocked by Debjani's cries. Later, the servants and the priest gave valuable evidence before the court, unlike in other such cases where it is difficult to mobilise even a single witness.

Around 4.30 pm, Debjani Banik's lifeless body was hung from a ceiling fan. According to the post-mortem report she had died of head injuries and other injuries, ante-mortem and homicidal, and the hanging was post-mortem in nature. That evening and the next morning, Chandranath Banik turned away the maid who had come to work on the pretext that there was a puja. On 29 January, Chandan Banik and his father withdrew Rs one lakh from a bank and visited their family physician Dr A.K. Banerjee for a death certificate for their maid. He refused on the grounds that he had never treated her before. In fact, Dr Banerjee's evidence also played an important part in the case.

That night, the Gariahat police station received an anonymous call informing the OC that there was a dead body in the Banik's house. When the police arrived, all the lights in the house had been switched off and the door bolted. The police broke into the house with the help of the fire brigade. Guided by a foul smell, the police discovered the decomposed body under a folded cot piled up with mattresses. Debjani Banik's three sisters-in-law refused to identify the body. Chandan Banik, his father and younger brother Ashim were missing. It was Nandan Banik, another brother of Chandan Banik who identified the body of Debjani Banik as that of his elder brother's wife. Finally, on 2 February, Chandan Banik and his father were arrested. They had been hiding in a hotel in Calcutta under assumed names.

The case has created immense public interest in the city. Large crowds gathered in the court room during the proceedings. What kept public interest alive was that it was a case of "bride murder," which had taken place, in a rich and "respectable family." Various women's organisations held demonstrations in the court premises demanding severe punishment for the guilty. Members of one organisation even assaulted Chandan Banik and his father in the court premises.

Initially, Justice Sen was forced to conduct the case inside the Alipur Central Jail because of the misbehaviour by the accused, who on many occasions, tried to disrupt the proceedings. On the day the judgment was announced, large crowds gathered to hear the verdict. Representatives of the Forum for Women against Repression stood for hours shouting slogans against bride burning and oppression against women. One young man, impressed by this show of solidarity, told SUNDAY, "These women did not even know Debjani. But they stood for hours to hear the judgment. Until we have such women in our families, we will continue to see our sisters die the same way (as Debjani)." A 65-year-old court official said, "In my lifetime I've not seen such beastliness. It serves the two of them (Chandan and his father) right. They should be butchered for torturing their bahu."

The first time anyone accused in a "bride murder" case was given capital punishment was in Delhi, in May 1983, when Sudha Goel, then nine months pregnant was burnt to death by her husband, mother-in-law and brother-in-law for not giving a dowry of Rs 10,000 and other gifts. While giving the judgment, the additional judge, Mr S.M. Aggarwal said, "The gravity of the crime has shaken me." The Delhi High Court, however, reversed the judgment and acquitted

the three persons despite the incriminating evidence given by the neighbours that had led to the conviction. Fearing a reversal of the death sentence in Debjani's case too, a spokeswoman of the Forum for Women against Repression said, "We are not blood-thirsty. But we do demand speedy trials and exemplary punishments which we hope will act as a deterrent. Our aim is to eradicate this evil. Judgments like this play only a minor role in this fight." The fight is likely to be long and arduous. Ironically, the day the judgment was given, two brides died under "mysterious circumstances" and a lecturer of the Indian Statistical Institute severely beat up his wife but she escaped with multiple fractures. Said a spokeswoman of the Forum, "Our aim is not only to seek exemplary punishments of those guilty of murdering brides. We must remember that harassment and violence do not always lead to death but often transform the lives of millions of women into a living nightmare."

A Degree of Fraud

Fake thesis by senior doctor in a leading hospital

A man who obtained a doctorate degree on the basis of a fake thesis has been made in-charge of the pathological laboratory in Sawai Man Singh (SMS) hospital: the largest hospital of the state. The PhD degree, which was awarded to Mr P.C. Thanvi, a bio-chemist in the hospital in 1979, was withdrawn by the university of Rajasthan, in October last year. An advertisement to this effect was also inserted by the university in local newspapers on 24 October 1983.

The university's decision to withdraw the degree was based on the findings of an enquiry commission headed by a High Court judge: Justice P.D. Kudal. The commission was appointed by the Chancellor of the university to find out the truth about the charges made by certain complainants that the thesis submitted by Mr Thanvi was based on experiments which were never conducted. Justice Kudal specifically mentioned that the experiments mentioned in the thesis were never conducted, even the patients on whom the experiments were claimed to have been conducted were never admitted to the hospital. The enquiry commission held that not only Mr Thanvi but his guide Dr S.D. Bhardwaj, professor and head of the department of bio-chemistry in the SMS medical college, Jaipur was also equally to blame for submitting such an imaginary and false thesis.

Despite the fact that the university had cancelled the PhD degree and demoted him because of unsatisfactory work, he was promoted to the post of superintending bio-chemist, a post which has a direct bearing on the health and lives of patients through an alleged high-level conspiracy involving senior officials of the secretariat and the principal of the Jaipur medical college.

The promotion of Mr Thanvi was exposed by Dr Hari Singh, a Congress(I) MLA, in a letter to the then CM Shiv Charan Mathur on 14 November 1984. Dr Hari Singh is himself a reputed surgeon and before joining politics had worked in the SMS medical college. When the post of senior bio-chemist was being upgraded to the post of superintending bio-chemist, Dr Singh had written to the CM saying "It appears that the post was being upgraded to promote Mr P.C. Thanvi who was found guilty by a commission of inquiry headed by a sitting judge of the Rajasthan High Court." The CM had assured the MLA that action would soon be taken and called for the file from the medical department. On 23 January 1984, Dr Singh informed the CM that "Despite your having summoned the file from the department, the medical department has promoted Mr Thanvi." When the CM did not reply, Dr Singh wrote another letter to Shiv Charan Mathur on 14 November 1984 saying that "no chief minister would tolerate that his direction should be flouted by the lower functionaries in this mischievous manner." The CM then appointed a senior IAS official, Mr N.K. Verma, to go through the whole affair and submit a report.

Mr Verma's report makes startling revelations. He says that the creation of a second post of a superintending bio-chemist in the SMS medical college hospital was totally uncalled for especially because the other four medical college hospitals do not even have a senior bio-chemist. The report clearly states that the decision to upgrade the post was taken flouting all the relevant rules. The minister was completely kept in the dark in this regard and the department of personnel was also deliberately kept away from the selection process. Even the prescribed qualifications were altered to accommodate Mr Thanvi without approval from the appropriate authority. Interestingly, Mr Verma says in his report, the so-called selection committee met on 24 October 1983 and selected Mr Thanvi for the post of superintending bio-chemist even before the post was sanctioned. The board made the selection even without examining the confidential reports of Mr Thanvi. Mr Verma says in his report that "Mr Thanvi was discharged from the post of senior bio-chemist in 1980 since his performance in the post during probation was not found satisfactory. He was discharged from the junior post on the grounds of unsatisfactory performance. Ironically, on the basis of the same record he has been considered suitable for the higher post of superintending biochemist. Moreover, Mr P.C. Thanvi has been found guilty of moral turpitude in submitting a fake thesis by a commission of enquiry."

Mr Verma categorically stated in his report that the promotion was fraudulently back-dated. "This was done cumulatively by a number of officers after the receipt of instructions from the CM's secretariat. It shows a planned conspiracy to favour Mr Thanvi. The falsification of government records and cheating the CM constitute a grave misconduct and call for deterrent action," he said.

Without noting the CM's instructions on the relevant file, the proposal was submitted to the health minister for the approval of the new post and Mr Thanvi's appointment. The minister sanctioned the proposal on 28 December but it was forged and changed to 28 October. Mr Verma's finding is backed by the report of the State Forensic Laboratory which clearly states that the original date beneath the signature of the health minister had been tampered with and altered. The conspiracy did not end with it. The orders of the creation of the post and appointment of Mr Thanvi were also back-dated to 28 October 1983. The copies of the order were shown to have been addressed to the accountant-general, principal, medical college and superintendent, SMS hospital. On enquiry, Mr Verma found that no such letters dated 28 October 1983 were received either in the accountant-general's office or by the superintendent, SMS hospital. And the ones said to have been received by the principal, medical college, were not entered in the college receipt register.

What is more intriguing is that fresh letters with the same contents were issued and sent to the same addresses again on 1 December 1983. All the addressees had received them on 3 December, 1983. Mr Verma says that the letter dated 28 October was in fact backdated to complete the formality but copies were not sent to the AG office and SMS hospital or else it would have exposed the mischief. The fresh letters were sent on 1 December to make the records complete.

Mr Verma's report is proved true from another fact that the joining report of Mr Thanvi claimed to have been signed by him on 2 November 1983 was received in the AG office on 27 December 1983 and the one with the principal, medical college had not been noted in the college register. This clearly shows that the charge report was also backdated to complete the conspiracy. "If Mr Thanvi has taken over charge on 2 November 1983, as indicated by the charge report, his salary for the month of November 1983, would have been drawn for the upgraded post in the salary bill for the month of November 1983 itself and there was no necessity of drawing the same through an arrear bill," Mr Verma observes.

The report of Mr Verma was submitted on 16 July 1984 to the chief secretary but has so far not attracted any action and Mr Thanvi continues to give reports regarding vital pathological tests of the patients.

RELIGION

Spreading the Prophet's Word

A world Hadith and Seerath conference on the sayings and actions of Prophet Mohammed was held in Hyderabad for the first time. The four-day conference was organised by the Dar-ul-Uloom, Hyderabad, a religious centre of higher learning and the Deeni Taleemi trust. More than 200 delegates from all parts of the country as well as 20 representatives from UAE, Qatar and Jordan attended the conference. The inaugural function began with the Friday namaz (prayers) in the public gardens led by the chief guest, the Imam of Ka'aba (Mecca) Fazilatul Sheikh Abdul Rehman Bin Abdul Azis. The four main sessions of the conference held in Arabic, Urdu, English and a symposium in Telugu dealt with various theological aspects of the Prophet Mohammed's life and teachings. The speakers took up particular aspects of the Prophet's life, quoting various authorities in their research papers. In the concluding session, the conference passed three resolutions relating to Muslim personal law, wakf boards and an institution of religious learning in Hyderabad.

Presiding over the English language session, Hashim Ali, vice-chancellor of Osmania University said that there was a great need to make an authentic compilation of the Hadith (sayings) and Seerath (actions) of Prophet Mohammed. The Prophet's life and actions were a living testimony of what the Quran has taught mankind. Of the thousands of sayings that were attributed to the Prophet, only 7,000 Hadith are authenticated. Many sayings and anecdotes had been attributed to the Prophet by tradition, but were actually not authentic. Therefore, there was a need to collect the authentic Hadiths and Seeraths of the Prophet into a compendium to be published for the benefit of Muslims as well as non-Muslims. A delegate from Kuwait, Sayed Ahmed Al Saleh said that a true Muslim was the follower of the Quran, the Hadith and the Seerath and conformed to the Sunnat (Prophet's traditions) and the Shariat (Islamic law) in their real spirit. Islam was not a theoretical religion or a set of conceptual beliefs but was a practical code of conduct and character. The Imam of Mecca said that the Muslim youth of today was responsible for preserving their religious faith while the Ulema (theologians) had the task of equipping the youth with the necessary religious knowledge and moral values. The Imam exhorted the Muslim youth to adopt the Islamic teachings in all walks of life and to keep themselves away from the forces of discord and disunity

The conference in its three resolutions urged the government of India not to interfere with the Shariat. The Shariat is unalterable and the government had given an assurance that it would not bring any changes in the Muslim personal law. The conference resolved that proper protection should be available for wakf properties which were being encroached upon or being misused by unscrupulous persons. The wakf boards were not equipped to deal with the encroachers. In its third resolution, the conference said that the Daarat-ul-Maarif, the Arabic Academy of Research, Translation and Publication at Osmania University had been doing excellent work in the preservation of rare Arabic manuscripts and religious literature. It urged the central government and the state government to provide funds

The Demand for Gorkhaland

The Gorkha Front wants a separate state within India

The Darjeeling based Gorkha National Liberation Front (GNLF) has sought the assistance of major world powers and the United Nations to persuade India, Nepal and the United Kingdom (UK) to abrogate the Indo-Nepal and British-Nepal treaties of 1950, and conclude new ones, which would clearly specify the political and legal status of Indian Gorkhas. The ambiguity in the existing treaties have subjected them to "apartheid and genocide." according to Mr Subash Ghising , the GNLF president. Ghising has also demanded the formation of a separate state of Gorkhaland within India which he said would solve the problems of the Indian Gorkhas, and organised a "boycott" of all the Assembly and Parliamentary elections since 1980. The proposed Gorkhaland state, according to GNLF maps, would include the Darjeeling hill areas, Siliguri Terai and Jalpaiguri Dooars extending right upto Sankosh river bordering Assam. It would cover an area of 2256 sq. miles with a population of about 14 lakhs including nine lakh Nepalis.

Ghising, a Darjeeling based politician has been called a Nepali agent trying to wreck the movement on constitutional recognition of the Nepali language in India, something he has no sympathy for. Sources close to the Nepal administration claim that he is an Indian agent trying to foment trouble among the Nepalis.

Ghising's memorandum to the King of Nepal and Indian authorities m December 1983 on the treaty revision issue has failed to evoke any response from either side. He has, therefore, invited "rightful opinion and the helping hands" of China, USSR, USA, France, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Bhutan to raise the issue in the Security Council and General Assembly of the United Nations, the International Court of Justice and the European Commission of Human Rights. He has also asked the three concerned parties—the UK, Nepal and India—to do the same. Copies of the 1983 memorandum containing a case history of the Gorkha problems have been forwarded to all these countries. The memorandum said that there were three categories of Gorkhas living in India—descendants of aboriginal Gorkhas who were inhabitants of the land in North Bengal ceded to British India by Nepal under the Sugaulee treaty of 1815, those who spontaneously migrated to India after the "humiliating treaty," and those who "officially" joined the British (and subsequently Indian) Gorkha regiments since1885. It may be mentioned here that the bulk of the Nepal nationals who are recruited in the British and Indian Gorkha regiments settle in India after retirement.

Ghising told SUNDAY that since it was virtually impossible to distinguish between Indian Gorkhas and nationals of Nepal, the Gorkhas who settle in India are treated as foreigners in India with the "damaging existing treaties" clearly making them subjects of the Nepal king. He also severely criticised the British for failing to hold a plebiscite in the "ceded land" before leaving India.

Ghising, an ex-serviceman himself, is known for his militant outlook. He has of late concentrated his efforts on some 30,000 ex-servicemen, living in this region, constantly reminding them not to forget their training and discipline and to remain alert to fight for the just cause. His message is loud and clear—the Gorkhas have been traditionally fighting other peoples' war, it may be time to fight one for themselves.

RAJASTHAN STATE LOTTERY

The Bubble Which Has Burst

Mismanagement has dealt a crippling blow to the scheme

The Rajasthan State Lottery which created a first by announcing a bumper prize of Rs one crore in 1983 is itself on the verge of bankruptcy. The much-publicised "Satyam" draw of the lottery has been aborted and the state government is on the point of losing crores of rupees due to mismanagement.

The Rajasthan Lottery created a sensation in the lottery world in 1983 when it first started the "Satyam" draw with a prize of Rs two lakhs on a ticket valued at Re one only. The prize money multiplied in no time and in May 1983 the lottery's 83rd Holi bumper draw had a prize of Rs 30 lakhs. For another bumper draw, the prize money was a staggering Rs one crore and one lakh for a ticket of Rs ten. The tickets sold out and had to be purchased in the black market.

The going for the Rajasthan State Lottery was too good to last. Suddenly, things started to move in reverse gear. The goodwill of the Rajasthan Lottery which was at its peak last year touched rock-bottom when the recently-introduced "Shivam" weekly draw was cancelled before two months of its operation. Take, for example, what happened to the Holi bumper draw on 3 January this year. The lotteries department had announced that 48 lakh tickets worth Rs ten each would be released for sale. The Governor, O.P. Mehra, released the first lot of tickets at an elaborate function. The second lot of tickets were subsequently released at the state department's sale camps at Calcutta, Patna, Guwahati, Lucknow, Delhi, Bhopal, Ahmedabad, Vijayawada, Madras and Jaipur. This time the response from the public was not as overwhelming. Only 16.5 lakh tickets could be sold from the first lot and not a single ticket was sold from the second. Consequently, the sale of the third lot of tickets had to be called off. The department had hoped to raise money to the tune of Rs four crores but the amount earned by the government through sale of tickets was a paltry Rs 1.6 crores.

Since the once-prized Rajasthan Lottery tickets were no longer in demand, the government tried to find a way out of the imbroglio. On the department's suggestion, the state government amended the lottery guidelines of 1968, which unlike the previous rules authorised the department to include even unsold tickets in the draw. This meant that the scope of the draw was enlarged to all the tickets printed by the department, a clear violation of the earlier guideline that only tickets which had been sold would be eligible for prizes. The Holi bumper draw had, however, been announced at a time when the earlier guidelines were applicable. Aggrieved with the amendment, a buyer of the ticket approached the Rajasthan High Court and obtained a stay order on the draw of the lottery till the case was decided. The case will come up for hearing on 8 May this year.

Whether the amendment in lottery guidelines is valid or not will only be clear once the court's decision is available, but what are the reasons which led to the lottery fiasco? SUNDAY approached Dharam Singh Sagar, director of the lotteries department to find out. Dharam Singh put the blame squarely on the lottery agents who had been approached for the sale of tickets. "Agents from all over the country had promised us their help and cooperation. Now they have deserted us," he complained.

The agents, however, blame the department. They said that the imposition of sales tax had nothing to do with the poor sale of lottery tickets. "If that is so, why are other lotteries surviving and recording higher sales?" demanded one agent.

The Rajasthan government which earned Rs 2.5 crores from lotteries in 1983-84 may end up losing an equal amount this year. The department has also been blamed for running the lotteries in a slipshod manner. According to the agents, the prize money was not being handed out in time.

If the High Court strikes down the amendment, the state department will lose up to Rs 1.5 crores. In case the court upholds the amendment as valid, the government will lose about Rs 50 lakhs besides losing the confidence of the agents and the common man. A bitter war will start between the agents, the ticket-holders and the lotteries department if the court decides to give ticket-holders back their money. If that happens, the question that will be asked is: who will refund the money to those who purchased the tickets? According to Sagar, the department is not bothered with the problem since the "public had bought tickets from agents and not from us. But we will take the matter to court.

FRANCE

The Rise of Racism

The neo-Nazi National Front gains in strength

It is perhaps ironical that the ultra-right wing parties in France, including the neo-Nazi National Front, are strengthening their position since Francois Mitterrand, the Socialist leader was elected President of the republic in 1981. Political observers, however, feel that the election of a Socialist as President, in place of the Gaullist Giscard d'Estaing, has led to a right-wing backlash in France, which has seen a plurality of parties since World War II.

But this time, the right-wing backlash looks serious, as was witnessed by the major gains in the municipal elections made by the "National Front" last year. The demands of the National Front are simple: curbing the influx of immigrants from the non-EEC countries and the repatriation of immigrant workers. The "immigrants" in France are principally the Algerians and Moroccans.

The recent success of the National Front in the local elections has alarmed not only Mitterrand's Socialists, but the centrist parties including the neo-Gaullist party Rassamblement pour la Republique (RPR) and the centre-right party Union pour la Democracie Francaise (UDF). Two weeks ago, these two groups joined hands in the French Parliament (National Assembly) to oppose the plan of the Socialists to introduce major reforms in the law governing municipal elections. The Socialist reforms would have led to proportional representation in the local elections, thus making it difficult for the right-wing groups, especially the National Front, to gain ascendancy through direct elections,

President Mitterrand: Pro-immigrants

as they did last year. Whilst the RPR and the UDF have vowed to fight the Socialist government's reforms, they are also worried by the challenge posed by the neo-fascist elements

Meanwhile, the situation has been further complicated by President Mitterrand'ssuggestion that the immigrants (mostly Algerian and Moroccan unskilled workers) would have the right to vote in local elections. Addressing the annual conference of the League of Human Rights, the President said, "The participation of immigrants in local government seems to me to be a just and fundamental demand which should be met. It will inevitably become a law one day." This brought an immediate retort from Jean le Canuet, leader of the UDF and one of the best known right-wing French politicians apart from former President Giscard d' Estaing, who said, "However generous the French people may be, they cannot accept that their villages and towns will be run by virtue of the votes which would come from foreigners."

Giving immigrants who have lived in France for at least five years, the right to vote (as they have in Britain), was one of the "propositions" in Mitterrand's campaign for the Presidential election. However, his mention of the "proposition" has brought a sudden adverse reaction from Le Canuet and it is expected that it will provoke another virulent campaign by the National Front and other rightist elements, who have campaigned for the last 20 years for the refusal of civic rights, including the right to vote, to immigrants workers.

To combat the rise in neo-fascist feelings in France, a left-wing anti-racist group "SOS Racism" has been formed. This organisation has revealed the results of a public opinion poll conducted by an independent research body in November. According to this survey, 61 per cent of the people questioned said that there were too many immigrants in France: 85 per cent of the people felt that immigrants without work permits should be sent back; 74 per cent felt that French citizens should be given priority over immigrants in jobs and over 26 per cent agreed with the stand of the National Front on immigration.

It is unfortunate that such racist feelings have arisen since World War II in a country which gave the ideals of liberty, equality and fraternity to human history. The irony is even greater when one remembers that these very countries took the lead in the war against Fascism and Nazism which stood for Racism.

SPOTLIGHT

Another Gandhi

When he walked into the Indian and Eastern Newspaper Society (IENS) office in New Delhi, clad in a white dhoti, wearing round spectacles, supporting himself with a walking stick, with not a strand of hair on his head, journalists thought they had had one too many. For, the person was a living likeness of Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi. It was only later, after they had recovered, did the journalists realise that the person was too young to be Gandhi. Naushad, who has been painstakingly cultivating the image of Gandhi, is only 29 years old. This young man from Cochin (he was a transporter in the Cochin Port Trust) has seen Attenborough's Gandhi eight times in an effort to emulate Ben Kingsley in the depiction of the person who led this country to freedom. Naushad even keeps his weight down to 52 kgs (Gandhi's steady weight), has become a vegetarian and has visited Porbander and travelled through Gujarat. He now plans to set up a centre for Gandhism in Kerala. But if any state in the country needs a Gandhi today, it is the Mahatma's home state, Gujarat.

Designed for Success

This time, designer Bina (Lalvani) Ramani made an exit from New Delhi. Her goodbye to India after a three-month stopover to gather her autumn stock for New York where she lives and where she offers Americans "sequence, shine and glitter," was an adventurously "ethnic" dinner. And on display were exotic ghararas, and beads (and some of the Janpath finery was assembled too), imaginatively arranged by Ms Ramani. Old brocade sarees had been transformed into cocoon-type coats and worn over silk salwars and shimmering evening gowns. This according to Bina Ramani, is "traditional delivered in a Western way." And it seems that Ms Ramani has a lot of horse sense as well—the clothes were hung on antique horse heads borrowed from a friendly antique dealer. Though glitter is still gold in the world of haute couture, it may not always be attractive and Ms Ramani has to continuously think of new ways to cater for the "adventurous women" as she describes her clientele. Ramani sells wholesale to Bonwit Teller, Saks Fifth Avenue, Bloomingdale, but Europe is also coming on her map with Dior. Even though fashion is her business, Bina Ramani has other interests too: she dabbles in the occasional bit of journalism. Her most well-known achievement in this field was a free-wheeling interview with Mrs Indira Gandhi, in the course of which the late Prime Minister talked about her culinary talents.

Poetic Justice

Kamala Das, whose autobiography My Story created ripples in the literary world, has now added another feather to her already overcrowded cap: she has won the Kumara Asan World Prize for poetry Ms Das, who writes in Malayalam under the pen name Madhavikutty, has been awarded the prize for her collection of 88 poems called Kamala Das Collected Poems Vol I. The award, one of the most distinguished awards of the third world, was instituted in 1981 and among its recipients are Leopold Sedar Senghor, Nicholas Guillen and John Wright. And Kamala Das' reaction on receiving this award? "After working hard for an examination you expect good results," she told SUNDAY.

Like Father, Like Son

Like father, like son. This is perhaps the most fitting way to describe Colonel S.P. Wahi, chairman of the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC) and his son, Captain Wahi, serving with the Indian army For, when Colonel Wahi was awarded a doctorate by the Indian School of Mines, Dhanbad, in January this year, his son was awarded the Vishisht Seva Medal by the army The Colonel has been rewarded for increasing the production of ONGC three-fold during the three years that he has been its chairman. For Colonel Wahi, honours seem to come in pairs: he was also recently awarded the plaque of honour for his outstanding contribution to the petroleum industry by Pi Epsilon Tau: the USA's national petroleum engineering honours society. Wahi, incidentally, is now the seniormost public sector manager.

Morphine: Now in Tablet Form

Morphine will pretty soon be coming in tablet form rather than be administered by injection. Experiments at a hospital near Liverpool in England have shown that morphine can be successfully administered in the form of a tablet. But, instead of swallowing the tablet, the patient is instructed to keep it in his mouth, in the space between the front teeth and the upper lip. In this position the tablet dissolves quite slowly, in about five or six hours, and the morphine is absorbed through the mouth into the bloodstream. This unusual method is claimed to have advantages over other methods. Apart from avoiding the needle—and also the expense of a disposable hypodermic syringe—it is said to be more effective than an injection and less likely to produce side-effects such as nausea and dizziness. Although the tablet may take upto six hours to dissolve, it begins to be effective within half-an-hour and goes on working for longer than an injection. The Liverpool doctors reporting the experiment in Lancet, say that their below-the-lip tablet has the advantage of an under-the-tongue tablet in dissolving more slowly—and, therefore, lasting longer in its effect—and of being less likely to be inadvertently swallowed.

In the experiments, the patients did not in fact escape the needle. In the interests of impartiality, each one was given both a tablet and an injection. However, those who received real morphine in the tablet had only water in the injection, while those receiving a genuine injection of morphine got only a dummy tablet. Inthis way, all patients thought they were treated alike and possible psychological effects were avoided.

Self-medication

Chimpanzees choose the foliage of a certain plant because it contains a potent antibiotic, according to research by a group of American, Japanese and Canadian scientists. Interestingly, chimpanzees may sample as many as 300 different types of plant in a year. But chimps approach three closely related species of aspilia, a member of the daisy family, in an unusual manner. They carefully select a single leaf from such plants and swallow it whole. Such a behaviour prompted a team of scientists led by E. Rodriguez to analyse the foliage. Their suspicions were strengthened by reports that many traditional African herbal remedies employ related species of aspilia. A preparation from the roots of one species is said to be effective against lumbago, sciatica and neuralgia and the leaves of another are used to treat sores, stomach complaints and coughs. The researchers' hunch proved correct. Aspilia contains an antibiotic called thiarubrine A which is a powerful germicide and effective against a range of common bacteria. It is also capable of terminating the careers of parasites, such as roundworms and flukes.

Aggressive Creatures

American scientists have discovered that lobsters, known for their aggressive tendencies, may hold the key to controlling mood swings of manic-depressive humans. The neuro-hormone serotonin is found in almost all animals; while it circulates in the lobster's bloodstream, in human beings it is isolated in the brain. When serotonin is injected into lobsters it appears to cause a "postural change that has been associated with aggressive behaviour." Research on the neuro-hormone serotonin may also have a significant effect on the commercial lobster industry.

Tapping Wind Power

Britain is to establish a national test centre to speed the development of new machines that will tap what is now believed to be the most attractive source of renewable energy: wind power. The National Wind Turbine Test Centre is being set up by the National Engineering Laboratory on a windy moorland ridge 330 metres above sea level, some nine kilometres from its headquarters at East Kilbride, just outside Glasgow in Scotland. The test site now being constructed has an open outlook on all sides with the land sloping away to the coast some 50 km away. It is planned to have three universal test pads, each capable of taking machines with sweeps or blades up to 20 metres in diameter. A 50-metre high meteorological tower will have wind speed instruments spaced at various heights, and similarly equipped portable masts will be placed immediately up wind of each windmill on test. NEL plans to use the test ground for small and medium-size wind turbines of upto about 100 kilowatts output.

Understanding Labels

A team of researchers at the university of Western Australia, Perth, has been successful in helping children who cannot read differentiate between harmless and dangerous products. Teaching a child who cannot read to understand labels—red triangles, crosses, snakes and skulls—is difficult. The problem is that although young children can be taught their significance, they quickly forget what they stand for. In an experiment, the researchers, Robert Grieve and Eileen Williams, used red crosses and a rather different symbol: the unhappy face of a crying child. They wanted to find out whether a group of children who could not read, could remember what they meant. The research showed that although the children could initially grasp what both indicated with equal ease, within a week a good number had forgotten what the red cross stood for. On the other hand, none of them forgot what the unhappy face meant.

LUCKNOW: Flying squads visiting different centres where high school examinations were in progress have recovered from girl examinees a number of love letters, besides copying material. The flying squads, led by the district schools inspector of Unnao, Mr V. K. Saxena, recovered 16 love letters from the female examinees. Official sources said that these love letters were written during the examination hours—The Times of India (Saeed Akhtar, Lucknow)

BHOPAL: A senior IAS officer of the Madhya Pradesh government purchased books on sex at government expense, it was stated in the Assembly on 28 March. Chief minister Motilal Vora presented the annual report of the Lokayukta, which did not reveal the officer's name, but said he had purchased six books related to "sex and yoga" when he was the director of state lotteries in 1980-81 —Indian Express (G. Chalapathi Rao, Sarapaka, Andhra Pradesh)

MUNGER: The just concluded examinations conducted by the Bihar Secondary Board were certainly a farce where not only money was minted but wayside "Romeos" also had a gala time trying to help their unknown Juliets, even though not called to do so. In the examination centres at Munger, Jamalpur, Lakhisarai, Jamui and other important places, in spite of pucca police bandobust and magistrates on the round, examinees, their guardians, helpers and others enjoyed utmost liberty. Specially for teachers, invigilators and centre superintendents it seemed to be "once in a lifetime" affair—everyone squeezing money right and left. Those who were able to pay Rs 500 (in advance) were offered special improvised rooms with readymade answers and persons to dictate them, sometimes even to write for them. Those who could pay Rs 300 had to manage their own "chits" and those who gave only Rs 200 were not supplied any chits; they had to pay homeguards and constables on duty to bring chits from outside the campus at the rate of Rs 5 per "trip"—The Indian Nation (N. C. Mathur, Patna)

NAGPUR: Can a mechanised vehicle gain weight in one year? It is just possible if the experience of the government servant at the Regional Transport Office on 16 April is any indication. It so happened that this official went to the RTO to pay his annual taxes. When the concerned clerk asked him to give Rs 84 as tax, the official was surprised as he had paid only Rs 60 the preceding year. He asked the concerned clerk the reason for the sudden hike in taxes. The answer given by the clerk shocked the official. The clerk said the weight of the Priya scooter had gone up from 95 kgs (last year) to 105.6 kgs (this year). All the pleas of the official fell on deaf ears and finally he paid the whole amount and walked away in disgust—Nagpur Times (Srinivasan Umashankar, Nagpur)

CALCUTTA: The custodians of the law had a hard time maintaining order within the precincts of Lalbazar on 17 April when an owl perched itself on a ledge outside the police commissioner's window. Hordes of curious passersby gathered below the ledge to watch the owl, disrupting traffic on the premises. Senior police officials were seen sneaking a glance upwards and a sergeant had to be deputed to politely disperse the crowd. In the afternoon, the police used a ladder to try and catch the owl, but hostile moves by the bird thwarted the efforts. The owl remained smugly perched on the ledge till eight in the evening, oblivious of all the excitement—The Telegraph (Praveen Rai, Dhanbad)

BHOPAL: The Bharat Heavy Electricals here, designed to produce equipment for thermal power stations, will now sell vegetables. BHEL's general manager has said it is growing and selling vegetables as a "diversification" of its activities. Three hundred acres of land in BHEL township here have been reclaimed for cultivating vegetables. About 6,000 saplings of fruit trees have also been planted for an orchard—to provide fresh fruits at "reasonable rates" to the BHEL township's residents—Hindustan Times (S. M. Jawed Alam, New Delhi)

The declarer seemed to play this hand well and it was submitted for a brilliancy prize. In fact, he made one rather poor play, and a defender made a small error as well.

Dealer West N–S Vulnerable

	♠ J 8 2 ♥ A J 6 5 2 ♦ 8 7 4 3 ♣ 4
♠ 7 5 4 ♥ 8 4 ♦ K Q 5 2 ♣ A J 6 5	N W E S	♠ Q 10 9 6 ♥ K ♦ A J 9 6 ♣ Q 10 7 3
	♠ A K 3 ♥ Q 10 9 7 3 ♦ 10 ♣ K 9 8 2

The bidding went:

South	West	North	East
—	No	No	1 ♦
1 ♥	2 ♦	3 ♥	No
4 ♥	dble	No	No
No

West led the king of diamonds and switched to a low heart. As this might have been from K x, declarer finessed, losing to the singleton king. A diamond return was ruffed, and after drawing the outstanding trump South played a low club to the 8 and jack. After a diamond ruff, club ruff, and another diamond ruff, the position was:

	♠ J 8 2 ♥ J 6 ♦ — ♣ —
♠ 7 5 4 ♥ — ♦ — ♣ A 6	N W E S	♠ Q 10 9 ♥ — ♦ — ♣ Q 10
	♠ A K 3 ♥ — ♦ — ♣ K 9

South led the king of clubs, forcing a cover; then the last trump squeezed East.
The mistakes? South's trump finesse at trick two was a mistake, because if West has ♥ K he cannot also hold ♣ A; and if East has ♣ A the contract is lay-down. And East made a tiny error when he failed to insert the 10 of clubs on the first round of the suit.

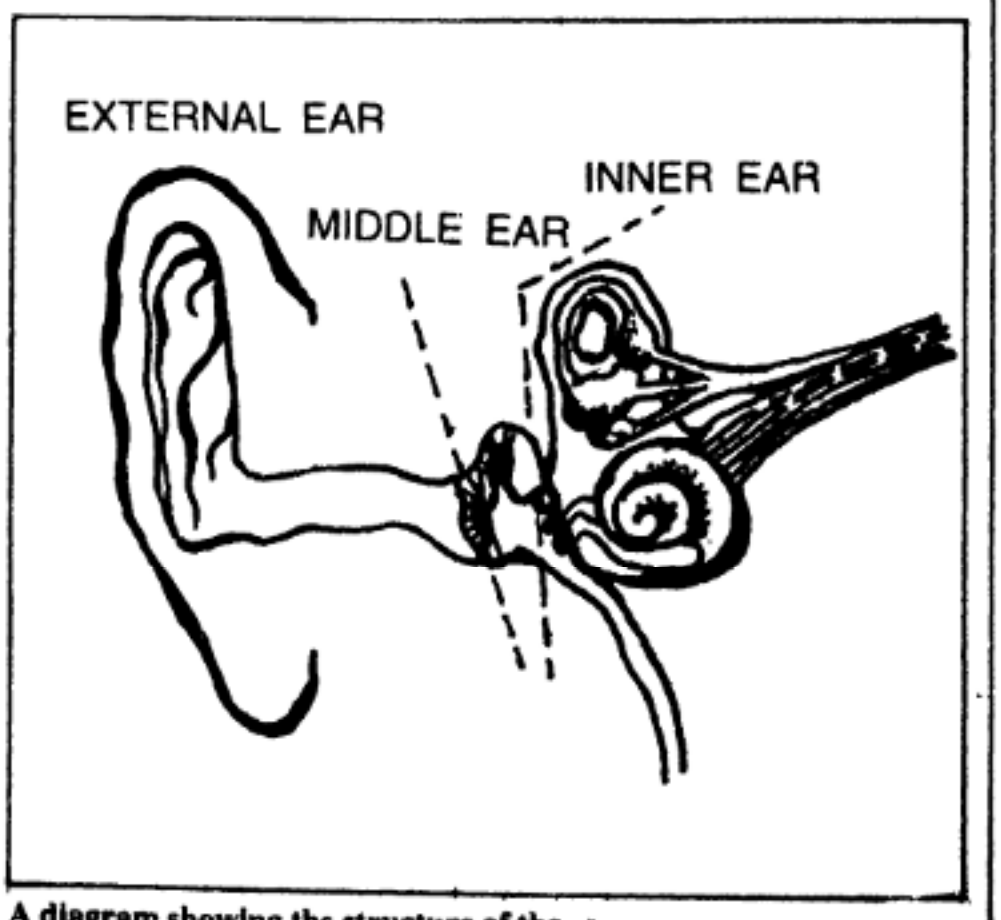
The Importance of Good Hearing



We all know how important good hearing is to our lives. Life would be difficult if we could not hear properly and understand everything we heard. People who are deaf feel that they are a burden: not only to themselves, but also to others. The situation becomes more complicated as the degree of the loss of hearing increases.

Until a few decades ago, it was almost impossible to cure deafness. Today, however, with the aid of modern medicine and advanced technology, it is possible to do so. When the first signs of deafness are suspected, one should consult a specialist who, should the need arise, can refer the patient to an audiologist for a detailed check-up. The specialist will determine:

- Whether the patient really has a hearing loss. If so, what is its degree?
- Where is the problem? In the outer, middle or inner ear?
- What can be done about it? Can his impediment be cured through medicine, surgery or electronic hearing-aids?
- If the patient needs a hearing-aid, what kind of hearing-aid will help him most?
- How should the hearing-aid be fitted?
- How should the hearing-aid be used to learn to listen, follow and express verbally?

From the anatomical point of view, the ear is divided into three parts. These are the external ear, the middle ear and the inner ear. Physiology sometimes prefers to divide the ear into a "conducting part" to which the external and the middle ear belong, and a "perceiving part" comprising the inner ear, the auditory nerve and the brain centre.

Any dysfunction of the external or middle ear in the presence of a normal inner ear is called a "conductive type" of hearing impairment (paracusis willisii). Those suffering from such an ailment speak in a relatively low voice, making it difficult for others to hear them. Such people hear better in the presence of noise. The patients frequently complain of subjective head noises or tinnitus, that may be localised in one ear, in both the ears, or may be unlocalised in the head. Many people who are hard of hearing experience tinnitus every hour of the day. It is one of the most annoying features of impaired hearing. In the case of conductive hearing loss, the tinnitus tends to be of a relatively low frequency. Such diseases can be cured, wholly or partially, by medicine or surgery. In some cases where both medicine and surgery fail, hearing-aids can help.

A diagram showing the structure of the ear

When the loss of hearing is due to something in the inner ear, or along the nerve pathway from the inner ear to the brain stem, the loss is referred to as a "sensori-neural impairment." The patient speaks very loudly and often hears a constant hissing noise of high frequency. He may also have an abnormal perception of loudness: in other words, a slight increase in the sound pressure of a tone is construed as an abnormally large increase in loudness. This is called "recruitment." Generally, a sensori-neural impairment causes some difficulty in understanding speech even if it is amplified.

How does a hearing impairment become noticeable? At first, it is not noticeable at all. It starts slowly, almost imperceptibly: until an accident or an infection reveals it. Since no pain is felt, in many cases, the patient dismisses the initial symptoms from his mind; sometimes, as stated earlier, the patient may blame the speaker for speaking incoherently.

When someone begins to speak indistinctly, swallows his words and changes the constancy of his speech volume, it means that his organs of control are no longer in order, because he can't hear properly. He becomes tired quickly, stops paying attention and seems to lack concentration.

Observation at a very young age can identify deafness in children. If there is delay in learning to speak in spite of normal physical development and they do not respond to sound or speech like normal children, one should suspect a loss of hearing and consult a specialist.

In many cases ailments of the middle ear and the inner ear occur together. An infection in the middle ear may be followed by an inflammation of the inner ear. In such cases a specialist will decide whether a hearing aid or an operation (or both) will be of use.

The attack of gossip magazines against Gulzar continues unabated. But Gulzar is not worried and he has turned a deaf ear to what the filmi journalists write about him. The virulent attack against Gulzar began with his decision to marry Rakhee. "This marriage can never last," declared the Bombay press, and rejoiced when what they had presaged for the couple came true. That was, however, not the end of Gulzar and Rakhee as far as the press was concerned. A spate of "investigative stories" appeared on why the marriage did not last. Why can't the press stop meddling in the private lives of people.

Gulzar, seeing the stories in the press, retorted: "I don't know why they (the filmi press) are so worried about us." Rakhee has, in her own words, just "stopped reading gossip magazines."

Mithun Chakraborty with Vijayeta Pandit: workaholic

After the exit of Amitabh Bachchan from Hindi filmdom, Mithun Chakraborty is holding centrestage. However, a kidney stone has been bothering him for quite some time now and this lanky lad from Bengal is yet to find time for an operation. "If he goes to hospital a number of his producers will go with him," a friend close to Mithun complained.

Mahesh Bhatt and Soni Razdan have hit the headlines again. It all started when Mahesh was looking for a new face to play a key role in Saaransh. He saw many girls but fell for Soni; as the film progressed, the affair grew. In the face of criticism, Mahesh put up a stoic front: "I don't believe in hiding my woman." True, since some time back Mahesh openly boasted of his affair with Parveen Babi But all along there was one silent sufferer: Kiran, Mahesh's wife. "Why should Kiran take things lying down ...She should fight back," is the general feeling in tinsel town.

A philosophy graduate, Priyadarshan is now the most sought after director in Malayalam cinema. His forte is humour and most of his films have been hits He also writes the story and the script of the film he is directing thus saving producers a lot of trouble.

Prominent by her inability to act and by her generous exposure is Rani Padmini who started as a child artiste. From a crying child she graduated to mini-skirts and now to bikinis. But producers offered her only third-rate roles. Recently she got an opportunity to take a role opposite Prem Nazir in Ooyarthezhunelppu which means resurrection. Will it mark her resurrection too?

"Loyal" Bengal Tiger?

Pranab Mukherjee

Why was Pranab Kumar Mukherjee, who represents Gujarat in the Rajya Sabha, made head of the West Bengal PCC(I)? It is said that Mukherjee had raised a hue and cry in party circles, alleging that he was being ignored because he had been loyal only to Mrs Indira Gandhi and did not devote anytime to oil the power machines around Rajiv Gandhi. So, the loyalist, who was trying to masquerade as a rebel, was rewarded with the post in Calcutta. In terms of importance, however, Mukherjee's arch-rival in state politics, A. B. A Ghani Khan Choudhury, still remains higher. He is an all-India general-secretary of the party, entrusted with the organisational work in the state of UP.

Arun Nehru for UP?

The capital's grapevine is rife with stories about chief ministerial changes in Lucknow. The present UP chief minister, Narayan Dutt Tiwari, who was sent from the centre on the eve of the Lok Sabha polls to revamp the party's image, is being tipped for the prestigious post of India's high commissioner in London. The post has been vacant for five months, since the last incumbent, Prakash Mehrotra, resigned. Tiwari may not be too willing to go on a foreign assignment, but if he is offered the job he may not be able to refuse. Reason: the high command's choice of his successor in Lucknow may be the heavyweight politician, Arun Nehru, the minister of state for power in New Delhi. Arun Nehru seems to have made a comeback in the good books of Rajiv Gandhi. While he has lost out in the race to Arun Singh in the game of being close to the Prime Minister, he may be rewarded by being sent to Lucknow. As a minister, Arun Nehru has become popular with the officers in his department. He has started holding monthly meetings with all officers and has been trying to memorise the officers' names. These practices can go a long way in ensuring ministerial efficiency.

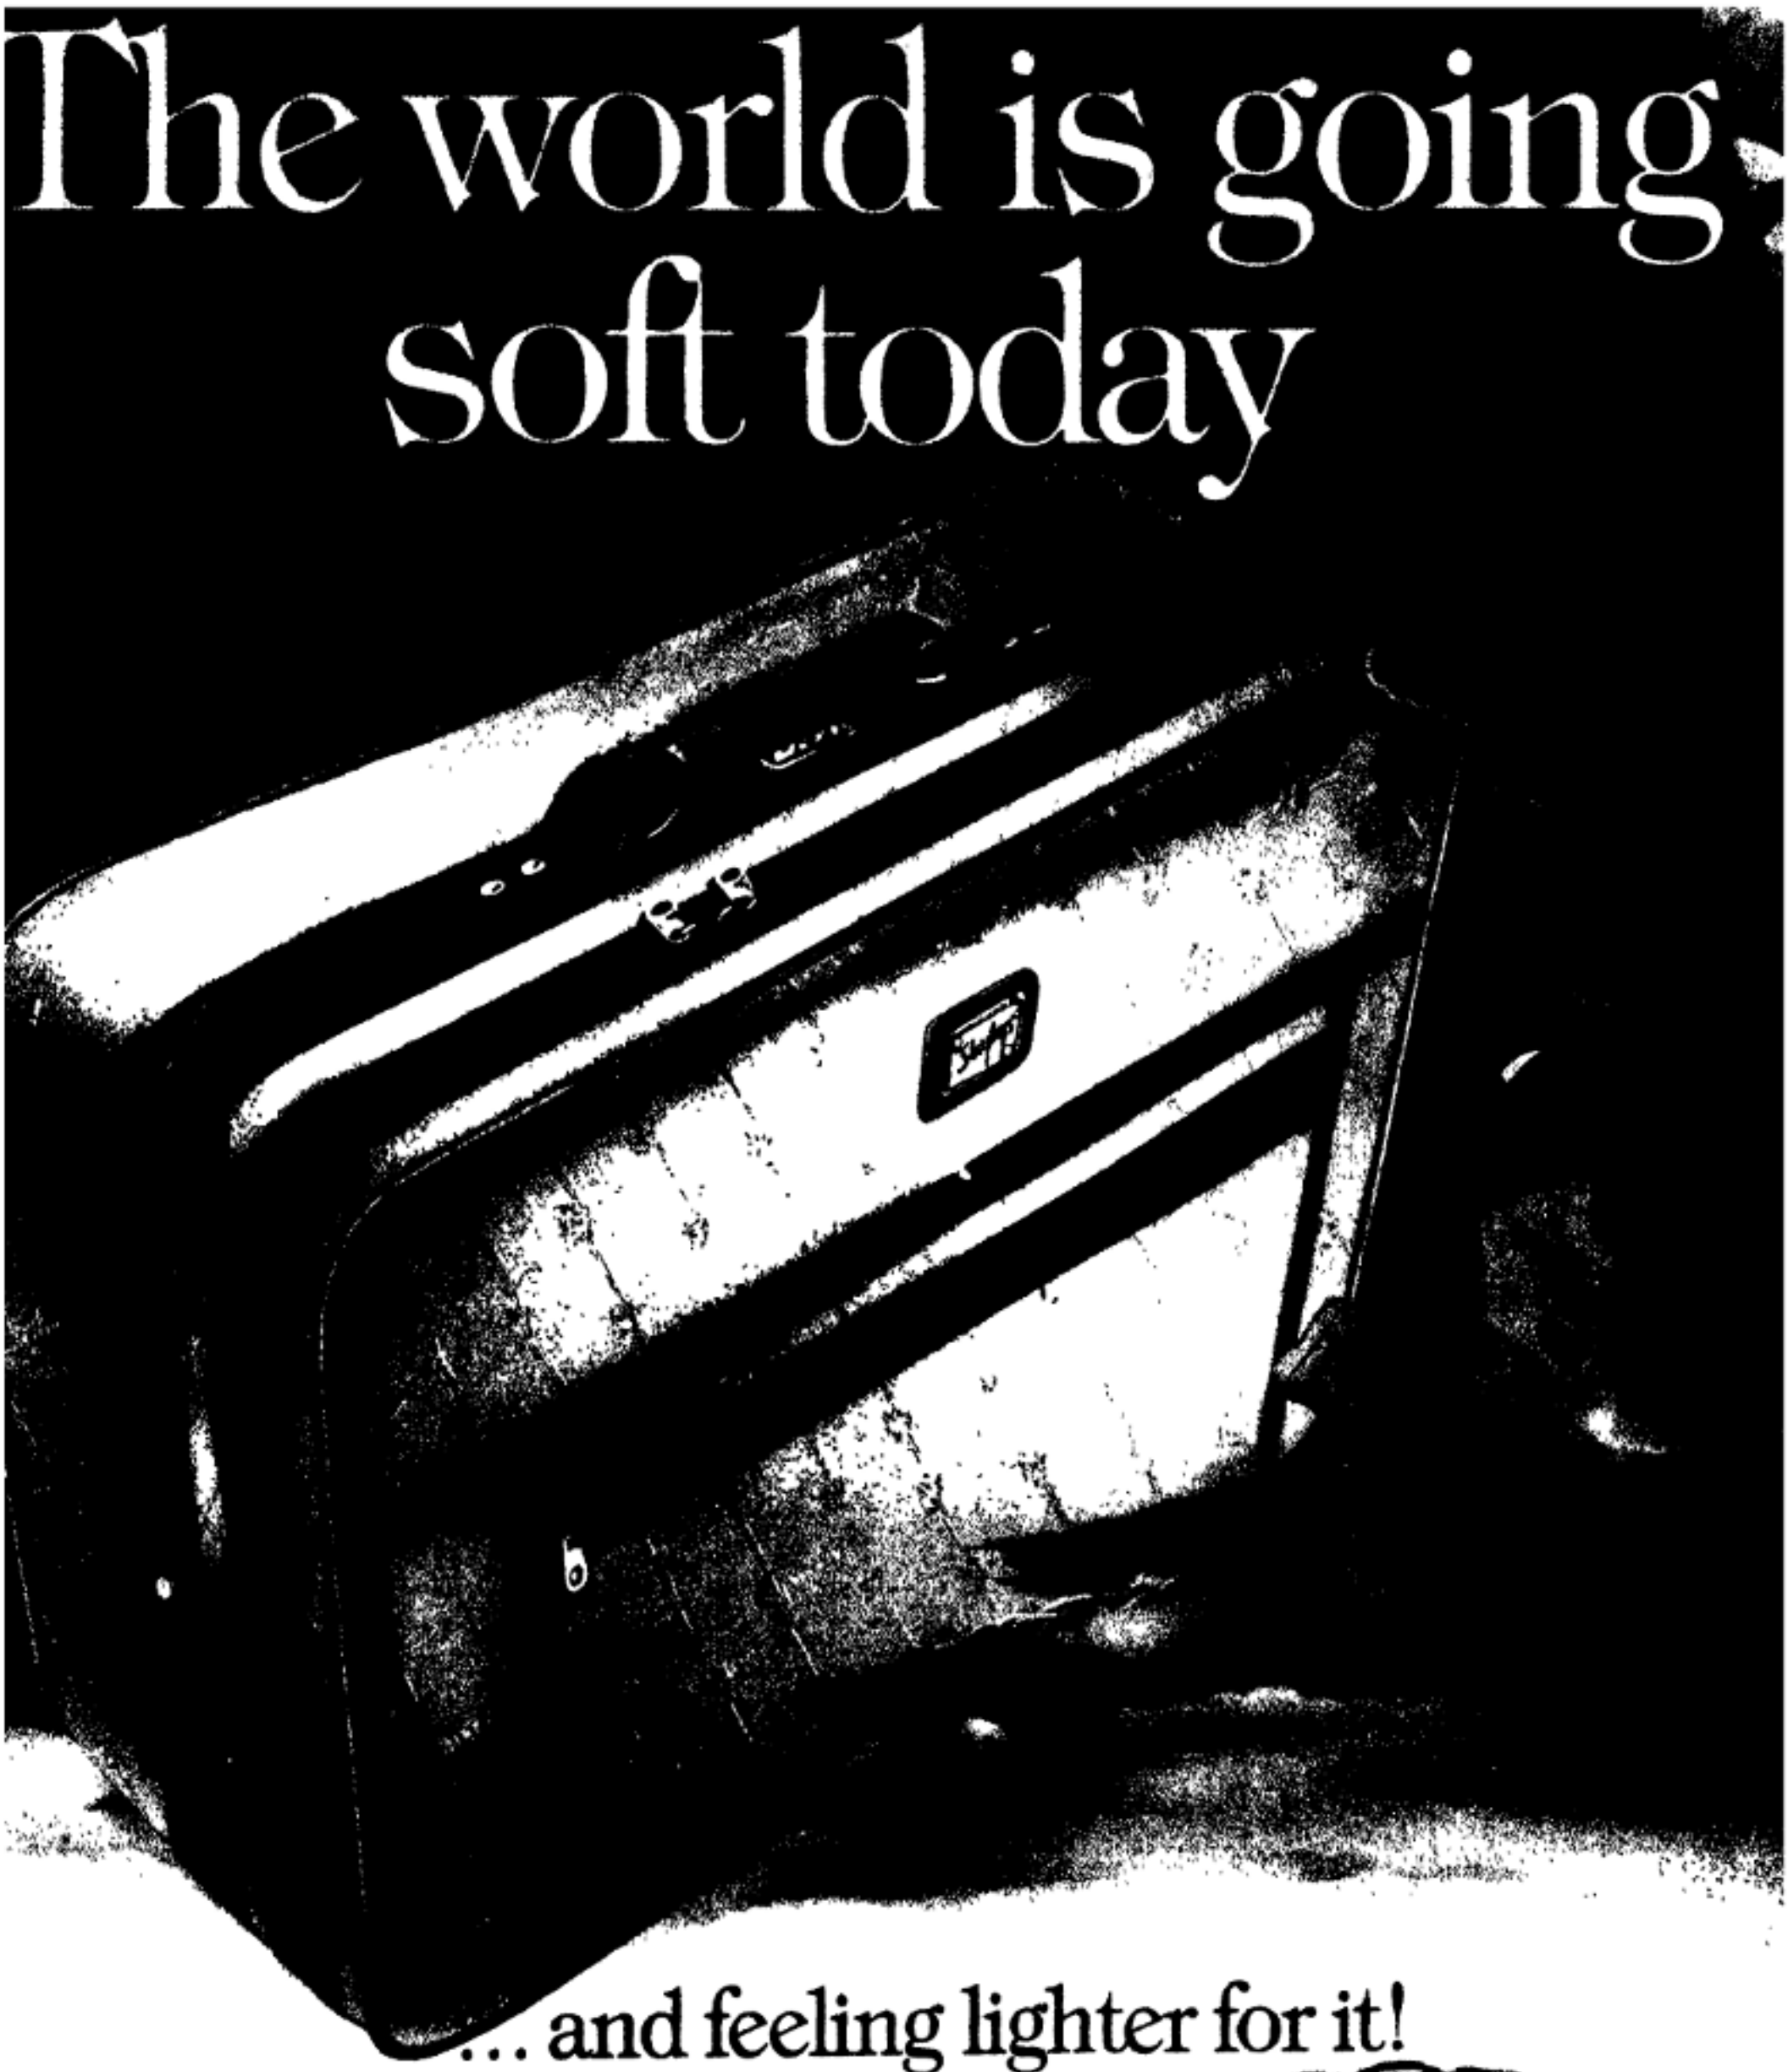
The Third "P"

Rajiv Gandhi had launched his reign with three "P"s around him. His first council of ministers comprised P V Narasimha Rao, P. K. Mukherjee and P Shiv Shanker. Rao is still in the cabinet; Mukherjee has only recently been rehabilitated. But what is the fate of Shiv Shanker? As he lost the elections in Andhra Pradesh, he could not immediately get a berth at the centre. He is presently being tipped for a number of posts, ranging from the ambassadorship in Moscow to the chairmanship of the Press Council of India. (Justice A. N. Grover, the Press Council chairman is to retire this year.) Shiv Shanker, being a former High Court judge, may be considered as Grover's successor, if better things do not happen to him in the meantime.

Nomination Blues

Did you know that a person has been the deputy chief minister of Maharashtra by being a Governor's nominee in the Legislative Council? This fact would not have stood out, but for the controversy regarding the nomination of five MLCs in the state, due to which the chief minister, Vasantdada Patil, is facing rough weather from the powers that be in Delhi. Dada is opposed to the nomination of N. M. Tirpude (a former deputy chief minister) and Pratibha Patil (both are chief ministerial aspirants). He had come to Delhi with a list of five names. The list was dismissed summarily. The raw deal which Dada got in Delhi did not stop with the rejection of his list. He was not granted an appointment with the Prime Minister either. With powerful central ministers like S. B. Chavan, Vasant Sathe and V. N. Gadgil working against him, the Maharashtra CM is having a tough time.



Vasantdada Patil

Temporary CM?

While the chief minister at Lucknow is uncertain about his tenure, his counterpart in Bhopal, Motilal Vora, recently sought assurance from the high command about his "permanency." Both the powerful lobbies in the Madhya Pradesh Congress(I), led by Vidya Charan Shukla and Arjun Singh respectively, had been spreading stories about the temporary nature of Vora's appointment. According to the Shukla camp, their leader would ultimately take over the reins at Bhopal after a couple of months. The Arjun Singh camp, which has as its chief patron the MPCC(I) president, Digvijay Singh, has been propagating that Arjun Singh would return as the minister after the Punjab tangle is "solved"

DATELINE / M.J.Akbar

Bhit Shah, Sind, Pakistan: Let me tell you a story I heard from fakirs, sitting under the stars, the ektara in one hand, the kartal in the other, abandon in their eyes, their saffron robes quietly luminous in the dark of the night, a sereneoval moon lighting up the mango trees, a pond dense with lotus to my right and a little ahead the peaceful power of the shrine of Shah Abdul Latif Bhitai, one of the greatest sufi mystic-poets the world has known. This is the love story of Mumal and Rano; it was put into song by Shah Latif, and captured the heart and imagination of every Sindhi generation since the master sang it in the seventeenth century. But first, repeat this line, and sing its cadence, in an undulating soft lilt: Jeewey, jeewey tu, sada jeewey tu.

Mumal was the most beautiful of the nine daughters of Raja Nand. One day, while hunting, Raja Nand gave chase to a bear. When they reached the river, the Raja thought he had his quarry, but the bear stepped into the river and the water miraculously dried up for the bear to cross. When at last the bear was caught and killed, Raja Nand discovered that the magic lay in the tusks. And from that day he secretly stored his treasure in the bed of the river, using the tusks to dry the river whenever he wanted to visit his hidden treasury.

No one else knew the value of the tusks. One day a beggar came to the palace door and pleaded for a gift of these bear tusks. Mumal, unaware of their worth, gave them away. Raja Nand was furious. In his anger he threatened to kill Mumal. She promised to make up for his lost wealth.

With the help of her sister Sumal and her maidservant Natar, Mumal learnt their art of sorcery. She built a labyrinth with an exquisite palace in the centre, surrounded by a river of red water, Kak, and guarded by four ferocious lions. From this palace, the beautiful Mumal bewitched the world. Kings and nobles, hearing of her beauty and this fabulous palace, came one after another to win Mumal. Each one of them lost his way in the maze, and was destroyed by Mumal who seized their riches to repay her father.

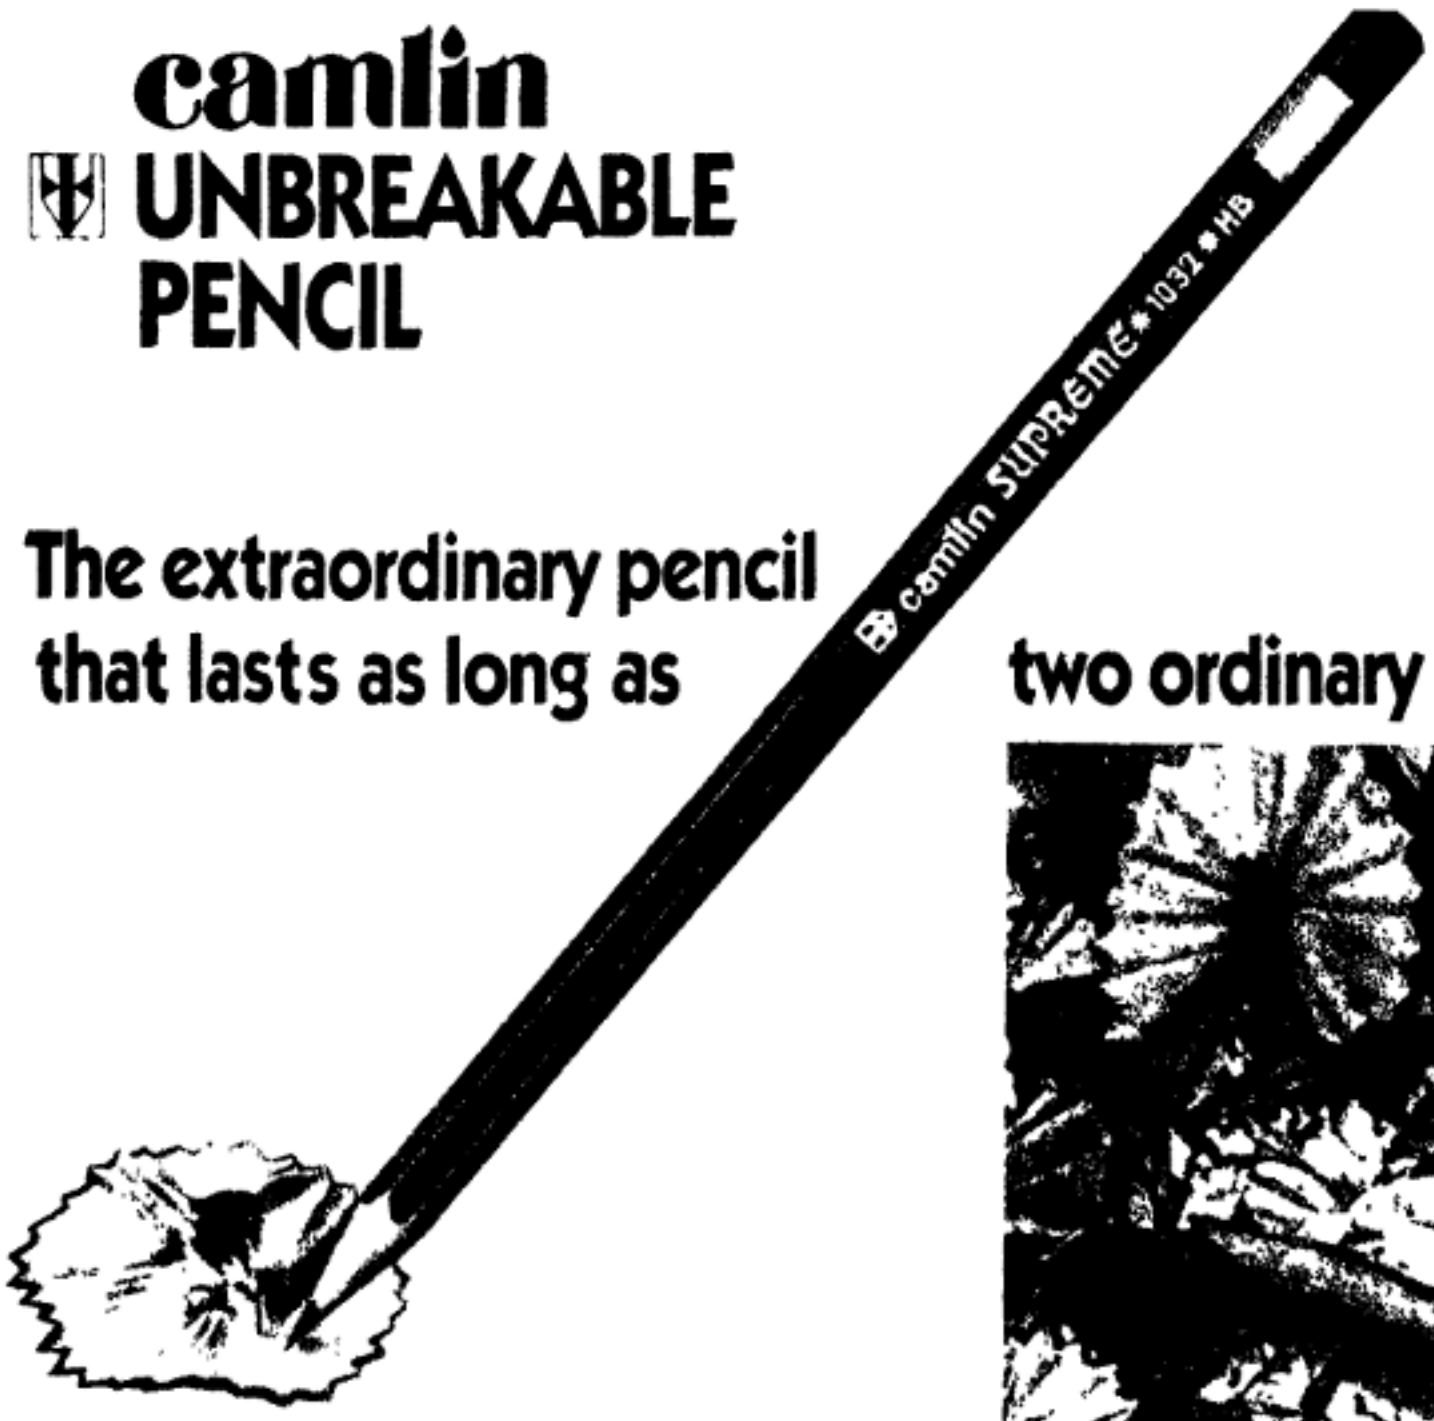
Rana Hamir Sumro, the Sodha Rajput ruler of Umarkot, was out on a hunt one day when he met a fakir in a desert, Sami, and heard the entrancing story of Mumal. The Rana and his three vazirs, among them Rano, could not resist the lure of Kak. They were received and entertained by Natar, who then set the trap. Each was taken to the labyrinth by Natar, who then slipped away so that they too would get lost. It was with difficulty that the Rana and his companions returned to safety. Only Rano managed to get past the trap, he had an advantage—he was squint and saw Natar slipping away. He followed the path she had taken and reached Mumal. He was as handsome as she was beautiful. Overwhelmed by his beauty and his intelligence Mumal fell deeply in love with Rano. They spent the night in each other's arms before Rano rejoined Rana Hamir in the morning and they left for Umarkot, eighty miles away.

The power of love destroyed distance; nothing could keep Rano away from Mumal. Each night he raced on his fastest camel to meet Mumal beyond the Kak. Rano's wounded wife and angry father persuaded Rana Hamir to imprison him so that he might be kept away from Mumal, but Rano was released at the entreaty of his sister who was also Hamir's wife. Rano's father then killed the fast camel, but Rano broke in the camel's child and continued his visits to Mumal.

Now Rano's wife and father turned to the sorceress Sumal to destroy this love. Sumal made Rano lose his way one night, and he had to ask a shepherd for directions. The shepherd showed him the path—and then added, as taught by Sumal, that Mumal had taken on another lover, Sital. Mumal was asleep by the time a disturbed Rano could reach her bedroom. Sumal in the meantime had put on the garb of a man and lain beside her sister. An enraged Rano would have killed both of them, but at the last moment his great love for Mumal prevented him from violence. Instead he left his weapon by her bed and went away, heartbroken.

Mumal learnt of the evil trick the next morning. She sent messenger after messenger, but Rano would not believe her anymore. Desperate, she disguised herself as a jogi and came to visit Rano. How could mere disguise fool a man who had loved so ardently? Rano saw through the appearance but no matter how much Mumal pleaded Rano would not be moved. Mumal her anguish beyond control, now ran to a pyre to commit sati according to her Hindu custom for her Rano had died. When Rano learnt that Mumal was ending her life, he suddenly realised his enormous mistake. He rushed to that pyre, where the flames had begun to envelop Mumal. He cried out for her, but it was too late. There was nothing else to do; Rano walked into the flames to Mumal and they both died in a last embrace.

Jeewey, jeewey tu, sada jeewey tu. Live, Rano and Mumal, live always with us.



Fakir Alhan, with his thick curling beard and passion-deep eyes, his superb voice floating into the air and travelling back centuries even as it pierced forth the future, sang of Rano during that wondrous night at the village of Bhit Shah. And Fakir Ghafoor, with his lean, shaven face and arms flung open to embrace the sky, his head bobbing in rhythm with his dancing feet. They sang of Mumal the lover, the seeker of the Divine; of the Divine Rano; of Kak, the symbol of this world's lures, of the enticing snares of sorcery, of the barriers of the mind, they sang of the lamp that burns through the night in wait for the beloved; of longing, of embrace, of the heady power of a union that consumes all the senses, of distance, of separation, of that strange, insatiable hunger for reunion with the Divine; of error and repentance, and of the final passion in which life itself becomes irrelevant. And they were also singing of Sind. Mumal was Sind, and Rano the dream: and one day when the snares that had been placed by sorcerers around Sind would be overcome, this unique land of love, unity, song and poetry would embrace its dream.

Jeewey, jeewey tu, sada jeewey tu.

...And they were also singing of Sind. Mumal was Sind, and Rano the dream: and one day when the snares that had been placed by sorcerers around Sind would be overcome, this unique land of love, unity, song and poetry would embrace its dream. Jeewey, jeewey tu; sada jeewey tu.

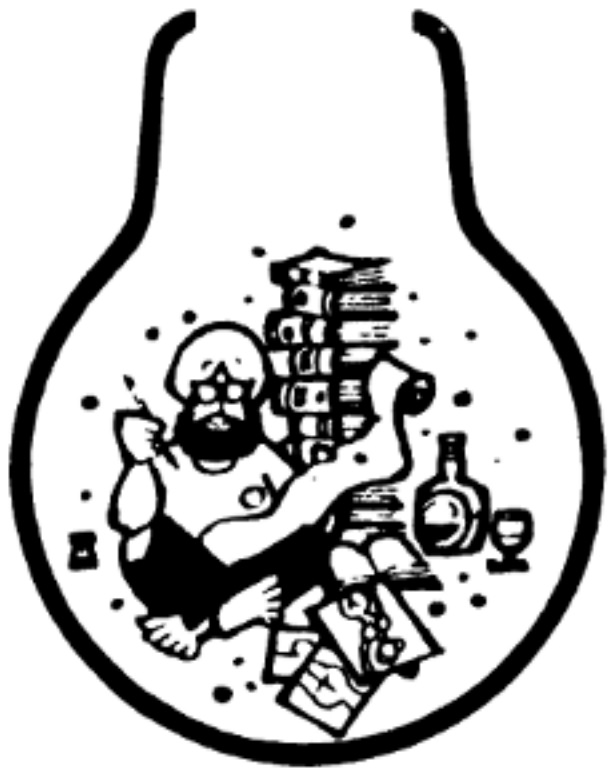
Night of the Full Moon

We sat on the balcony of a suburban villa waiting for the sun to set. Its pale rays enveloped the turret of the revolving restaurant of the Asiad village and then released it into a grey twilight. A light went up in the restaurant. A plane emerged from the eastern horizon with red lights twinkling on its nose and tail and gradually disappeared behind a block of apartments. A few minutes later came another plane followed by yet another like large birds silently winging their way to roost at Palam for the night. The gathering gloom of dusk demanded silence and contemplation. She broke the spell: "What are these trees that have just come into flower? You know these golden-yellow blossoms which hang like chandeliers? They are beautiful," she asked.

"Laburnums," I replied "This time of the year when the sun is at its hottest, nature paints itself in the fieriest of colours: the blazing reds of the Gulmohar and molten-gold lava of the Amaltas. Gaze at them, don't talk about them."

She did not like being snubbed, "Why do you load your head with names of trees, flowers, birds, insects? Just to show off, I bet. 'A thing of beauty is beautiful without having to have a name assigned to it'."

"Indeed! For you a crow and a koel are just black birds. The Indians' total blindness to the phenomenon of nature is appalling. How can you love anything or anyone without knowing their name?"



She relapsed into a sullen silence. A full moon came up over the avenue of Saptaparni trees and bathed the balcony in a milky white mist It was my turn to break the rapture I quoted loudly:

> How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon the bank!
> Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
> Creep in our ears' soft stillness and the night
> Become the touches of sweet harmony.

She retaliated by putting the Moonlight Sonata on her tape-recorder. "Aren't you happy just gazing at the full moon?" I asked, "It is Buddha Poornima."

She looked up at the moon and remarked: "So it is. Can you see the shadow of the eclipse creepingover it?"

A wall of misunderstanding descended between us. "Let us have a drink," I said. "Then I must get home."

Sun Struck

My query about the seemingly eccentric behaviour of the sun did not evoke any response from any of our observatories (perhaps they do not know the answer) nor any astronomer. What I wanted to know is why when the days lengthen or shorten they do not do so with both sunrises and sunsets becoming earlier or later by exactly the same number of seconds or minutes? Apparently the phenomenon had foxed N.B. Hankin of the British High Commission. He has sent me what appears to be the right answer:

The longest day? 21 June of course, or it used to be at school. But have they mucked it about since? Sunrise on the 21st was at 0524, but as far back as 3rd June it was a full minute earlier. All very puzzling. From the Rashtriya Panchang, the official Indian calendar, I learned that sunrise here at its earliest is static at 0523 hours IST during the 16 days from 3 to 18 June. But the sun does not set at its latest, 1923 hours, until the period 26 June to 6 July, by which last date sunrise has advanced winterwards to 0529 hours.

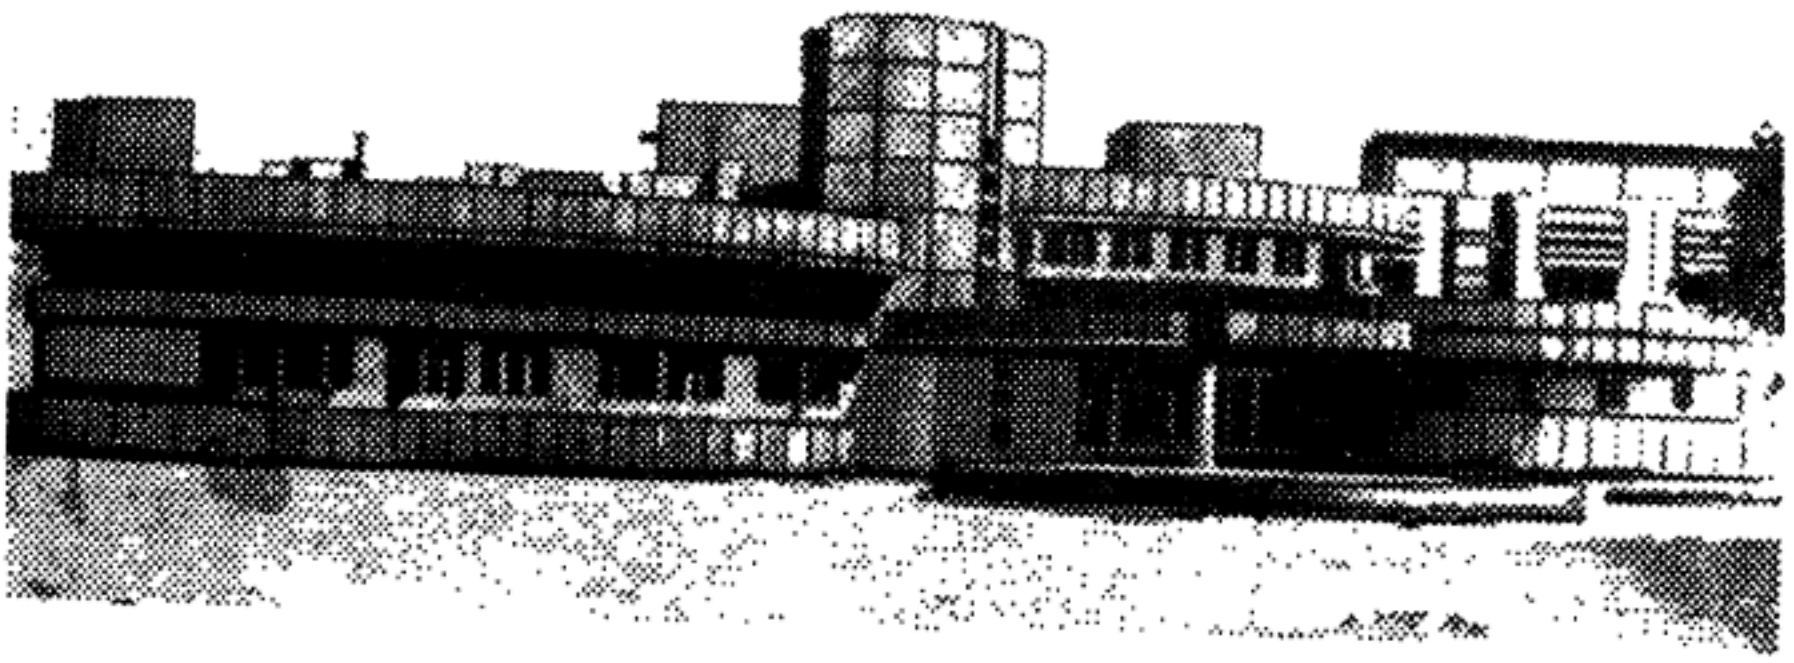
On each of the ten days from 17 to 26 June we can enjoy 13 hours and 58 minutes of sunlight. Of this period, we must assume that the median day is marginally the longest and this turns out to be the 21st. thus confirming the rule—so they could count, those old boys.

Also on the 21st, the sun reaches its northern limit of travel directly overhead on the earth's surface for a few minutes at local mid-day, thus positioning the Tropic of Cancer in India on a latitude just north of Bhopal, some 360 miles south of Delhi. There are a number of reasons why the day is not tidily and equally disposed each side of noon. One is that IST is not true sun or meridional time for the longitude of Delhi (it is actually "mean" or average sun time for 82° 30 D, a north south line some 14 miles west of Varanasi, representing a proximate "time middle" of India Mean suntime midday in Delhi is 1221 hours IST) Another reason follows from the use of the word "mean." Local time noon is an average time, from which the actual moment of the sun's daily zenith can vary from month to month by as much as plus or minus 16 minutes Yet another is the atmospheric refraction of light so that when you think you are seeing the final moments of sunset, the topmost rim of the sun has already gone round the bend, about 3½ minutes earlier in fact and is 3 minutes of arc below the horizon

Mango Fever

It has broken out in epidemic form all over the country As usual it first manifested itself in Dravidistan and travelled in stages to the Konkan. What delays its spread is that southern Indian mangoes though pumpkin-sized and juicy are without character; and the much vaunted Alfonso from Maharashtra as artificial and as expensive as living in Bombay: rupees five per piece It is only when orchards in Uttar Pradesh begin to yield their harvest that mango fever is in full swing A new variety more delicious in taste and texture than the last comes in the market every week: Sandhuri, Langda, Safeda, Saharanpuri, Dussehri, Malda, Samar Bahisht, Rataul And so it goes till the end of the monsoon

Many poets have praised mango as the king of fruits My favourite is Akbar Ilahabadi (1846—1921). He was a lawyer, a sessions judge, a friend of Sir Syed Ahmed, founder of the Aligarh Muslim University and the wittiest of Urdu poets, all rolled in one I produce a rough translation of his hankering for his favourite fruit:



> No news I need nor messages from my beloved friend,
> This season if you must, mangoes you may send
> Some I can eat at once, others when I may,
> If twenty are ripe, ten I'll keep for another day
> Your slave's address you know; it is the same
> Send them directly to Allahabad in my name,
> But pray do not write to say and be so rash
> "Letter received; first let me have the cash."

Why the Police Ran Amok

The Ahmedabad police control room has lived up to its name: on 22 April it ensured that the various units of the force spread out over the city moved into action, concertedly not to check crime but to commit it. Apparently messages to and from the control room are either taped or can be taped. And someone did tape them that day, for I heard them. On the tape there appeared to be only one policeman's voice.

The relevant portion begins with the information that a certain head constable had been killed in the Rajpur area and that Rs one lakh had been "sanctioned" (as relief to the bereaved family). There is a long pause and disturbance after that; then the messages, sent out to all units, instructing policemen to assemble at the Astodia police station. The voice then exhorts them to proceed from there to the office of Gujarat Samachar, which had been critical of the police. I checked with the police authorities in Ahmedabad if such a message could have emanated from the control room without the knowledge of senior officers. They showed me how by pressing a button on the microphone, the channel to officers could be blocked. Perhaps that was what had happened when the Ahmedabad police revolted (the state government characterises the revolt as a "commotion") between noon and 9 pm on 22 April and the entire government machinery came to a halt.

Following the message, half the city's 3,000-strong force assembled in front of the Astodia police station, most of them in plainclothes. The police union leaders (Gujarat is next to Bihar in terms of the number of police unions in a state) addressed the assembled policemen. A Times of India car passing through that area was attacked by the policemen; its glass panes were broken and a reporter inside the car was injured. At V.S. Hospital, where the body of the head constable was brought for postmortem, a large number of policemen had gathered. Some journalists present there were beaten up. Opposite V.S. Hospital is the town hall, where nearly 30 women, some of them from rich families, were on a one-day fast in protest against the "atrocities" committed by police in Khadia, in the heart of the city, a few days earlier. These women were beaten up: Scooters and bicycles in the area were burnt and the passing cars were smashed.

At the nearby M.J. Library a municipal Matador van driver was asked to carry a number of policemen, all in plainclothes, to the Gujarat Samachar office. They set the building on fire, going about their job quite methodically, as if the entire operation was pre-planned. Fire brigade men were not allowed to extinguish the fire until the press was gutted. The office of the Western Times, an English daily, housed in the same building was also burnt. The policemen then went to the Indian Express building on Mirzapur Road and shouted that the paper would meet the same fate as Gujarat Samachar. However, here the policemen met with resistance: both Hindus and Muslims in the area fought. Then the troops arrived.

How do the top brass of the Gujarat police explain the police revolt? The force was exhausted; they had to be on their toes since Mrs Gandhi's assassination in October last year. There had also been criticism of their conduct and when one of their men was killed, they had lost control over themselves. Hence the unruly behaviour.

There may be some truth in this version. But it still does not justify what the police did. However sensitive they might have become to what they felt was unfair criticism, and however much they might have come to live in a world of their own, having lost touch with the public, they should have known that the murder of the head constable was the act of an individual—not even a mob. Why then did they attack members of the public in such a way?

Whether it was police commissioner Jha's ultimatum that he would ask for another posting or the threat that the army would take over that brought the policemen back to sanity, it is clear that the policemen are sure that no action will be taken against them. The Gujarat police believed they were on the side of the government and that they would come to no harm if they acted against people on the "opposite side." And they seem to be right; there has been no condemnation by the authorities of what the police did; not one policeman had been questioned about the incidents, let alone be suspended.

The Gujarat police believed they were on the side of the government and that they would come to no harm if they acted against people on the "opposite side." And they seem to be right; there has been no condemnation by the authorities of what the police did.

The question now is how to retrieve the force; how to keep it insulated from the pressures of competing ideologies and political battles between the ruling and opposition parties. Perhaps the answer lies in the concluding lines of an Intelligence Bureau note on the police's morale: "The police forces in the states and at the centre require more detailed attention. The tendency to gloss over problems and particularly the more complex ones, has to be overcome. Viable solutions in keeping with the prevailing social and political ethos need to be devised if the machinery and framework of policing in this country has to be maintained."

However, for what happened recently in Gujarat it would be hard not to condemn the whole police force. We should recognise the fact that politicians are more culpable than the policemen. They have tried to use them to serve either their own selfish ends or the interests of their parties.

Democracy Denied

The cover story on the political unrest in Kashmir was informative and thoughtful (Outlaws and In-laws, 28 April—4 May) Shubhabrata Bhattacharya had raised a pertinent question: Will Kashmir burn? The evil designs of the Congress(I) have ruined the economy of the state. The Congress(I)'s original plan was to split the National Conference and come to power. But the people of the state have foiled such attempts by voting en masse for Farooq Abdullah in the last parliamentary elections and I am sure that if Assembly elections are announced, G.M. Shah and his party will be wiped out. Rajiv Gandhi should honour the people's verdict.

Bimabihari Mishra, Rourkela

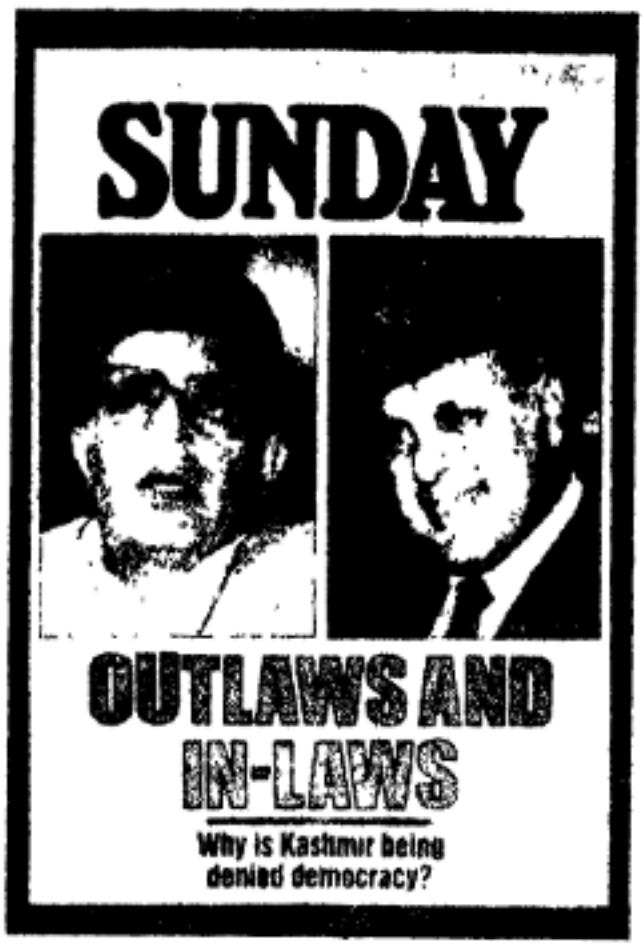
• Shubhabrata Bhattacharya exposed the double dealings of the Congress(I). The author rightly pointed out that in secular India, religion should be separated from politics.

Mansoor Ahmad, Calcutta

• The present political climate in Kashmir might provoke anti-social and anti-national elements to take the upper hand. The government should take emergent steps to restore stability in the sensitive state.

Tushar Chakraborty, Haldibari (WB)

• Farooq Abdullah is quite justified in starting a movement to persuade the central government to dismiss the government of G.M. Shah. The people of Kashmir have been forced to take to the streets since the centre is denying democratic rights to the people of the state. Farooq Abdullah had demonstrated on more than one occasion that he is the unquestioned leader of the Valley, yet the Congress(I) has propped up the government of G.M. Shah. Punjab, Assam and Gujarat are burning. Is it Kashmir's time to explode?



Prabodh Govind, New Delhi

• When political expediency is placed above propriety, then the resentment in Kashmir must be expected to take its course.

Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

• G. M. Shah's days are numbered and he should quit in an honourable way. Farooq Abdullah represents the aspirations of the people of Kashmir and it is only fair that he should be restored as the CM of the state. The Machiavellian tactics of the centre have been exposed.

Arvinder Singh Walia, Calcutta

Sex and Morality

The Cloistered Passion of Radha and Krishna (21—27 April) was a delightful diversion from hackneyed politics. The atmosphere evoked in the article, punctuated with lyrics, was indeed a treat.

Arindam Sen, Karimganj (Assam)

• The article surpasses all limits of morality. Such pieces where adultery, pre-marital sex and homosexuality have been glorified will pollute the minds of the young.

H.T. Hussain, Hyderabad

• I took exception to the article and the highly provocative pictures. The authors should have sent the piece to a western pornographic magazine. The paintings were also objectionable. Islam rightly forbids paintings of the prophet and bans any article or book which might defame the religion. Hinduism should follow suit.

Ranita Ray, New Delhi

Privileged Firms

That SUNDAY is always a few steps ahead of its competitors was once again proved by the brilliant exposure, A Sweet Deal in Orissa (14—20 April). In Orissa firms which are in the good books of the government are allowed to go away with not only not paying electricity dues but other taxes also. The sufferer is the common man.

Manikyeswari Mohanty, Rairangpur (Orissa)

Popular Columns

In his letter captioned The Answer Within (Opinion, 28 April—4 May), Swraj Paul ventures to ask whether the weekly columns of Khushwant Singh and Kuldip Nayar are thrust upon the readers of SUNDAY. I wonder what made Mr Paul think that the writings of the two seasoned columnists were losing popularity. Many SUNDAY readers do love the sweet and sour gossiping of Khushwant Singh and the mature comment on political events by Kuldip Nayar. SUNDAY readers of my locality nourish a similar opinion.

K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• If going through the write-ups of Khushwant Singh and Kuldip Nayar is a suffering, as Swraj Paul calls it, then I welcome such suffering in future. Most of the intellectuals in our country today enjoy the patronage of the ruling party with the result that most of the crimes committed by the party in power go unreported. It is only because we have such persons like Mr Nayar and Mr Singh that a semblance of justice is meted out. Maybe Mr Paul's book, Indira Gandhi, emphasises his convictions to oblige the power that be in New Delhi.

S. Ganesh, New Delhi

Dispensable Beings

The detailed report on the Bhopal tragedy and its implications made absorbing reading (The Cover-up, 7—13 April). In effect the tragedy can only be compared to the Hiroshima catastrophe. It seems that the giant US multinational has no heart and it is deliberately prolonging compensation.

K.V. Nalinakshan, Hoshiarpur

• The in-depth cover story on the aftermath of the Bhopal gas tragedy was timely. It was surprising that a reputed multinational like the UCC has scant regard for human lives. I wonder what the fate of the company would have been had the incident occurred in the USA. I think that they rate the people of the Third World as dispensable. Stern action should be taken against the UCC so that the multinationals operating in India would be more careful in future.

S. Umesh Naidu, Sindri

• The photographs of the victims of the gas tragedy were touching.

Bhakta Pandey, Dibrugarh

A Bluff Master

SUNDAY wasted valuable space by giving undue publicity to a known fraud (Swami Sadachari: The Fraud Machine, 28 April—4 May). The swami's so-called miracles or his meeting with the British and American heads of state are all absurd.
Subhojeet Bose, New Delhi

• The special report on Swami Sadachari exposed the fraud. The blind faith and illiteracy of the Indian people are responsible for the Swami's popularity. However, the fake godman may use the article in his favour. The new Prime Minister has taken the right step by deciding not to patronise swamis and saints.
Surya Narayan Singh, Bombay

• The special report was amusing. The great bluff master has no equal in the world. Indians are known for their blind faith and hence the mushrooming of fraud swamis.
V.N. Narayanaswamy, Madras

• It is a pity that frauds like Swami Sadachari enjoys political patronage. If he had the powers to convert water into petrol then India would have been a far richer nation.
B. Ganesh, Jamshedpur

• At a time when our country is agog with political activity, I wonder why SUNDAY chose to give publicity to a cheat. The government should take appropriate steps against such sadacharis and brahmacharis.
S.C. Malakar, Agra

Wanted: Laws to Control Pollution of Ganga

SUNDAY's concern for the Ganga was justified and timely (The Polluted Ganga: From Eternity to Here, 21—27 April). The warning in the article should be noted by all concerned. However, I was happy to learn that Rajiv Gandhi had taken personal interest to clean the Ganges.
Dinesh Kumar Choudhury, Digboi (Assam)

• There was a time when the waters of the Ganga possessed curative powers. But that is past: now the reverse is true. Any one using the waters of the sacred river is sure to contact some deadly disease, such is the extent of the pollution. Hundreds of thousands of people live along the banks of the river and use its waters and it is only natural that the government should do something to clear up the mess. The formation of the Central Ganga Authority is a step in the right direction.
M.H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

• It is time the ancient saying, 'As pure as the Ganga' underwent a modification. It should now read: 'As dirty as the Ganga.'
S.S. Raju, Bombay

• The health hazards posed by the polluted Ganga as reported in SUNDAY were alarming. Laws should be enacted to prevent pollution of the Ganga.
Subal Chandra Saha, Malda (WB)

• Man more than anything else is responsible for polluting the Ganga. It is indeed ironic that we are misusing a river from which we draw sustenance. Unless the people, the pilgrims in particular, are made conscious of the ill-effects of the pollution, no plans can ever restore the purity of this river.
Pradeep Kumar Basak, Karauli (Rajasthan)

• Varanasi has time and again been hit by epidemics as a result of the pollution of the Ganga but the authorities have so far turned a Nelson's eye to the problem. I appeal to the government to set up a commission to enquire into the pollution of not only the Ganga but other rivers as well.
G.V. Phanirajkishore, Hyderabad

• This has reference to Yubaraj Ghimire's report on the pollution of the Ganga in Bihar (A River in Peril). It seemed that the author was not fully aware of the integrated programme on the Ganga basin. Bhagalpur university has undertaken a detailed ecological study of the Ganga since 1976. The pollution caused by the industries around Mokama-Barauni has been highlighted by the Bhagalpur university team and the state government has served notices to these industries under the prevention and control of water pollution act. The correspondent was also unaware of the fact that the study of Ganga from Munger to Farakka has been entrusted to the Bhagalpur university.
Sunil Choudhury, Bhagalpur

• A river considered sacred and worshipped by millions is being desecrated by man. The thousands of people living along its banks as well as the industries is polluting the Ganga. One need just visit Varanasi to see how blind faith can play havoc.
Kartikeswar Behera, Keonjhar (Orissa)

Bhagwan's Bhavna

The news report, Is Rajneesh Coming Back? (28 April—4 May) was disappointing to say the least. Ritu Sarin is not aware of the philosophy and teachings of Bhagwan Rajneesh. In the course of the article, the author writes that the followers of Rajneesh are trying to recruit members from India. This is not true since the Rajneeshes do not believe in conversion.
Swami Jaiprakash Bharti, Chandigarh

• The article is full of distorted facts. The author writes: "The Bhagwan has plans to set up a commune in India." There is already one commune, the Neo-Sannyas Commune at Rajneeshdham. Moreover, the Pune ashram was not vacated because of "vituperative attacks from Indian authorities," but due to the failing health of Bhagwan Rajneesh.
Swami Satya Anuragi, New Delhi

Communal Colour

This has reference to Balraj Madhok's caustic letter in response to M.J. Akbar's article, The Spreading Kesari (Opinion, 28 April—4 May). Thank God that we belong to the same 'tribe' as Mr Akbar. At least we do not sport Kesari, the 'colour of the soldiers of Hindustan' and then sell our country's secrets for a handful of money and a bottle of booze. Thank God that we are not coming 'nearer to our Hindu roots,' like the Sikhs who can revel by gunning down a defenceless woman.

Yes, Mr Madhok, we are Muslims as well as Indians, and proud of that. The green that we see is that of the towering mountains and the vast fields of our country, unlike you and your tribe.
Ali Reza Zaidi, New Delhi

A Clarification

This has reference to Stanley Pinto's letter, Misquoted (Opinion, 12—18 May). Our apologies to Mr Pinto, Mr Alyque Padamsee and Hindustan Lever. The mistake occurred in the transmission of the copy. The original quoted Mr Pinto as saying, "Alyque Padamsee is the father of as many Hindustan Lever successes as the Hindustan Lever itself." In the transmission the word "successes" was missed and Mr Pinto was quoted as saying that "Alyque Padamsee was the father of Hindustan Lever itself."

THE SANT'S REVENGE

M.J. AKBAR explains the background to last week's outrage in Delhi

Boulevard Road in Delhi is lined with many kinds of justice. There are the Tis Hazari courts where each day hundreds of criminals, both alleged and proven, are given some measure of punishment or relief. On the street are the bungalows of the judges, houses which are one kind of compensation to a judge for having exchanged the lucrative pastures of a legal practice for the modest salary given to one who must make decisions. And not very far from the courts and hospital and bungalows is a building which symbolises the chaos of street justice: the morgue. It is here that the cadavers thrown up by the many forms of violence in the city are gathered so that the record of anger and revenge can be entered in the books before the body is lost to dust or fire. It was in this morgue that the victims of last year's riots were brought in piles, and impromptu shops selling white linen sprang up overnight. On the second Friday and Saturday of May another round of bodies came—victims of the terror perpetrated by the children of the dead Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, the secessionists who are determined that there will be no peace in the Punjab except the peace of the graveyard.

The most dangerous phase in the Punjab crisis is always the eve of a settlement. This is when the Khalistani element within the Akali spectrum must make yet another move to sabotage any hope of an agreement since harmony would both isolate it and make it irrelevant. By late April, the Punjab crisis was finally moving towards a resolution. Sant Harchand Singh Longowal, in the weeks since his release, had become the voice of Sikh anger at Operation Bluestar and the riots following the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. But even as in gurdwara after gurdwara and village after village he rallied the Sikhs, he also enabled the community to give expression to its pent-up feelings—a necessary precondition to any settlement.

On its side, the government ignored the pressure from the hard anti-Sikh lobby within its own party and did all that it could possibly do to assuage the community's feelings. The relief that had already been handed out was the largest ever given since 1947, and the crores that had been spent were beginning to have an effect. (A comparison with the thousands who suffered in the Assam violence for instance would show the difference.) A judicial enquiry was ordered into the riots, the ban on the All India Sikh Students Federation lifted and the Akali leaders were gradually released. Sant Longowal, in the meantime, rounded off his tours with a visit to Delhi which became a personal triumph for him and showed that he had become a genuinely popular leader of the Sikhs. This is when the alarm bells began ringing furiously in the Akali Dal. The extremists realised that Sant Longowal, who had consistently rejected any idea of separation, now had generated the confidence to reach a settlement with Delhi And of course some of Sant Longowal's peers in the Akali Dal simply became jealous of the fact that he had become the most popular Sikh leader He had, so far, been given the title of "Dictator" of the Akali morcha but in practice was far from being one: the decisions were collective. Now he could, in fact, live up to his title.

By April, quiet consultations between Sant Longowal, the opposition leaders and the union government had set the stage for a settlement of the Punjab problem. The Prime Minister's initiative in bringing opposition leaders, and genuinely concerned independents like Khushwant Singh into the negotiation process was paying off When he came to Delhi Sant Longowal assured everyone that he would send a letter outlining the final Akali demands by 6 May This letter would have been discussed at the meeting between the Prime Minister and the opposition leaders and a solution found by the end of May– that is, before the first anniversary of Operation Bluestar. This was the situation which the extremists were determined to destroy.

The game had two purposes. The first was to sabotage Sant Longowal's preeminence, and bring him down enough pegs to ensure that he did not settle with Delhi. The second part of the plan was to resurrect fear and hate in Hindu-Sikh relations. Baba Joginder Singh, father (and heir!) of Sant Bhindranwale was the principal weapon in the first operation. And the "transistor bombs," aimed not only at arbitrary murder but also communal riots, were the weapons of the second plan.

Sant Longowal, in his efforts to appease even the extremists, had himself given credibility to Baba Joginder Singh—and it was not the first time in his life that the Sant had made such a mistake. However, Baba Joginder Singh used the "authority" he had been given to bring about panthic unity to pull the rug from under Sant Longowal's feet. In a statement which took most people by surprise he "dissolved" the Akali leadership and announced an ad hoc committee Sant Longowal fought back, and it was quickly clear that the overwhelming majority in the Akali Dal was behind him, and he would easily win the showdown marked for 17 May. Rather than expose their weakness a compromise was effected which saved extremist face. But there was no doubt that the Sant had been sabotaged, he was not the leader he was before the Baba Joginder Singh move.

And then the bombs took over. At nearly three dozen points in Delhi, Meerut, Sirsa, Hissar, Ambala, Alwar and Kanpur death came to unsuspecting poor people who thought that providence had sent them transistors. But, as in their effort to unseat Sant Longowal, they were only half successful. This time the people defeated the extremists. They had calculated that this outrage would inflame Hindu passions sufficiently to cause a communal back lash. The children of Bhindranwale are in desperate need of another communal riot now—they need a fresh demand, they need fresh sores, they need fresh material for the rhetoric which can fuel their dream of Khalistan, they need a fresh excuse for the continuation of the golden pipeline of funds from the rich gurdwaras in London and America and Canada But there was no backlash—except of the necessary kind, a tougher crackdown on those who would mistake generosity for weakness.

But in one thing the secessionists have succeeded: enough confusion has been created to stall any solution. The Akalis are in disarray, unsure of who is who, or indeed, who is where. The talks with Delhi, nurtured so carefully by the government, the opposition and the Sant, must now be rearranged. The inheritors of the venom of Sant Bhindranwale have once again prevented a chapter from being closed.

The Communalists Who Failed

Despite the provocation, Delhi remained calm

When the sun set over the capital on Friday 10 May, no one could have guessed that by sunrise on Saturday terrorists would create panic in the city. In an action reminiscent of the tactics adopted by the Irish Republican Army (IRA) in the United Kingdom, Sikh extremists set up a series of booby traps which exploded at 15 places all over the city on the evening of 10 May. Some more "transistor bombs" exploded in the early hours of Saturday. The death toll, which was 25 on 10 May rose to 42 the next evening. The victims were not on the extremists' "hit list." They were ordinary people, commuters in buses and slum-dwellers. With the extremist elements, represented by Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale's father, Baba Joginder Singh taking over the reins of the Akali Dal, the bomb attacks in Delhi were an indication of the shape of things to come.

The extremists have never reflected the popular mood in the Sikh community. But the gurdwaras were allowed to be misused till Operation Bluestar in June last year. Unfortunately the activities of the Sikh extremists ultimately cost the Sikh community dearly. The scars of the madness which overtook human sensibilities following the assassination of Mrs Indira Gandhi being too fresh, more than the panic of the "transistor bombs," the fear of communal clashes gripped the capital. This time the government was extra-vigilant. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi personally took charge of the control room and in swift manoeuvres, the government outwitted the terrorists. The Sikh extremists' plans were not merely to create arson in public transport buses and in the slums, but also to create communal tension in the city. When Rajiv Gandhi had taken over as the Prime Minister on 31 October 1984, for a while his administration could not come to grips with the situation and the resultant chaos in the capital and in many cities of north India followed in early November. Not so in May 1985. The army was swiftly called out of the cantonments and told to stand by to aid the civilian administration. In some spots, which had witnessed communal frenzy in November, army patrols were also sent out. Delhi remained calm and peaceful though the embers of communal hatred, legacy of the incidents after Mrs Gandhi's death, still smouldered.

Army patrols moving into Delhi on 11 May

The day after the blasts, 11 May, was a second Saturday, a holiday for central government offices. The impact of the bomb blasts on the commuters in public buses, therefore, could not be judged that morning. By the afternoon, however, the buses were overcrowded. Since the auto-rickshaws of Delhi had been off the roads for sometime due to a strike, the buses were the only means of transport for those who did not own vehicles and could not afford the taxi fares. The occupancy of the buses on 11 May afternoon showed that the Delhiwallah had not been scared by the "transistor bombs." However, while the people cooperated fully with the administration, confusion in the city was created by official sources only. On Sunday morning, newspapers carried reports that no packets, not even lunch boxes, would be allowed inside the public buses. The newsitem had the authority of sources in the Delhi Transport Corporation; fortunately, Monday's papers contradicted the news, this time on the authority of Prem Kumar, the DTC chairman. On Sunday, however, commuters complained that they had been harassed by the bus conductors, who would not allow any handbag-gage, despite the commuters submitting their packets and bags for inspection. Confusion created by official agencies on grim days like the one which Delhi witnessed on 11 and 12 May, cannot be overlooked. Apparently, despite the Prime Minister having taken charge of the control room, someone was goofing up downstream.

The booby traps set up by the extremists in various places in north India went off almost simultaneously. The November riots had been attributed to the slum-dwellers of Delhi. That explains why the "transistor bombs" were planted in bushes near the slums. In Kanpur and Meerut, riots had taken place. The bombs went off there too. Patna and Calcutta cannot be ruled out as possible targets of the extremists now, as well as every city where the riots broke out last November. Clearly, on 10 May, the children of Bhindranwale had sought their revenge. But revenge against whom? The pro-Khalistan elements do not enjoy the support of the Sikh masses. They cannot impress the saner section of the Akali Dal (of which Sant Longowal is a leader).

When Jagjit Singh Chauhan held a conference in London's Shepherd's Bush Gurdwara, near Kensington, on 6, 7, 8 April, he was able to attract pro-Khalistan Sikhs from Canada, UK, Italy, Holland, Germany, Thailand and Singapore as well as elements like Phizo (the rebel Naga leader living in London), the Kashmir Liberation Front (KLF), the Afghan Mujahidins and of course his own supporters in London. But the average Sikh devotee who visits the Shepherd's Bush Gurdwara was not interested in the three-day deliberations of the 400-strong gathering. George Fernandes, the Janata leader, addressed a meeting in the same gurdwara a few days later. While his speech drew applause and even evoked "Khalistan Zindabad" slogans, the president of the gurdwara, Manjit Singh Selhi went on record with his disapproval of the proceedings at the gurdwara that evening. The Khalistan elements, therefore, have a long way to go.

And that precisely is the reason why the terrorists struck on 10 May. To begin with, the Punjab state president of the Lok Dal, Chaudhary Balbir Singh, a former MP, was assassinated in Hoshiarpur that morning. In the November riots, the Jats in and around Delhi had not participated. The assassination of Balbir Singh, therefore, cannot be viewed in isolation from the grand plan which had been set into motion on 10 May. The Jamaat-e-Islami prefers the Muslims to be persecuted, so that their brand of communalism is able to seep in. Fortunately, so far their popularity among the Muslim minority in this country is negligible. By fomenting trouble, the Sikh extremists apparently are trying to alienate the Sikh masses from the mainstream. The madness of November has left many scars. The provocation now is designed to scratch and make the scars bleed.

The government's handling of the 10-11 May situation has been commendable. If the people are not in-

The Trap

Within 48 hours of the "transistor-bomb" outrage on 10 May, the Delhi Police claimed to have made a vital breakthrough in investigations. Acting on a tip-off from a resident of West Patel Nagar, a locality in Central Delhi, the police arrested three persons including 54-year-old Kartar Singh Narang, a Delhi-based lawyer from house number 26/83 in West Patel Nagar. The police also recovered from the house several bombs identical to those used in the blasts, a .9 mm pistol, some manuals on the manufacture of bombs and a list of several names and addresses which could provide clues about the network of terrorists behind the series of explosions. So also would the interrogation of the arrested persons who were immediately taken to the Deshbandhu Gupta Road police station, some distance away, under heavy guard. The police station, where the three were being questioned, was itself converted into a maximum security area ringed by policemen equipped with automatic weapons.

The house in Delhi's West Patel Nagar from where police arrested three extremists

The events that led to the arrests had all the drama of a high-tension thriller. The person who provided the first clue to the mysterious goings-on was Kartar Singh Narang himself. For most of his telephonic conversations, Kartar Singh Narang used a cordless instrument, which, according to some residents of the colony, he carried around with him openly. His neighbours were even otherwise suspicious of what went on in the Narang household because they used to receive "mysterious guests" from time to time; they had specially begun to mark this trend after the riots in November 1984 during which Kartar Singh's house had been slightly damaged. Their suspicions were confirmed when one of Kartar Singh's close neighbours picked up a conversation he was having with someone on 11 May.

The police was immediately informed and Amod Kanth, the Central Delhi district police chief, laid his trap, placing plainclothesmen around the house that evening. Late in the night, they moved in, arrested Kartar Singh Narang and lay in wait for his accomplices who were expected to visit him. It was a long wait but the two suspected terrorists did come—around two the next afternoon. Smelling trouble one of them immediately pulled out a pistol but before he could shoot he was overpowered by a plainclothesman outside the house. A five-minute scuffle followed during which the suspects tried to knive their way to escape. Three sub-inspectors, Dharam Pal Singh, Vijay Manchanda and Sushil Kumar and one constable, Sukhpal, suffered knife-injuries but the police were too well-entrenched in the house for the suspects to run away. By this time almost the entire locality had collected in front of the house and the three arrested persons had to be whisked away to the Deshbandhu Gupta Road police station. People around the area at the time of the incident said that they heard several shots being fired during the short resistance the two had put up but the Delhi Police maintain no shots were fired at all.

The police has refused to divulge any details of the operation; not even the names of the other two suspects arrested—in the interest of the investigations—but they hope that the clues they have already picked up would lead to several other arrests and uncover the terrorist ring behind the 10 May blasts not only in Delhi but also in other parts of northern India.

Is There an IRA Connection?

It was a pre-set plan signalled into action almost as if by remote control—30-odd blasts one after another in different parts of Delhi, Haryana and Uttar Pradesh. The explosions of 10 and 11 May could not have occurred without a level of coordination between the men who were behind them. Indeed the pattern of the operation was markedly similar to the modus operandi of a group operating far away in northern Ireland and Great Britain—the Irish Republican Army (IRA), still the nightmare of the Scotland Yard and the British intelligence service Founded in 1919 as a successor to the militant nationalist organisation called Irish Volunteers, the IRA is one of today's most well-knit terrorist organisations which has struck time and again with success not only in the war for the independence of northern Ireland but also giving assistance to other terrorist groups scattered around the globe. As part of its operations the IRA has on various occasions given armed assistance, imparted training to undercover units and even circulated what has come to be known as the "IRA terrorist manual" to other terrorist organisations all over the world.

One of the reasons why the IRA has acquired such an important place in the world of terrorists is the phenomenal rate of success it has had in its operations Sixty-seven years after it began spreading terror in the British Isles, it is still an organisation alive and strong enough to make a strike anywhere, anytime. Last October the IRA had attempted to wipe out almost the entire British government when it planted a high-explosive bomb in the Grand Hotel at Brighton where the British Prime Minister, Mrs Margaret Thatcher, was staying along with 13 other cabinet colleagues. It was sheer luck that nobody was seriously hurt despite the collapse of the entire facade of the multi-storeyed hotel.

The IRA after the failure of the war of independence it waged from 1919 to 1921, shifted to guerrilla tactics, ambushing personnel, raiding targets, planting bombs in selected areas, killing people either in hit-and-run operations or with booby-trapping devices. A characteristic of their operations has been its success-rate. Once they have marked a target, they see to it that it is removed. Selective elimination, specially in Northern Ireland has been their forte Terrorist operations in Punjab, Delhi and other northern states over the past year and a half have followed roughly the same pattern. Army carriers, even public transport vehicles, have been ambushed and people killed. People, supposedly on the terrorists' hit list, have been exterminated one after the other. There have been sporadic bomb explosions and now, the first series of organised detonations. The method is the same innocuous packages left for unsuspecting people to pick up, bringing death to people who in most cases have nothing to do with the politics behind the violence.

Sandeep Sharma

Grief-stricken relatives of those killed in bomb blasts outside Hindu Rao Hospital

Another feature of similarity between the IRA and the terrorist groups operating in India is the way both have slipped out of the hands of political organisations they initially belonged to. The break between the IRA and the Sinn Fein, its political wing, came a long time ago, for try as they might, they could not contain the IRA's violent, terrorist tactics. And almost everytime there were moves for an agreement on the political level, there was inevitably a spurt in the IRA's terrorist activities. Something very similar is happening in Punjab today.

The Akali leadership has lost control. There was a time when the Akali Dal had the terrorists under its belt. Very soon, they were pampered and finally Bhindranwale became the unchallenged chief of the Golden Temple. Today, almost a year after his death and Operation Bluestar during which the backbone of terrorism was supposedly broken, the terrorists seem to be as strong and unassailable as ever. They have come out into the open precisely at a time when it seemed opinion was building up in favour of a reconciliation.

It is of course true that terrorism in India is nowhere near the levels of sophistication reached by the IRA or other terrorist organisations in the West and the Middle East. Booby-trapped vehicles or remote-controlled explosives have not made their appearance in India, yet. The mechanisms used in the recent blasts were rather crude—five inch by two inch bombs encased in lead and concealed in transistor radio bodies whose operation switch worked as the exploding device—but what is more serious is the planning that had gone behind the entire operation. Terrorism with the face it has appeared today, cannot be treated lightly. These were not stray incidents sparked off by a rustic gang of fanatics. Behind them is certainly a brain trained in techniques of terrorism and tutored to launch a successful strike. Has the IRA trained Sikh extremists? Considering that pro-Khalistan elements are active in the United Kingdom, the IRA angle to terrorist attacks in Delhi cannot be ruled out.

Arc of Terror

The explosions of 10 May formed an arc in the northern Gangetic plain. Places in Haryana, the union territory of Delhi and Uttar Pradesh became the flashpoints as terrorism extended its frontiers. In Sirsa, Hissar, Ambala, in various colonies of Delhi, in Meerut and right up to Kanpur the terrorists' trigger worked. They had concentrated on Delhi—which was the worst affected—but that they had been able to set up transistor-traps at so many points only indicated the increasing reach of the terrorists Not only have they developed new techniques of disruption and covered new areas, they continue to pilfer supplies from the armed forces, as was clear from a few incidents in Haryana. Three persons were killed at a Haryana Roadways bus terminal in Hissar when a high explosive 36 (HE 36) hand grenade exploded, sending the people scampering for cover. In the adjoining district of Sirsa bombs went off in three buses killing four and injuring 15. At village Sadhaura near Ambala, there was yet another explosion in a bus; it killed the conductor and a woman sitting beside him. The incidents, which occurred almost simultaneously, set the Haryana administration on its toes· the police sounded an alert, prohibitory orders were imposed in several areas (even in those where no incidents had taken place), warnings about transistor-bombs were sent out to the people, vigilance on the borders with Punjab was stepped up and, in a move that reminded one of the pre-Operation Bluestar days, the Haryana Roadways suspended all bus services after sundown.

The following day, as the death toll in Haryana rose from 10 to 17, the police swung into action arresting more than a hundred persons in connection with the crime. They searched all vehicles and trains leaving and entering the state. In Chandigarh, during a meeting called by the Haryana Governor, S.M.H. Burney, and attended by the chief secretary, P.P. Capcihan, the home secretary, L.C. Gupta and the director-general of police, M.S. Bhatnagar, further steps to prevent the breakdown of the law and order situation were discussed: intensification of patrolling, the placement of security forces at vantage points in various cities and beefing up the security arrangements of VIPs.

In Uttar Pradesh, too, the government had to call a high-level meeting to take steps to deal with the situation. One of the first decisions it took was to place the police and the intelligence networks on "red alert." The director-general of police, J.N. Chaturvedi, directed his forces to take preventive measures — including the imposition of Section 144 and searching of vehicles— wherever they could. The terrorists had struck Uttar Pradesh harder than Haryana. In bomb explosions spread over six districts of the state—Unnao, Aligarh, Meerut, Moradabad, Ghaziabad and Rampur—more than 20 people died on the first day itself. Subsequently, the toll rose even higher.

Meerut district was the worst hit, the culprit everywhere was that harmless looking plastic transistor that held the deadly bomb. One explosion in the Himachal Express while it was passing Partapur, killed seven passengers. Some distance away, in Khekhra, three were killed when a similar bomb exploded in a bus. At Unnao in Kanpur district, the transistor bomb went off in the office of the cashier of the bus stand; one of the victims was the bus conductor who had picked up the transistor bomb left in his bus and carried it to the cashier's room. The other, of course, was the cashier himself. So far and wide have the terrorists struck this time, that it really indicates how well entrenched they are and how deep they have penetrated—even into the districts of Uttar Pradesh which till sometime ago had only known the terror of dacoits. Now there is the terrorist from Punjab too.

cited by the communal provocation from the Sikh extremists, then the government's job can be said to have been well done. The quick arrest of the three suspects by the Delhi police also helped to restore the people's confidence in the state machinery. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, apart from taking a personal interest in the operations, requisitioned the services of a young politician, who has an impeccable record in secular politics, to help out in the home ministry's work. On the night of 12 May, Arif Mohammad Khan, who had become the youngest-ever union deputy minister in January 1982 and the youngest-ever minister of state a year later was given the additional charge of home affairs besides being the minister of state for industry and company affairs. Khan had been elected for the first time in his life on the Janata ticket He had resigned his ministership in Uttar Pradesh in the Janata days in protest against the government's failure to control a communal riot in Lucknow. Later, he joined the Congress(I). When politicians with a proven record in secularism are drafted into home ministry in the face of a crisis, the people's faith in the government is bound to go up. The task ahead, however, is not easy. The arrests made on 12 May have certainly reassured the people. But the Sikh terrorists are much more in number. Vigilance against communal tensions will have to be maintained in the coming days.

A Blow by Blow Account

Twenty-two explosions rocked the capital on 10 and 11 May. The first blast occurred at 6.18 pm on Friday, 10 May. The last was reported at 7.25 am on Saturday morning. The sequence of events on the fateful night was as follows.

• 6.18 pm. The first bomb exploded near Gandhi Nagar. Two women, Omwati and Sundari, both aged 35, were killed The bomb went off when Omwati was tinkering with a "transistor radio" which she had picked up from the road. Three other persons, including a child were critically wounded.

• 7.35 pm: Two blasts, in quick succession were reported at the inter-state bus terminus near Kashmiri Gate. The blasts, triggered off by "transistor radio" bombs took the highest toll of life: killing seven persons and injuring 30. The blasts took place inside two UP Roadways buses at platform numbers 27 and 28. The first bus (UHN 1008) was bound for Muzaffarnagar and the second (UHI 1541) was to go to Ramnagar. Minutes after the explosions, the injured were rushed to the Hindu Rao hospital. Within hours the emergency ward of the hospital was full of injured passengers from the ill-fated buses.

• 7.50 pm: A Delhi Transport Corporation bus (on route 610) was rocked by a powerful explosion when a bomb planted inside a transistor radio detonated inside. Two persons were killed and five injured in the incident. The conductor of the bus, Khajan Singh, who had picked up the "transistor radio" and placed it below his seat was killed instantaneously. Among those found dead in the bus was sub-inspector Balbir Singh of the Delhi police The injured were rushed to the Safdarjung Hospital where two more passengers succumbed to their injuries.

• 8.10 pm: A bomb exploded in a rickshaw near the Tagore Garden area, killing two persons and injuring others. Almost simultaneously another blast was triggered off, this time at Nehru Vihar, near Timarpur. Police officers termed the explosion as the most serious. The explosion occurred when a bomb was lobbed in the area, in an attempt to blow up the water pipeline station of the municipal corporation of Delhi.

• 8.30 pm: A bomb concealed in a transistor set went off in a country liquor shop in Jahangirpuri, north Delhi. Three men were killed in the blast including a Delhi police constable, Rachpal Singh.

• 9.07 pm: A blast was reported from Mangolpuri, a West Delhi colony. The bomb had been placed at a crowded bus stop. The incident occurred when one of the commuters picked up a "transistor radio" lying at the bus stop. Part of the concrete surface of the bus stop collapsed due to the impact of the bomb blast.

• 9.12 pm: Another blast was reported from the Banda Bahadur Chowk, near Himmat Nagar, injuring five persons. No deaths were reported. The blast took place in a moving DTC bus (route 81) plying between Moti Nagar and Mukherjee Nagar. The explosion followed a pattern similar to those inside other DTC buses: a "transistor radio"bomb had been placed below the conductor's seat, which went off on being tuned.

• 9.36 pm: Explosions rocked another DTC bus at the Ashram Chowk, in South Delhi. Four passengers were killed in the explosions which took place in the bus which was plying from ISBT to Faridabad.

• 11.08 pm: At the Dichaum Kalan bus depot, near Najafgarh, three persons died and one was seriously injured. A few minutes later, another explosion was heard at the same depot in which two more persons succumbed to injuries caused by explosives.

• 11.33 pm: In the last explosion, close to midnight of 10 May, one person died as a bomb blast reverberated near the Mohan Garden bus stand.

• 11 May 12.08 am: Soon after midnight, two persons were killed and two injured in a blast at G Block of Madangir, in the extreme south of Delhi. Almost at the same time, another bomb detonated several kilometres away inside a house in Uttam Nagar, in West Delhi.

• 12.35 am: Two persons were killed and three wounded in similar bomb blasts in the Tilak Nagar area. The reasons for the blasts could not be ascertained by the police.

• 6.15 am: The first blast of Saturday morning (11 May) occurred outside the Jagat cinema killing two persons and injuring one. The bomb had been lobbed by terrorists inside the cinema house.

• 7.10 am: In a slum dwelling close to Chittaranjan Park in south Delhi, five persons died when a bomb inside a transistor radio detonated. The transistor had been picked up by Bhola, a resident of the slum behind Deshbandhu College from bushes nearby. The bomb exploded when he turned the switch of the transistor inside his jhuggi. Three children died in the explosion and two other persons died due to the blast in the hospital.

• 7.25 am: Another took place in a slum dwelling close to Chittaranjan Park. Two labourers were killed inside their hut when a bomb exploded. Later pieces of shrapnel from a "transistor radio" were found outside. At about the same time at Raghubir Nagar in Delhi cantonment two persons were killed in a similar incident.

'Suddenly, a Bomb Went Off'

How innocent people paid with their lives for a war they never understood

"Ekdum bam phut gaya." Each patient in ward number seven of the Bara Hindu Rao Hospital repeated the same words. Each of the patients in the casualty ward of the hospital situated on the ridge near the university campus in north Delhi was an innocent victim of the "transistor bomb." From late in the evening, the hospital began registering patients with severe explosive injuries. Soon the trickle of patients became a stream and by midnight blood-smeared bodies lay strewn on the floors of the ward. Three mutilated bodies had been brought in of persons who had died on the spot. The body of a young boy, a resident of Shakti Nagar was brought in on a stretcher, his right arm dismembered by a bomb explosion. His face and chest bore wounds from the shrapnel of a "transistor bomb." An unidentified boy died the next morning. His body was sent to the Sabzi Mandi dead house, the city mortuary close to the Bara Hindu Rao Hospital, where by the morning of 11 May eight such bodies of unidentified victims of bomb blasts had been dumped.

There were those in the ward who could be called the living dead. Two patients in the ward were declared "critically injured" the next day. According to doctors, there were very few chances of the victims surviving. Besides, both the patients Madan Lal and Jayanand Sundariya should have immediately been transferred to the intensive care unit (ICU) of the hospital, where they should have been given emergency treatment. The victims were not shifted into the ICU because the unprecedented rush of patients suffering bomb blast injuries had filled up every bed in the unit.

Madan Lal lay in bed number 13 of the ward, with thick bloodstained bandages around his waist. The blast had ripped open his liver. His right hand had been smashed by the explosion. In a voice that was barely audible, Madan Lal described the sequence of events: "I boarded a DTC bus number 810 from Kingsway Camp to go to Mukherjee Nagar. As soon as I approached the conductor for a ticket I heard a deafening noise and lost consciousness as a sharp object hit me in my stomach. Later I found that I had been brought to this hospital with others in an ambulance."

Another patient in the same ward, Nafis Ahmed, aged 24, described how the bomb exploded inside a UP State Roadways bus which he had boarded at the Inter-State Bus Terminus (ISBT): "At 6.30 pm I and my family boarded the bus from ISBT to go to Khatoli." Nafis Ahmed was travelling with his wife, Firtoz and two children. "We were sitting in the third row of the bus. Before the bus could start I noticed a young Sikh enter the bus and place a briefcase-like object on the bonnet. Earlier he had asked other passengers where the bus was going. After asking this question, he got off. Ten minutes later, the whole bus shook with the blast. Later, I came to know that the object that the Sikh had placed on the bonnet was a transistor bomb. The bomb exploded when a child picked up the transistor from the bonnet." Nafis explained that for 30 minutes following the explosion there was panic and confusion inside the bus. Two persons in the front seats died immediately. All those who were injured were brought in an ambulance to the Bara Hindu Rao hospital.

The pattern of the terrorist attacks in most parts of Delhi had been the same as the one which Madan Lal and Nafis Ahmed had seen. Eyewitness accounts of the explosions reveal a similar pattern—of bombs being planted in inter-city or inter-state buses, which exploded while either being switched on or placed on the ground. Suraj Ram, the driver of a DTC bus inside which one such transistor bomb exploded described how it happened: "When the bus (route number 610) was near the Sarojini Nagar depot stop, I noticed two Sikhs suddenly pushing aside the other passengers to get off. By the time the bus started to move, I heard a loud bang in the rear of the bus. The conductor and another passenger were killed. The glass panes of the bus were shattered and several passengers were wounded."

While in the evening of 10 May the pattern followed by the terrorists with clinical precision in different parts of the city was to plant the explosives inside buses, the following morning blasts were triggered off by "transistor bombs" which had been left in open spaces in parts of South Delhi. This time, too, victims (12 persons died on the morning of 11 May) were innocent and unsuspecting citizens, and what is worse, among the poorest. Death traps lay scattered for them on the night of 10 May itself. By the morning ten persons had picked up the bait left by the terrorists, meeting a tragic death.

Bhola, a resident of a slum colony close to 'C' block of Chittaranjan Park was one such victim. Bhola was oblivious of the string of violent incidents that had rocked the city the previous night. He was unaware of the danger ahead when he picked up a transistor radio from the bushes near his jhuggi. Delighted with his find, Bhola brought the transistor home. As soon as he switched on the tuner, the bomb inside detonated. Bhola was killed immediately along with his two nieces, seven-year-old Guriya and 12-year-old Saroj, who were playing inside when the explosion occurred. Said a resident of the slum area: "When Bhola brought the transistor from the jhaari (bush) we warned him it was not good to pick up other people's things. But he took it inside and it exploded." By the time the police reached the spot and the bloodied bodies of Bhola, Guriya and Saroj were lifted, a local politician was making announcements on a megaphone in the area: "Do not pick up any lawaris (unidentified) objects that may be lying around There may be bombs planted inside." The warnings were too late for Bhola. He had already become the unsuspecting and innocent victim of a carefully executed plot.

Within minutes of Bhola's death, three others were killed in similar incidents in parts of south Delhi. Ramu (20) and Mahesh (28) were killed when a bomb exploded, this time in a slum situated close to Tara Apartments, Kalkaji. Both Ramu and Mahesh were labourers from Bihar They had come to the capital to look for work only a few months ago. On the morning of 11 May, residents of other slums were astounded to find Mahesh's jhuggi blown off by a bomb and Ramu's body thrown three feet out of the jhuggi by the explosion. "Bachao mujhe! Bam phut gaya (Save me. A bomb has exploded)" were the only words Ramu could utter before he died. Later, residents found broken pieces of the plastic container which either Ramu or Mahesh may have picked up. The findings confirmed that both men were among the last of the victims of the carefully planned bomb attack on the capital.

The "Transistor Bomb"

Sondeep Shankar

Additional commissioner of police H.C. Jatav shows a transistor bomb

The opinion among forensic experts who have examined the "transistor bombs" is that it was quite a crude mechanism—a five inch by two-and-a-half inch pack of explosive "locally cast" in lead and connected to a nine volt cell by a three inch long wire. This mechanism, in turn, was locked on to the switch on the plastic body of the "transistor." As soon as the switch was tuned to "on" position, there was contact and the device exploded. But so unsophisticated was the mechanism that the bomb could even have gone off if the "transistor" was given a sharp jolt or a knock The bomb had a powerful range though—it could damage things within a radius of fifteen feet Scientists of the Central Forensic Science Laboratory (CFSL) who were summoned to the various blast sites by the south Delhi police chief, Maxwell Pereira, have taken several samples from the bombs back to their laboratories They would soon be presenting their report on the exact nature of the components to the Delhi police. But some of the experts are already certain that some parts used in the bomb were imported.

There is still some confusion about how the bombs actually exploded. Initial reports had suggested that there was a timer device fitted to the transistor unit and the bombs were timed to blast off in five minutes, in some cases ten. But an examination of the bombs showed that there was no such sophistry in their mechanism. They went off only if the transistor switch was fiddled with or in case the bomb was given a jerk. The recovery of more than a dozen unexploded bombs from several places in Delhi only supports the theory that there was no timing device in the tiny villain.

Akali Dal: A Victory for the Hawks ?

Sant Longowal's resignation is seen as a surrender to the extremists within the party

Akali politics took a dramatic turn when the Akali Dal leader Sant Harchand Singh Longowal resigned from the presidentship of the party. Almost simultaneously the former Punjab chief minister Prakash Singh Badal also announced that he was quitting his party post. These new developments in the Akali Dal not only shocked the party workers but a large majority of the people in Punjab felt that both the Akali leaders had surrendered to the hawks within the Dal because they did not want to stand up to the new leadership of Baba Joginder Singh father of Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale and presently the convener of the nine-member ad hoc committee of the Akali Dal.

It is generally felt by Punjab-watchers that Sant Longowal and Prakash Singh Badal have thrown a challenge to the new ad hoc committee and to the hardliners by resigning from their party posts. Both the leaders are popular. Badal, for example, is even popular with a section of the Hindus. It is generally felt that though the hardliners do not have much of a numerical strength in the state they are nevertheless in a position to exploit the sentiments of the Sikh masses.

The confrontation between the moderates and the hardliners came to the fore when the 83-year-old Baba Joginder Singh suddenly announced the formation of the ad hoc committee. Nobody had paid much attention to Baba Joginder Singh when he arrived in the Golden Temple on 1 May. He moved into a room adjoining the langar (community kitchen) within the temple complex. Newsmen who talked with him that day returned convinced that Baba Joginder Singh was no Bhindranwale

But they were proved wrong. Around seven that evening, the father of the man who had ruled Punjab for nearly three years before he died in June last year, decided to grab the headlines for the next day. Sitting in the obscure room adjoining the langar, the old man issued a statement dissolving the different factions of the Akali Dal including the two headed by Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and Jathedar Jagdev Singh Talwandi. He then appointed the nine-member ad hoc committee with himself as the absentee convener to run the affairs of the Sikh panth. In the cleverly worded statement in Gurmukhi, Baba Joginder Singh said: "I am a humble dass (servant) of the panth. I am grateful to Sant Longowal and Jathedar Talwandi who entrusted a small man like me to forge panthic unity." The statement was accompanied by photocopies of two brief letters written by Longowal and Talwandi to Baba Joginder Singh. In their letters the two Akali Dal leaders offered to accept "any decision taken by you" for panthic unity. Talwandi, heading the rival faction of the Akali Dal and an arch-enemy of Longowal, however, had inserted a condition in his letter. He mentioned that he would not be prepared to work under the presidentship or the convenorship of Longowal. Baba Joginder Singh obviously obliged Talwandi. He appointed SimranjitSinghMann, the dismissed IPS officer currently under detention in Bharatpur jail as a suspect in the Indira Gandhi assassination case, the convenor of the ad hoc committee Till his release, Baba Joginder Singh would himself be the convenor of the committee.

Baba Joginder Singh

The composition of the committee was interesting It comprised Longowal, Tohra, Badal and Talwandi. The other four members are Gurtej Singh, a former officer of the IAS who had resigned, Harinder Singh a former Indian diplomat in Norway dismissed by the Indian government for making a statement against Operation Bluestar, Manjit Singh, the younger brother of the former president of the All Indian Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) Bhai Amrik Singh who had been killed during the army action and Inderjit Singh Sekhon, an advocate from Faridkot.

The convener of the ad hoc committee, Simranjit Singh Mann is in jail while Gurtej Singh is underground. The Punjab government had declared him a proclaimed offender. Harinder Singh is in Oslo and Manjit Singh is also in jail. The four belong to the pro-Bhindranwale militant camp. Undoubtedly, the action of Baba Joginder Singh being termed a bloodless coup by some observers came as the biggest surprise to the moderate Akali leaders. The next day, Longowal at a press conference in Jullundur categorically rejected both the dissolution of the party as well as the appointment of the ad hoc committee but later altered his statement with the amendment that a delegates' session of the Akali Dal would consider the proposal of Baba Joginder Singh on 17 May. On 8 May, Longowal under pressure from the hawks in the party cancelled the 17 May meeting. Even his critics said Longowal lacked the courage to stand up against Bhindranwale's father. But his supporters are of the opinion that the Akali chief started feeling disillusioned when a majority of the party leaders started supporting the proposal put forward by Baba Joginder Singh quite openly. Even Akali leaders like Atma Singh and Ujagar Singh Sekhon belonging to the moderate Badal camp "welcomed" Baba Joginder Singh's proposal. Finally, Longowal surrendered completely to Baba Joginder Singh on 8 May when he agreed to meet him in a gurdwara at Sultanpur Lodhi, about 100 kms from Amritsar. Tohra was also at the meeting. The coup engineered by Bhindranwale's father had not only dethroned Longowal but had made him the supreme head of both the Akalis and the Sikhs.

The question that is now uppermost in the minds of the people in Punjab is: Will Longowal and Badal force the hardliners to step down? Whatever the outcome, there is a feeling that it is men like Badal and Longowal who can negotiate with the centre. Since the others in the committee are non-political (some are in jail; others are underground and even the convener, Baba Joginder Singh does not have any political background), the new committee might not be acceptable to the people of Punjab.

Although the situation in the villages of Punjab is normal, it is anybody's guess when things might take a turn for the worse and communal violence erupts. The tension between the two communities is discernible in the cities where Hindus and Sikhs do not talk to each other.

Death on the Farm

The first indication of what was to come later on 10 May. perhaps appeared near the Sadhu Ashram on the Hoshiarppur-Una road in Punjab. It was nearing six in the morning and 63-year-old Chaudhary Balbir Singh, former Member of Parliament and president of the Punjab unit of the Lok Dal, was riding down to his farms on a moped. He did not notice the two men following him on a scooter till they came too near for him to escape. They pulled their scooter alongside and shot him at point-blank range—three bullets in his neck and Balbir Singh fell dead on the spot. His assailants sped away.

As news of his death spread, people came out on the streets of Hoshiarpur and indulged in large-scale violence and arson. In the Dal Bazar, Bahadur Chowk, Kanak Mandi and Guru Chowk areas of Hoshiarpur, mobs set fire to more than three dozen shops and one person was stabbed to death. They even violated curfew restrictions to attack the Sikhs in the town. Two constables of the Punjab police were also roughed up by the angry crowd moving through the streets of the town and their motorcycles were burnt down. The murder of Chaudhary Balbir Singh had created public outrage. Although the police took control of the situation—it fired several rounds in the air and resorted to a lathi-charge—tension gripped Hoshiarpur and indeed most other parts of Punjab. till the next day when a "Punjab bandh" was declared. It was also the day when Balbir Singh Chaudhary was cremated with full state honours and in the presence of several senior Punjab government officials and Lok Dal leaders, including Devi Lal, Sharad Yadav and Ram Bilas Paswan Chaudhary Balbir Singh is the second important political leader to be attacked by terrorists in a month's time Some weeks ago, there had been a similar attack on R. L. Bhatia, the general secretary of the All India Congress Committee (I). He escaped with bullet wounds and is now on his way to recovery. Chaudhary Balbir Singh was not so lucky. Balbir Singh, a highly respected man in Punjab, has been raising his voice against the Sikh extremists for the last three years. In fact, over the past few months the Chaudhuri had been receiving a number of threats from the extremists, but he had chosen to ignore them. Last month, his daughter, who is married and settled in America, sent him a bullet proof jacket, but he refused to use it despite his wife's request. If he had done so, perhaps he would have been alive today.

The Mood After 100 Years

The AICC(I) centenary session demonstrated the enthusiasm of the young, and frustrations of the old

Closing the two-day session of the All India Congress Committee(I) at the Talkatora Indoor Stadium in New Delhi the Congress president, Rajiv Gandhi, remarked that the "level of debate all through had been very high." In 22 hours spread over 4 and 5 May, 71 members of the AICC(I) had spoken from the pulpit on various resolutions—on politics, economics, on international affairs and on affairs of women and the youth. All resolutions were passed unanimously. Not that there was no opposition. As many as 14 amendments were suggested by the speakers. Time was short, hence many could not speak (169 members were deprived of the opportunity to speak because of the "paucity of time"); there would have been many more. But when the time for voting came, it was assumed by the chair that all amendments had been withdrawn. Hands raised here and there against resolutions were shooed down. The party clung to the fetish of unanimity. Debate yes, said the Congress(I) leadership, dissent no. Of debate, too, there was little. For most members, the session was only a platform for sycophancy. The main talking-point was either the greatness of Mrs Gandhi or the vigour and dynamism of Rajiv Gandhi. So profuse were the members in their praise that at times the Congress president was himself flush with embarrassment—he would indicate it with a jarring sound of the time-bell in his hand. He did this once when H.K.L. Bhagat was at the microphone. Bhagat spoke little on the political resolution—his subject—and more of the glorious tradition of the Nehru-Gandhi family, calling Rajiv Gandhi the "fourth great immortal leader of independent India after Gandhi, Nehru and Mrs Indira Gandhi." But that criticism in the Congress(I) is still intolerable was clear. It remained outside the indoor stadium and came only in whispers—from people who had nothing much to lose.

R. Mohan, member of the Coimbatore district Congress committee made a complaint that has long been worrying many a Congressman. "Organisational elections in the party must be held soon," he said, "because dissatisfaction is filtering down to the lower levels in some areas. The effect of the central party working has not reached us as yet but once it does, we shall have to find a way to fight it."

Harbachan Singh from Haryana, another district-level worker, said how difficult it had become for "an old man like me" to say anything in the party. "I agree youth should be given its place...It is good but we also have worked for the party, we have some experience but the Congress seems to have closed its doors on the older generation." There was, among the older generation of Congressmen, the distinct feeling that this session had marked a turning point, the "erosion of basic Congress values had begun." The disappearing khadi and its replacement by polyester, the vanishing Gandhi caps and safari suits were visible all around. "Sometimes," said a veteran of ten AICC sessions, "when I look around I feel I have come to the wrong place."

There was another group that felt rather misplaced during the entire session; they were once known as Sanjay Gandhi's storm-troopers, now they are a tribe in disarray. At the Guwahati Congress session in November 1976 the then Congress president, Mrs Indira Gandhi, had complimented them by saying: "You have stolen our thunder." This time the thunderbirds cooled their heels either in the viewing galleries or outside the session itself. Sanjay Gandhi was completely blacked out of the AICC(I) meeting on 4—5 May. Not a photograph, not even a word on him anywhere. Leaders who had once carried his chappals in their hands and called him their "rehnuma" (the only hope of India's future) were not prepared to make a mention of him on record. This session, for all practical purposes, has buried his memory. Indeed one Delhi Pradesh Congress Committee member went on to remark, "There is already an entire party running in his name, why should we have him here?"

There were also those who have been quite openly challenging the party leadership in every forum, like Bhagwat Jha Azad, the former union labour minister. He has, in the last few weeks, crossed swords with the government even on the floor of the Lok Sabha, having taken ministers to task and grilled them with surprising ferocity. Throughout the session, Azad remained dispassionate. For the general member of the AICC(I) this session had nothing much to offer—only a political mela where he ate and drank and clapped after long speeches. The lucky one also got to present a petition to someone important. But he did not go back any wiser on the Congress' policy or its functioning. For P. Lingadhraman of Cochin this was the first AICC session. What did he feel? "Nothing much. My only great satisfaction is that I saw the great leader Rajiv Gandhi." How many debates on resolutions did he listen to? "What resolution? My state leaders wanted me to come to see Delhi so I came. So here I met a few other Congressmen. So the two days passed." But there were always enough people at hand who were singing the praises of the "historic session" of the AICC(I). Said K. Brahmananda Reddi, who had from the podium, made the most laudatory of speeches, "I have seldom seen an AICC session pass such well-thought-out resolutions. The new leadership under Rajiv Gandhi is really set to take the country towards the twentyfirst century-...What could be a more welcome sign than that."

On a white platform, under the glare of arc-lamps and the gaze of portraits of Gandhi, Nehru, Mrs Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi himself, sat an array of Congress leaders Party president Rajiv Gandhi was flanked by the aging working president, Kamlapati Tripathi and AICC(I) general secretary, Rajendra Kumari Bajpai. Other leaders—Pranab Mukherjee, Narasimha Rao, Gundu Rao, K. Karunakaran, P Shiv Shankar, A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury, Sitaram Kesri and Darbara Singh took turns to sit behind the party president and whisper into his ears. Everytime his company changed, the photographers went on a clicking spree. Lesser lights, those who did not have the sanction to sit with the big league, came leaning onto the podium time and again to say something or the other to Rajiv Gandhi. And again the photographers clicked. Behind the podium stood parliamentary secretary Arun Singh and political adviser Makhan lal Fotedar, overseeing the proceed-

A helping hand: Working president Kamlapati Tripathi being helped by Congress president Rajiv Gandhi and treasurer Sitaram Kesri (behind) to stand up during the lunch recess on 4 May ings. And in front—in the large arena which more often witnesses games of basketball and table tennis—the members of the AICC(I) whose seats mostly remained empty.

Attendance was persistently embarrassing. Spokesmen of the AICC(I) tried to explain it away saying the tight security arrangements had deterred many people from coming in. But one could find the reasons elsewhere—in the luncheon pandal, on railways and air lines ticket counters, everywhere in the stadium compound. Members, it seemed, preferred spending time drinking tea and coffee and munching snacks, or queueing up at the ticket counters or just gossiping in clusters here and there. It was the boys and girls of the Sewa Dal who filed indoors to give the session a more respectable look. And when Rajiv Gandhi was away, even they took time off, leaving the 1200 capacity stadium almost empty.

This could easily be called a session of defences and denials. Most members, including the Congress president, spent time clearing "misconceptions" about Congress policy in recent months. Senior partymen were put in a bit of a spot by the criticism of the party's economic policy. The economic resolution which was largely ready at the last moment, reiterated the Congress(I)'s commitment to socialism and its faith in the public sector which the changed resolution described as the "sheet-anchor" of the economy. Former union finance minister Pranab Mukherjee who moved the economic resolution, and the present finance minister, Vishwanath Pratap Singh, who interjected in the debate, were at pains to stress the Congress(I)'s unwavering commitment to socialism and the public sector. V.P. Singh, in fact, spent most of his time defending the budget. Also on the defence was the Gujarat chief minister, Madhavsinh Solanki, under attack after the recent violence in his state. All the disturbance in his state, he said, had been prompted by "vested political interests", namely, the BJP, whose leaders had "planned a conspiracy" against him. And once again, he attacked the Gujarat press for fanning passions at a "sensitive time." Those who spoke after Solanki congratulated him for his "tough stand" on the issue.

Criticism—which did not matter in the end at all—came only from lesser-known members. Ram Dhan had a word to say about the Congress organisation which, he thought, needed to adopt a "satisfactory and respectable" policy. "If someone is nominated to a post," he said, "he is not allowed to remain there. He is replaced by someone else even before he can understand the nature of his job. And that someone is an incompetent person who cannot do justice to the organisation." He added that the Congress, at a few places, had given the go-ahead to "criminals" to fight the elections as a result of which the party lost seats and its image. Kamaluddin, speaking on the economic resolution, remarked that organisations like the state electricity boards were the most mismanaged institutions in the country. They were not even producing fifty per cent results. Others had more general complaints to make—the inefficient implementation of the National Rural Employment Programme (NREP) and the integrated Rural Development Programme (IRDP), shortages of water supply, the need for more industrialisation in a particular area etc. All these were sidelined by the AICC(I) on the plea that it was adopting only a resolution, not a declaration which would incorporate all matters, big and small.

Irritation, if any, to the Congress leadership came only from outside—from the press. In his opening remarks, the Congress president, referring to the arms race on the subcontinent, had said: "We feel that they (Pakistan) are developing a nuclear weapon...This has compelled us to look into various aspects of this question and to see what action we should take." A news agency had interpreted the remark to suggest that India was ready to review its nuclear policy. "Is that responsible journalism?" Rajiv Gandhi asked tersely, looking towards the press gallery. He then went on to restate India's nuclear stance— in the well-known words of Mrs Indira Gandhi, the person, who in absentia had most dominated the first session of the AICC(I) after her assassination.

Old Hands, New Policies

For Congressmen, the party's recent past has been momentous. 31 October 1984 and 31 December 1984 are current history and the two dates are indelible in the memory of the Congressmen. The abrupt departure of Mrs Gandhi and the two tempestuous months which were followed by the emphatic arrival of Rajiv Gandhi. On these two factors stand the hopes and fears, expectations and apprehensions of Congressmen today. But surely the dark shadow cast on 31 October is beginning to be dwarfed by the spirit of 31 December. Mrs Gandhi has almost become a part of bitter memory. Rajiv Gandhi's leadership is the reality in which the party lives today. Where does it go from here? The two-day AICC(I) session at the Talkatora Indoor Stadium in New Delhi proved to be a gauge for the members of the party. SUNDAY spoke to a cross-section of Congressmen, big and small, from all parts of the country. The response, inevitably, reflected a range of opinion. There was no dearth of members—specially those who wanted their comments recorded, who showered nothing but praise on the leadership and saw nothing but a bright future ahead for the party. "Never before," said H. K. L. Bhagat, minister for parliamentary affairs, "has there been such a feeling of buoyancy and enthusiasm. And all this has been achieved by our party president. He is the only man who can give the country stability, and that is why his party is so successful." Another ministerial colleague of Rajiv Gandhi, K. P. Singh Deo, minister of state for personnel and administrative reforms, felt that his party was led by a man who had the unflinching support of the Indian populace. "In such a situation, nobody is in a position to challenge the Congress today...it is stronger than it ever was." The vigorous health of a party blessed by Mrs Gandhi and led by the dynamic Rajiv Gandhi was a common refrain. There was a general feeling among Congressmen that the party was destined for a more historic role. But there were as many warning notes during the session. In fact, some came even from the official platform. One of the first to do so was K. Karunakaran, the Kerala chief minister, who spoke on the political resolution of the Congress(I). "If there is one enemy that the Congres has today, it is the Congressmen themselves," he said. "Congressmen should conquer infighting...they are trying to climb on each other's backs to get prominence." His remarks, perhaps, came in the light of the changes that the party had to make in its political resolution on protests from a group of Congressmen.

But those who spoke off the record were easier with their views. The most common concern seemed to be the organisational elections in the Congress which the leadership has been putting off for almost 15 years. "We cannot understand why the party is doing so...Why cannot they have elections and reinforce the confidence in the party cadres? We have worked so hard for the party, got such good results, why cannot the leadership now do something for partymen?" asked a senior party member from Bihar. Another party hand from Maharashtra felt that the delay in elections was leading to "some disillusionment in the ranks. People had thought that Rajiv Gandhi would at least announce quick elections but..." A member of Parliament from Rajasthan gave a good explanation: "Only those who do not hold any positions today want elections...take my example. I control the party organisation in my district. Why should I want things to change with party elections? It is simple."

With a change at the helm, new grounds for complaint have been prepared. Among the older members of the party—those who claim to have begun work for the Congress during the freedom movement—a distinct level of disenchantment was evident. One gentleman, bent with age, bespectacled and unable to walk without assistance had braved his way to the Talkatora indoor stadium on the first d[illegible] dressed in fresh khadi and a Gand[illegible] The session had [illegible] yet be[illegible] Seva Dal worke[illegible] escorted [illegible] 'pandal' and got him a cha[illegible] there through out the day. Nobody helped him go to the hall where the proceedings of the AICC(I) were going on. The next day the old Congressman was not seen. He seemed to have become irrelevant like most old Congress members. "There is too much importance being given to the youth," said Vidyasagar Goswami, a "special invitee" from eastern Uttar Pradesh. "Too much is left to them without ever taking into count the experience that we have," said he. Another section, however, maintained that youth in the Congress was only a misnomer. "Where is the youth?" asked one youth Congressman angrily. "Look at the cabinet of Rajiv Gandhi-...look at the chief ministers he has all around the country...barring a few they are all from the old lot. The only important youths the party has, are the Prime Minister and his close circle of advisers." Complaints inevitably centred around the "centralism" in the party, the absence of "enough discussion," the question of "inaccessibility of the party president," and the new "power centres" that have built up around Rajiv Gandhi. But nobody protests openly.

The change in the Congress(I) leadership and the reshuffles here and there that followed, have created new groups in the party. They mostly comprise new disgruntled elements. Even leaders of the Congress(I) agree that in a party like their's lobbies and opinion-groups are inevitable. But did matters come to a head during this session of the Congress(I)? It is now only too well-known that the original draft of the economic resolution to be adopted by the AICC(I) had almost precipitated a crisis in the party. A last-minute redraft, emphasising socialism as the basic philosophy of the party and underlining the importance of the public sector, saved the day. Those who had opposed the original resolution—already being talked about in political circles of the capital as the "radical group"—had their say, which only proves their strength. Has the new leadership of Rajiv Gandhi already begun to face the push and pull of internal pressures? A former union minister, now only a Member of Parliament remarked: "Partymen will bring on pressure every time the leaders try to deviate from the basic principles of the Congress . A small group of leaders cannot take so many partymen for granted."

But then another section maintained there had been no change at all in the party leadership's thinking. They are only trying to "suit the basic principles with the changing times." A statement that was corroborated, though in an entirely different tone, came from a partyman from Delhi. Said he: "The Congress in the time of Mrs Gandhi was criticised for being dominated by a family. Have things changed today? Are they any better? What were the criticisms in Mrs Gandhi's time? No inner-party democracy and no dissent. Things are very much the same today." He was, however, sporting a Rajiv Gandhi badge on his kurta.

Congress for Socialism

The economic resolution at the AICC(I) session sought to clear all doubts when it declared "unequivocally" the party's commitment to socialism and the public sector. Paragraph after paragraph in the document presented at the meet reminded the delegates and everybody concerned that the Congress was still firm on its avowed path of socialism and gave the public sector a pivotal role in the development of the economy. It vehemently denied that the Congress(I) had moved away from the socialistic path. Lest anybody still have any doubts, the resolution elaborated, "Socialism has been our goal because in India's social and economic conditions, no other way was conceivable for solving the problems of the people."

Yet, this was not the message conveyed in the original draft of the resolution presented by finance minister V.P. Singh to the Congress Working Committee (CWC). The finance minister's resolution had, in fact, sought to justify the change in stance by the government in its economic policies by stating, "In the process of continued development, the policy instruments relevant to one stage cannot be treated as permanently sacrosanct. Nor are they ends in themselves." It is obvious then that the rewriting of the resolution was a last minute attempt to preempt the anticipated outburst from several Congressmen perturbed by the government's "rightist leanings" evident in the union budget, the export-import policy, the electronics policy and the innumerable policy changes effected by the new team at the helm.

The rumblings against the government's pro-capitalist and "pro-rich" economic policy had begun soon after the budget. It is learned that as many as 130 Congress(I) MPs had expressed strong opposition to the budget and subsequent concessions to the private sector. About a week before the AICC session several MPs had even begun to openly voice their intention to hit out against the government's economic policy at the two-day meet. Reports to the effect had begun trickling in from several newspapers. The discontent was plain and it was obvious that any resolution seeking to justify the change in economic thought would be hotly debated, possibly culminating in a showdown between the pro and anti lobbies.

It was therefore decided at the eleventh hour to recast the entire resolution to bring into focus a renewed commitment to socialistic values. It is now learned that the draft committee of the CWC comprising Pranab Mukherjee, Darbara Singh, Narasimha Rao and Srikant Verma, worked till the early hours of the morning even on the last day to redraft the entire resolution. The effort was not in vain, as was apparent the next morning. After the first three paragraphs which were retained from the original draft, the committee had added five long paragraphs taking nearly three pages in the 12 page-long resolution emphasising the "socialist strategy of development" of the Congress(I). "Beginning with a firm commitment to socialism," it went on to stress that it had "followed this path steadfastly despite the strong opposition of vested interests."

The AICC(I), the resolution stated, reiterates its strong commitment to the fundamentals of the social and economic strategy laid down by Jawaharlal Nehru and Indira Gandhi. On the public sector, the phraseology was even more emphatic. "The public sector is the sheet anchor of India's progress," the resolution maintained. "It is only by strengthening the public sector that the objective of self reliance (can be achieved)". And if that was not forceful enough, the document went on: "If the working class today feels that it is in the vanguard of national development, the credit goes to the visionaries who conceived of the public sector as the engine of growth and equity."

The next paragraph dwelt on the merits of the 20-point programme which "symbolises the growth with social justice objective." The Congress(I), the resolution maintained, "has never believed in the trickle down effect of growth."

Perhaps, what is even more significant than the additions made to the draft, is the part deleted from the original. While there were several sentences rephrased or deleted in part, there was only one paragraph which was struck off in toto. It read: "Strengthening of the growth impulses of the economy through absorption of modern technology and through appropriate fiscal and legislative changes was imperative to sustain the tempo of industrial development. In the process of continued development the policy instruments relevant to one stage cannot be treated as permanently sacrosanct. Nor are they ends in themselves. The AICC(I) is convinced that in taking steps to modernise the economy, the government has acted on the policy premises that had matured during the period 1980-81 to 84-85."

To be fair to V.P. Singh's document, the original draft did call for maintaining the outlay for the public sector at the size outlined in the seventh plan approach paper. This was endorsed by the working committee. The original document also gave a "crucial role" to the public sector in development (which was changed to "central role" in the final paper). Finally, the first draft had also made a fleeting reference to "our avowed socialistic objective." But what the finance minister did not do then was to hammer in the point repeatedly. Yet on the day when the new look resolution was finally presented at the Sunday session, the finance minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh's intervention in the debate was significant. He talked at length about the very points that he had left out of his draft and which the working committee had added—social security, crop insurance, retrenchment compensation, higher wages for bonus calculation. His defence of the public sector and reiteration to the commitment to socialism was even more emphatic than the rephrased resolution. "Forget it if you think that the policies towards the public sector have changed under Rajiv Gandhi," he told the packed stadium. "The private sector cannot exist for a single day wihout the public sector on whose shoulders it stands," he asserted.

The finance minister had clearly succumbed to pressure. But the question that is far more relevant today than whether he bowed to pressure or not, is: Does the desparate last minute change in the economic resolution really reflect a rethinking on the part of the government? Or, was it plain rhetoric to camouflage the changes brought about over the past months?

SPECIAL REPORT

Hall of Fame

The venue of the first session of the Congress will be commemorated in December

Tejpal auditorium in Bombay's Gowalia Tank is a favourite haunt for theatre buffs. Adjacent to the auditorium is the Sir Mathuradas Vissanji Memorial Hall, which is now rented out for marriages. The Tejpal Memorial complex is more than a hundred years old. In fact, the importance of the green-coloured complex, which overlooks the August Kranti Maidan (the Gowalia Tank maidan was the spot from where Mahatma Gandhi delivered the historic "Quit India" speech on 9 August 1942) is not known to many Bombayites who go there round the year either to see plays or attend marriages.

Hidden behind some green bushes in front of the memorial hall is a marble plaque, which has the inscription: "In this historic hall on the 28 December 1885, a band of loyal patriots laid the foundation of the Indian National Congress which during these 50 years has been built up, stone by stone, tier by tier, by the faith and devotion, courage and sacrifice, of countless men and women, as the pledge and symbol of the invincible purpose to secure India their motherland, her legitimate birthright of Swaraj. This tablet is placed to commemorate the occasion of its golden jubilee, 28 December 1935."

The Congress centenary celebrations have begun. In the hundredth year of the party, the 42-year-old president of the Congress(I), Rajiv Gandhi, who like the Indian National Congress, was born in Bombay, has set the ball rolling for the historic commemoration. When the inauguration took place on 6 May in New Delhi's Indira Gandhi Sports Complex (formerly known as the Indraprastha Indoor Stadium), there was space for 25,000 people. The first meeting of the Indian National Congress on 28 December, 1885, however, was not such a grand affair. When the Gokuldas Tejpal Sanskrit College Hall (it was later renamed Vissanji Memorial Hall, to honour a president of the Gokuldas Trust) was the venue a hundred years ago, "very close to 100 gentlemen" attended (as stated in the Report of the first Indian National Congress, 1885, a party publication). The Hall in Gowalia Tank had become the venue by accident. The meeting was originally scheduled to be held in Pune. A sudden cholera epidemic in Pune brought the patriots to Bombay's Gowalia Tank area. The hall of the Sanskrit College was made available for the meeting by the Tejpal Charities free of cost. (Even now, the trust does not charge money for religious functions. A Durga puja is held in the hall every year) The Congress(I) had decided to hold a meeting of the Congress Working Committee in the hall on 28 December this year, in which certainly more than one hundred gentlemen will be present (though the CWC does not have so many members, including the invitees, the strength of a CWC meeting these days reaches over a hundred).

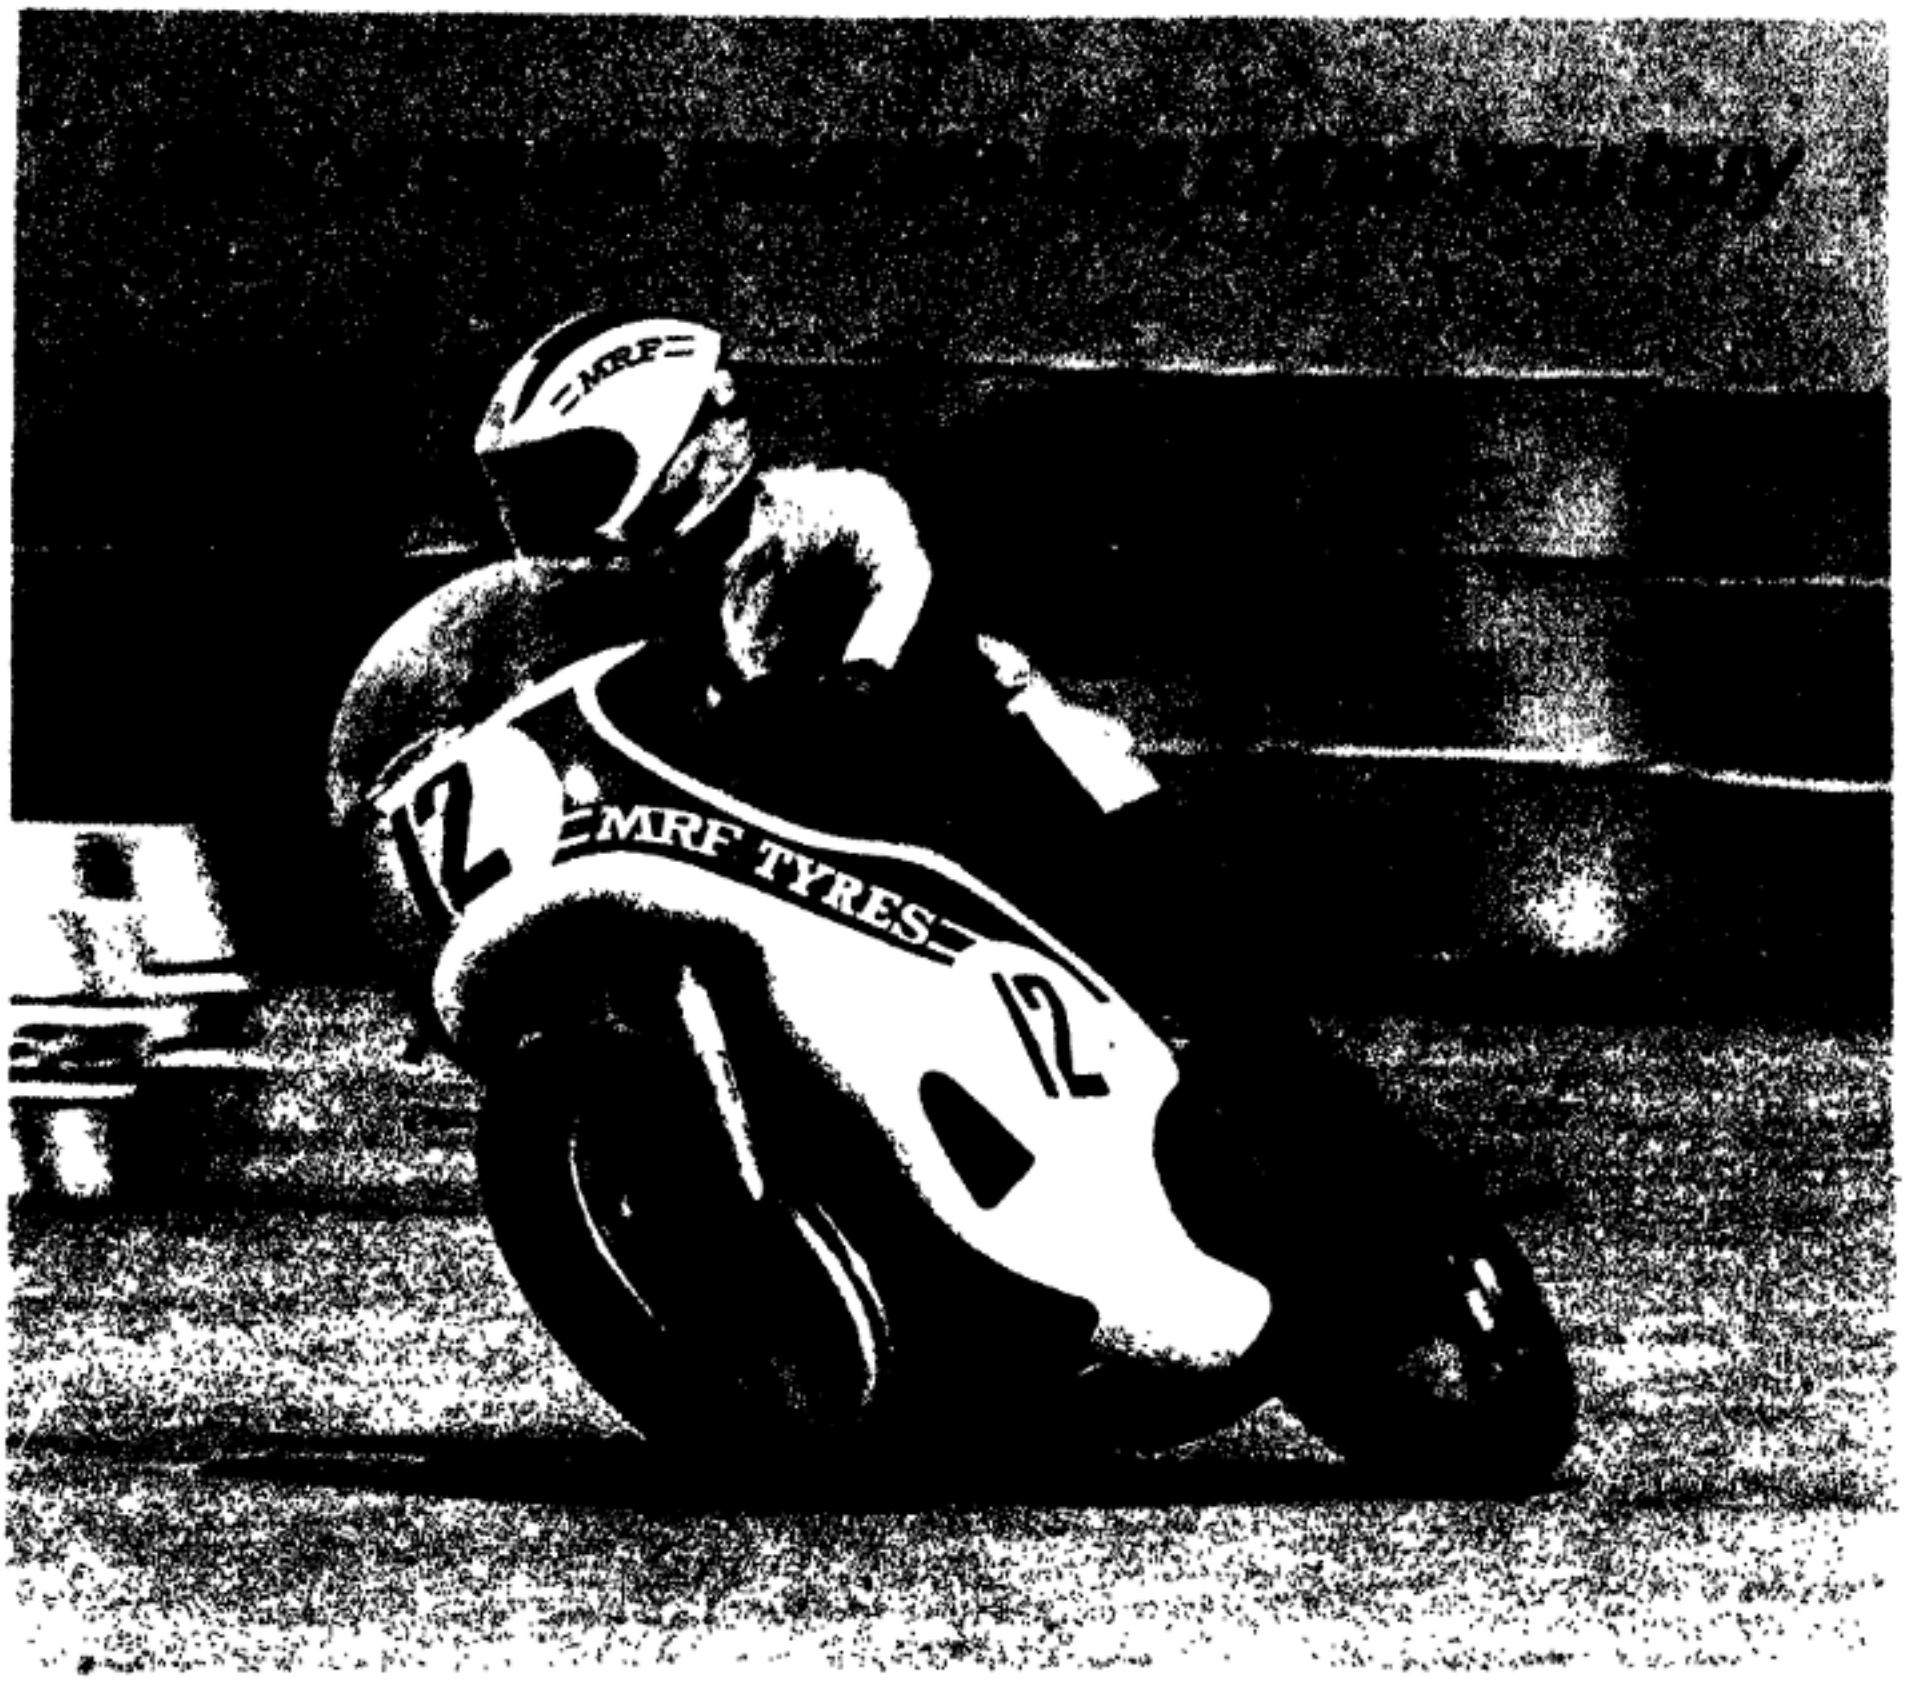
The Tejpal Charities incidentally came into being due to a will left behind on 19 November 1867 by Sir Gokuldas Tejpal, a cotton and textile merchant from Kutch, Gujarat. (Incidentally, exactly 50 years after this, 19 November 1917, Indira Gandhi was born.) The trust is engaged in philanthropic activity and the 100-year-old complex is well looked after.



The inscription on the marble plaque in front of the Vissanji Memorial Hall — Pradeep Chandra

But the question is, can the Congress centenary celebrations afford to just commemorate the foundation by holding a meeting in the memorial hall? In any other country, such a spot would have been turned into a national monument. If national spirit is to grow, then hallowed spots like these cannot be neglected. That the August Kranti Maidan and the Tejpal complex are located close to each other has apparently not struck anyone's imagination so far. A rare combination of the spot where the Indian National Congress was born and the spot from where the "Quit India" clarion call was given cannot be ignored from the point of view of a national monument. In India, however, history is not given due importance. There is a memorial column in the August Kranti Maidan, erected in 1970. While the plaque commemorating the first Congress session at the Tejpal complex and the one commemorating the "Quit India" call at the Gowalia Tank Maidan are not easily visible, what strikes the eye at the memorial column in the August Kranti Maidan is the way in which city fathers of Bombay have immortalised themselves. Prominently visible are two plaques: "Gandhi Memorial Column, inaugurated by Shri V.S. Page, chairman, Gandhi Smarak Nidhi, Bombay, 2 October 1970. Bhoomi puja by Dr M. N. Desai, municipal commissioner for Greater Bombay, 5 August 1970". These plaques, in English and in Marathi, perhaps show Indian mentality at its lowest. Even while commemorating the great leaders, names unconnected with history are sought to be immortalised.

It's true! The very same tyres that you use on city-roads, are repeatedly tested by MRF on race and rally tracks around the country

There's a simple reason why. On a race-track a tyre is subjected to severe torture and strain. In just six hours on the track, a tyre goes through more than half its life. Something that would take more than a year on a city road.

Which means we get our test results that much faster. And you get an improved product that much quicker.

It's a testing technique developed by our collaborators B F Goodrich of the USA, people who build tyres for the NASA Space Shuttle Programme.

And since MRF tests city-tyres on the race-track, you can be sure that when we win, you too are winning. With tyres that are setting new standards for grip, handling, mileage, durability and sheer staying power.

At the end of the race, it's over to the MRF technicians... Testing for heat build-up in a tyre with an electronic pyrometer

The Koran Controversy

A writ petition to ban the holy book is filed in the Calcutta High Court

Between March 18 and 22 1985 the secretary, department of home, government of West Bengal, received a letter from Chand Mal Chopra dated 16 March 1985 from 25, Burtolla Street, Calcutta 700007. The home secretary, Rathin Sengupta, did not pay much heed to the letter. In fact in his own words, he does not remember that such a letter had come to him.

This letter among other things made a "request for the forfeiture of the Islamic book Koran." The letter said, "In terms of section 95 CrPC read with section 153A and 295A IPC every copy of the book is liable to be forfeited by the government if the book contains words or sayings which promote, on grounds of religion, disharmony, enmity, hatred or ill-will between different religious communities or which outrage the religious feelings of any class of citizens of India or insult the religion or religious beliefs of that class of people."This is so," the letter claimed, "whetherthe book is a classic or an epic, religious or temporal, old or new."

It went on to claim that the "Islamic book Koran was blatantly guilty of each one of the above offences and thus squarely deserves to be declared forfeited by the government in terms of the above provisions of law." The letter then quoted English translations of the Koran stating Surah and Ayat (it did not say which translation; there are a number of such English translations in the mar ket) and said that the Koran "incited violence, religious enmity, hatred and ill-will."

The home secretary did, what any normal person would have done; he ignored the letter. After all a lot of cranks keep on writing such letters to the government. In the words of a senior civil servant, "the home department continuously receives crank mail. Unless it is something very serious we simply put it on our files and forget about it."

In fact, this was not the first of such letters received by the home department on the subject. Another letter dated 20 July, 1984 written by one Himangshu Kishore Chakraborty of 12/A/A, Pasupati Bhattacharya Road, Behala, Calcutta 700034, was

I, TIMIR HARAN SEN GUPTA Deputy Secretary, Home Department, Government of West Bengal, residing at [illegible] solemnly affirm and say as follows :-

1. ... I state that according to the Islamic belief the Holy Quran is a Divine Book. It contains the words of God Almighty revealed at His Last Prophet Muhammad. The verses of the Holy Quran were revealed on the happenings of particular events and its each and every verse has a connotation of its own and on different and separate background.

2. ... I further state that as the Holy Quran is a Divine Bo no earthly power can sit upon judgment on it and no Court of la has jurisdiction to adjudicate it. The Holy Books like the Qura the Bible, the Geeta, the Granth Sahib, etc. or their transla-tions cannot be the subject-matters of adjudication in a Court law. All Holy Scriptures are immune from judicial scrutiny.

3. ... I submit that this Hon ble Court has no jurisdiction to pronounce a judgment on the Quran, the Holy Scripture of the Muslims all over the World, each and every word of which, -- according to the Islamic belief, is unalterable.

4. ... There is, as far as known to me, no country in the Wo where there are no Muslims practising their religion, not to menti the countries where the whole population believe in Islam and the Holy Quran, From the time of British Rule and since Indepen dence, inspite of the Indian Penal Code being in existence, the has never been such an application in any Court in Indi .

In

Photocopy of West Bengal government's writ application in the Koran case

also received by the department and when it was not replied to another reminder was sent by the same person on 14 August 1984.

However, Chandmal Chopra's letter held a threat which the department did not take into account . The last paragraph said, "Now you are finally requested to take necessary steps in this behalf within seven days of the receipt hereof, failing which such legal steps may be taken as advised to us. This may please be treated as a notice demanding justice."

It became clear within a month to Chopra that the government did not think much of the letter or the scheme of action. So he decided to move and did something unprecedented in Indian legal history: challenged the Koran in a court of law and nearly got away with it due to a judge who felt sheought to give ear to what any petitioner says because she would not turn anyone down.

On 29 March 1985, the advocate on record, government of West Bengal, R.C. Deb, received a notice from Chand Mal Chopra stating that he wished to move a writ petition in person before Justice Padma Khastagir on 1 April. He also enclosed a copy of the writ petition. It was jointly moved by Chand Mal Chopra and Sital Singh who stated his address was 1, Munshi Sadarudding Street, Calcutta 700007. Both claimed to be "engaged in various kinds of social work." According to a report submitted to the government of West Bengal by the special branch of the Calcutta police, Chandmal and Sital are not permanent residents of the addresses mentioned by them.

Chandmal Chopra, who said he resided at 25, Burtolla Street, did not stay there. According to the police report Chandmal (55), had a room in the above-mentioned premises. This was at present occupied by L.L. Dhokania, an income tax lawyer. Chandmal was known to have frequented this room between 8 and 10 am in the morning. Sital Singh (50), is an ex-armyman and a resident of Hyderabad According to the report, he occasionally came to the city to stay at Munshi Sadaruddin Street in north Calcutta in the Jorasanko area which is actually an Arya Samaj Mandir. He was also known to visit the temple from time to time to participate in kirtan and katha sessions. Both of them did not have any police records norwere their names on the special branch files.

The 14-page petition filed by the two systematically cut through an English translation of the Koran and pointed out that it actively incited communal animosities. To give some examples:"In Surah 9, Ayat 5, the book says, 'When the sacred months are over, slay the idolators wherever you find them. Arrest them, besiege them and lie in ambush everywhere for them.' In Surah 48, Ayat 29 it says, 'Mohammed is Allah's apostle. Those who follow him are ruthless to the unbelievers but merciful to one another.' In Surah 49, Ayat 15, it says, 'the true believers are those who have faith in Allah and His apostle and never doubt: and who fight for his cause with their wealth and persons.' In Surah 8, Ayat 29, it says, 'Make war on them (idol-worshippers) until idolatory is no more and Allah's religion reigns supreme.' In Surah 2, Ayat 216 it has made fighting 'obligatory for every Muslims.' In Surah 47, Ayat 4 to 15, the Koran calls upon Muslims to strike off the heads of non Muslims when they meet on the battlefields, without minding risking their own lives for if any of them are killed fighting in the name of Allah, they are assured of admission in paradise."

The petition continues in the same vein for the rest of the pages.

After a number of adjournments the case was finally heard on 12 April in the court of Justice Padma Khastagir. After hearing Chopra's plea, Justice Khastagir in an unprecedented move asked the state government, who were cited as the main respondents, to file an affidavit by 3 May. Expressing his dismay, a High Court

Government every copy of a book which incites violence; disturbs public tranquility; promotes, on ground of religion, feelings of enmity, hatred and ill-will between different religious communities and insults other religions or religious beliefs of other communities in India.

3. The Koran, also spelt as 'Qur'an', the so-called religious book of the Muslims the world over, written originally in the Arabic and available throughout India in the original Arabic or in its translation in Urdu, Bengali, Hindi, English etc. is ex facie guilty of each one of the above offences.

4. For example, in Surah 9, ayat 5, the book says, "when the sacred months are over, slay the idolaters wherever you find them. Arrest them, besiege them and lie in ambush everywhere for them". In surah 48, ayat 29, it says, "Muhammad is Allah's apostle. Those who follow him are ruthless to the unbelievers but merciful to one another. Through them Allah seeks to enrage the unbelievers". In Surah 49, ayat 15, it says "The true believers are those who have faith in Allah and His apostle and never doubt; and who fight for His cause with their wealth and persons". In Surah 8, ayat 29, it says "Make war on them (idol-worshippers) until idoloty is no more and Allah's religion reigns supreme". In Surah 2, ayat 193, it again says, "Fight against them until idolatry is no more and Allah's religion reigns supreme. In Surah 2, ayat 216, it has made fighting "obligatory" for every Muslim.

In Sura 9, ayat 41, it exhorts Muslims to "march on and fight for the cause of Allah" whether unarmed or well-equipped.

In Surah 9, ayat 123, exhorting Muslims to make wars on infidels 'who dwell around you' says, "Let them find harshness in you". In Surah 66, ayat 9, an exhortation is given to lawyer, who did not wish to be named said."It was clear that the petitioners were upto some mischief and this should have been clear to the judge too. The case should have been dismissed immediately."

When contacted by SUNDAY, Justice Khastagir said she had only been following the natural course of justice. "It is my duty to listen to every petitioner who comes to my court. He may be a madman but I must give him a chance," she said. According to her, she had not admitted the case but only asked the state government to submit an affidavit explaining its stand on the issue. Her statement created another storm. While the Chief Justice, Mr Satish Chandra as well as Justice Khastagir insisted that the case had not been admitted by the court, the advocate-general, Snehangshu Acharya, insisted that she had definitely admitted it. While this created misunderstandings within the Calcutta High Court, reportage of this matter by the Urdu press made sure that the issue was broadcasted to the Muslim-dominated countries like Bangladesh and Pakistan. Protests were promptly lodged at the embassies in these countries.

Meanwhile when the matter came up for hearing on 2 May 1985, Justice Padma Khastagir, due to reasons best known to her, released the case from her court. Said another lawyer of the High Court, "it was quite clear that the judge had developed cold feet, otherwise why did she not have the guts to see this to the end. I don't see how this case could have affected her personally." It was, therefore, left to Chief Justice. Satish Chandra to decide which judge would deal with the case. Justice Chandra has allotted the case to Justice Bimal Basak, who is expected to clean up the mess, according to High Court sources.

The Calcutta High Court's bar association called an extraordinary meeting where it moved a resolution saying they note "with deep concern that a writ petition... praying for a mandate upon the state for forfeiture of the copies of holy Koran either in Arabic or any other language in the country was entertained by Justice Padma Khastagir who directed the state to file a counter-affidavit... This association feels deeply concerned at an attempt to make a holy scripture a subject matter of dispute in a court of law and/or to make the same justiciable." This resolution, though signed by more than 70 lawyers of the court was, however, not passed at the meeting.

While lawyers of Calcutta High Court were restrained in their condemnation, the West Bengal chief minister, Jyoti Basu, called the entertainment of the case a "despicable" act. He said that the case should not have been admitted by the court in the first place. The union law minister, Ashok Sen, was sent on an express mission from the capital to deal with it. Keeping in mind the international ramifications of the issue, sources at the High Court said that in all probability the case will be dropped quietly.

However, the state government who are the sole respondents in the case, have already prepared their defence. According to sources, the state will plead that the Holy Koran is a divine book and no earthly power can sit upon judgement on it and no court of law has jurisdiction to adjudicate it. "The holy books like the Koran, the Bible, the Geeta, the Granth Sahib, or their translations cannot be the subject matter of adjudication in a court of law. All holy scriptures are immune from judicial scrutiny.' According to the defence lawyers it is strange that from the "time of British rule and since independence, in spite of the fact that the Indian Penal Code existed there has never been such an application in the courts of this country." What prompts these people to take up the matter now, they ask.

Kerala's Killer Schools

The suicide of Mrs Ramani Menon, because her daughter was not promoted, reveals the shameful way in which many schools are run

Vandana Menon with her father C.C. Menon

In the most literate state in the country education is a booming business. Most of the students coming out of the hundreds of government-aided and unaided schools that sprout in every corner of the state will have paid at least five to ten times the prescribed fees. In all such non-government institutions, run mostly by Hindus, Christian and Muslim organisations, collecting and mostly forcing money out of students is as much a part of curricula as dispensing knowledge. So after Ramani Menon, the mother of ninth standard student Vandana Menon of the Trivandrum Carmel Convent Girls High School committed suicide allegedly because her daughter was detained in class nine, a big question mark has appeared on the ethical and moral aspect of the most widespread educational system of the country. Parents, the public and teachers are now up in arms against the ruthless and unethical commercialisation of education in the state and the state government has its back to the wall as licenses for private schools have been liberally granted by successive governments and also because it had encouraged the practice of forced donations being resorted to by these schools. The government has, however, asked the crime branch to investigate the suicide of Ramani Menon.

Vandana Menon had secured more than 55 per cent marks for all the subjects except mathematics for which she got 28 out of 100, seven marks short of the pass mark. Vandana fell short of a first class distinction by only eight marks (352/600) and in most schools such promising students are not detained and the rule is observed in the spirit and not in the letter. But private schools never waste an opportunity to use the 'all-subjects-pass-rule' against students whose parents have been asking uncomfortable questions abqut donations and special tuition fees.

Vandana's father, C. C. Menon, in a written complaint given to the director of public instruction, stated that his daughter was being harassed and humiliated in her class as he had refused to pay Rs 1,000 for the school bus fund. Unable to bear the ignominy Vandana had forced her father to finally part with Rs 500 which the sisters who run the school accepted rather half-heartedly. He also pounced on the contradictory statements of school authorities about Vandana's performance in mathematics. "First they said she failed and now they say she did not get 90 per cent," Mr Menon said before leaving the city for Trichur with Vandana shortly after Mrs Menon's death. After Mr Menon's complaint, the government has seized all answer papers of class nine of the Carmel Convent School which will be revalued by professors. But Mr Menon maintains that Vandana's progress card given to the government is forged and that his signature does not appear in it.

Sister Renee, the headmistress of the Carmel Convent told SUNDAY that they were being victimised for no fault of theirs. "I met Vandana's mother on 15 April about a week after the results were announced and I told her that Vandana should sit for a re-test after the school reopens. But she was apparently not willing," said Sister Renee. According to Mr Menon the headmistress told his wife that under no circumstances would Vandana pass the re-test.

Booming Business

The forced donation syndrome is not limited to private schools. Even private colleges have their own way of collecting money. Colleges run by religious organisations are many but after the massive strike launched by student organisations about eight years back fees were unified and all teachers came under the government scale. But private managements make up the excess amount paid to the teachers by demanding huge donations ranging upto Rs 30,000 from any post-graduate aspiring for a lecturer's job. This is an accepted practice and even first class post-graduates are overlooked for jobs when people with second-class degrees, but willing to pay a large amount, are waiting.

Another canker that is biting into the state's educational system is the tutorial colleges which mushroom at every turn. These colleges are meant to coach students who have failed in recognised colleges and schools. They have become so successful that they frequently carry full-page advertisements in newspapers to announce their 'superb performances in public examinations ranging from SSLC to post graduate course'. A rough estimate shows that more than 50 per cent of SSLC students, even those studying in recognised schools, attend private tutorial colleges before or after school hours. Some tutorials have better equipped laboratories than recognised colleges. A recent boon for such colleges is the announcement by government that there would be admission tests for joining medical and engineering colleges. A parallel college in Trivandrum, Universal College, charges Rs 600 for preparing a student for the admission test. A student who recently went there for admission told SUNDAY, "They behave as though they are doing us a great favour by admitting us for the course. There is such a rush for admissions that they don't even look at your face. They can't take their eyes off the money."

One of the numerous tutorial colleges that have sprung up in Kerala Gopal Krishnan

Binoo John, Trivandrum

The tenth standard secondary school leaving certificate examination (SSLC) results are used as advertisements by private schools to draw students. The better the SSLC results, the more the rush for admission and more the demand for donations. In Carmel Convent, all those who had appeared for the SSLC examination last year had passed. On the notice board of the St. Joseph's High School in Trivandrum, which is government-aided, a notice asks for a donation of Rs 500 from every parent aspiring to have his child admitted to the school. The notice is signed by the headmaster and outside his room one can see meandering queues. But Sister Renee of Carmel Convent justifies the demand for donations by saying, "We are an infant institution and it is a period of growth for us. We need a lot of money."

Not all of the huge sums thus collected is accounted for. For instance, Vandana Menon paid Rs 176 as fees for the first month of the year. Fees for the following month range from Rs 30 to Rs 50, depending on the class. But in the account book Vandana's fee is recorded as Rs 50 (receipt no 9338/paid on 12 June 1984). The remaining Rs 126 is recorded in the receipt slip written in her own handwriting and is kept as a loose slip in the office without any carbon copy or any identifying number. This makes jugglery easy.

Even before Vandana's mother's suicide came to light, the government had begun taking action on complaints of forced donations from parents. The education minister, T. M. Jacob, had announced that the government was withdrawing recognition to two private schools in Trivandrum, because of complaints of corruption. But the school authorities later said that their recognition had not been formally withdrawn and the minister maintained a strange silence. It soon became obvious that some bureaucrat was playing his game. Incidentally, on the board of directors of one of the de-recognised schools, Vidhyadiraja High School, is Ramachandran Nair who also happens to be the culture secretary of the government.

Even the district educational officer, P. Saradamma, who has to formally recommend derecognition was vague about the issue but told SUNDAY that the two schools (the other is Lourdes Mount School) did not even have the specified area of three acres for running a school. "And it is high time that such forced donations are stopped," Saradamma said.

One of the many tutorial colleges in Trivandrum

The chances of the government ordering a thorough investigation into the functioning of all private schools are not bright as most of the private schools are run by religious orders and sects like the Society of Jesus (Catholic priests), the Nair Service Society (of Hindu Nairs) and Muslim Educational Society. All the religious communities have their representative parties in the UDF government. The education minister, T.M. Jacob, of the Kerala Congress which is the political expression of Christians has refused to accept responsibility for the goings-on in the schools by saying that he did not sanction any private school and that it was all the work of the previous governments. But a list of new licenses granted to private schools was released recently. A senior priest of the Society of Jesus told SUNDAY that the party handling the education portfolio has to be given huge sums before a license is granted. Then why blame the schools alone for collecting money? It is all a vicious circle. It is little wonder then that the products of such an educational system should consider making money the most effective motivation in life.

How Education Ruins Merit in Bihar

Question papers sell for Rs 100 to Rs 1,000 in roadside shops, depending on 'accuracy'

Going to school or college in Bihar has become a cruel farce for thousands of boys and girls struggling for a foothold in life: the fifteen years in school and college have turned into a chaotic ritual everyone has to sit through to avoid being labelled an unemployable illiterate, but not necessarily to get a job. Education being rather low on the government's priorities, little attempt is made to improve its quality; hardly anything is spent on such luxuries as teaching aids. The ambitious ten plus two scheme, based on the dual concepts of job-oriented education and delinking of degrees from jobs, is a victim of governmental indecision and neglect seven years after it was introduced, there is still no official policy on intermediate education that spells out the qualifications and service conditions of teachers and the facilities to be provided to schools and colleges which have the course. What is worse, the government refuses to take financial responsibility for these institutions. So there is a free-for-all; private managements set up new and curiously named (preferably after an important political leader) 'inter-colleges' overnight with the money they have gathered from unqualified lecturers who have paid for their jobs—in thousands of rupees.

Even otherwise, the whole purpose of job-oriented education has been defeated by objective socio-economc conditions—unemployment and corruption—which are worsening every year. Apparently, the students are learning from it all: hardly does a year pass without several papers of the matriculation and intermediate examinations having to be cancelled either because the question papers are found selling in roadside dhabas and paan shops days in advance, or because the students take to cheating, or impersonating each other en masse. In desperation, the authorities are now using the police against examinees to prevent malpractices, convinced that this would solve the problem once and for all.

The fact is, it does not. There was proof enough in the matriculation and intermediate examinations this year. In Sitamarhi district, for instance, shops in crowded bazars were reported selling conveniently-sized 'cheating slips' in sealed envelopes, imaginatively captioned 'Atom Bomb' priced between Rs 2.50 and Rs 4. Also on the market were pocket-sized books containing questions and answers which covered as many as 15 subjects in both the matriculation and intermediate examinations. In fact, the answer-books came from sources who were competing with each other for a bigger market, and bore copied brand names. If one was called an 'Atom Bomb' another was called an 'Anand Atom Bomb.'

On 19 April, around seven in the morning, three student activists of the Akhil Bharatiya Vidyarthi Parishad (ABVP) learnt that the mathematics question paper in the intermediate examination had leaked out. They even got hold of a handwritten copy of the question paper. Since work in the intermediate council building starts only at 10.30 am, the students decided to go to the examination controller Harinarayan Mishra's house, and show him the paper before the examination commenced. "We were pushed out of his house, and told to meet him in the office," one of the boys said. Then they tried the council's financial officer M.M. Kazmi at his residence at 9.37 am. They drew a blank there, too. Finally, they reached the council building at noon. They stormed the chairman, Dr Saligram Singh's office, and not finding him in, occupied his chair. Soon, a number of officials including Mr Kazmi, arrived with the education minister Uma Pandey and ordered the students out of the room. They told the minister about the question paper, and left only after Dr Singh assured them that he would look into the leak. They discussed the matter with the chairman and showed him the 'slips' of paper they had got. The questions did tally with the ones which figured in the examination that day. The English paper had leaked out, too. Finally, the chairman decided to cancel Geography Paper II (which had been mistakenly interchanged with Geography Paper I), English Paper II and Mathematics Papers I and II.

A few days later on 22 April the students again visited the council office with a slip of paper which they claimed was the Political Science Paper II, scheduled for 24 April. But since Dr Singh told the students to withdraw the allegation of corruption they had made against him or else he would not listen to their complaint. "Before we knew what was happening," said one of the students," a number of toughs trooped into the room and attacked the three of us, Chandrashekhar Prasad Sinha, Sanjay Kumar Sharma and Gajendra Prasad Singh. They chased us away. There were six of them, three on an Enfield motorcycle (BHQ 3499) and three on a scooter which followed." The boys filed an FIR in the Patna Kotwali (No. SDE 650).

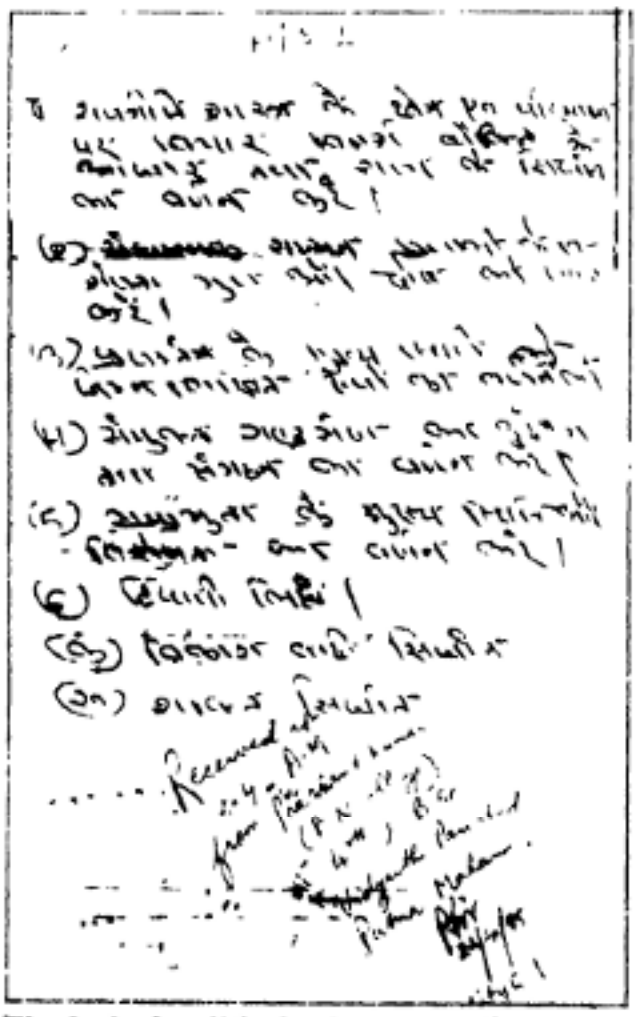
The matriculation examination this year was held in 1,038 centres of which nearly 300 were in the jurisdictions of sub-divisional district headquarters, where, according to the chairman of the matriculation examination board, Mr Sudarshan, the presence of policemen prevented mass copying. "But in rural areas," he said, "in a very large number of centres, there was good use of unfair means." Out of the 1,038 centres, in more than 300, examinations in one or more subjects, and a total of 700-odd papers were cancelled. "Because of the repeated use of unfair means," Mr Sudarshan went on, "the centres were frequently changed to neighbouring district headquarters where there are restrictions on the movements of the examinees' attendants; they are not allowed beyond a certain distance of the examination centre." Mr Sudarshan was happy enough that there was no question paper leak in matriculation this year, although 75 per cent of the centres were in mofussil areas where there is hardly any way of checking malpractices.



He could be wrong. This year, people in a number of schools in Muzaffarpur sold handwritten questions from eight in the morning on every examination day; photostat copies of the answers to these questions could be bought from touts in the city's Hari Sabha Chowk for Rs 10 each. On 27 March a group of persons involved in the racket were arrested. Not that the police were much help: on 23 March, 24 matriculation examinees were arrested in the Katihar Marwari Patshala for entering the hall with fake admission cards; but they still managed to take the examination! In Muzaffarpur hundreds of examinees and their 'helpers' were arrested; they were released after being fined Rs 100 each. In 19 centres in North Champaran, invigilating teachers actually helped students to cheat openly.

According to Mr Sudarshan great care is taken to ensure that the questions remain a secret till the last minute: "The papers are delivered to the superintendents at each centre only one hour before the examination starts. Till then they are stored in banks under the charge of the bank managers." As for the intermediate questions, the chairman of the council assigns

'Helpers' outside an examination centre busy writing out answers for friends inside

professors from various universities of Bihar to draw up a rough list of questions for each paper, and then gets them moderated by senior academics. Seniority however does not rule out corruption: once a rough list of questions for a particular paper that had been lost was finally traced inside the bag of a moderator! Several influential men and women are allegedly involved in the question paper racket—if not for anything, at least for the money it fetches. The going rate for an

The leaked political science question paper countersigned by intermediate council authorities when it was presented to them hours before the examination

'original' list of questions is Rs 100 - Rs 1,000. The few who can afford this, buy the 'original' and then sell off the list in varying degrees of accuracy, for anything between Rs 10 and Rs 75. One of the chief sources of the question papers, of course, is the registrar's office at Punai Chowk, Patna. For a desperate student, a clerk in the intermediate council office is always a great help.

Some privileges are reserved for the important: there is the case of a matriculation answer script (No. 80510) signed by the invigilator which was found outside the Mahila Prathamik Shiksha High School in Chandwara, Muzaffarpur, where it should have been under lock and key. The allegation is that hundreds of such papers are smuggled out and 'improved upon' in order to ensure a higher grading for rich or influential examinees.

Why is there such despair? Has Bihar's educatiion system collapsed? Asked to explain mass copying on such a scale, Mr Sudarshan said, "All sections of society are party to it; no section is free from blame." Perhaps, because the root cause of student delinquency and recklessness is the spectre of unemployment. "Education at all stages," the official continued, "has become unpurposive. None of the objectives of education seem to be served, whether at the school or university level. It only helps to make people literate. This applies more to higher education than secondary education. There are engineers without jobs, first class master's degree holders in physics and chemistry who roam the streets for years." And one cannot even put much faith in their abilities: "People who pass these examinations do not even possess the knowledge expected of such degrees." A large number of the students who study and train in Bihar's nine medical colleges, industrial training institutes, engineering colleges and polytechnics have to wait endlessly for jobs. The state has a total of 7,000 government doctors of whom 495 do not hold any post. And even if literacy is the aim of education, not much can be said of its worth: Bihar still has one of the lowest literacy rates for any state or union territory, 26.01 per cent.

A most unforgivable fact is the government's lack of an education policy. Although it is seven years since the ten plus two plus three scheme was started, the government is still undecided about the position of intermediate institutions in the system. It is not clear how exactly intermediate colleges are different from schools or degree colleges; what the qualifications, salaries and service conditions of the teachers should be and where exactly intermediate education takes a student.

After the failure of the earlier system, in which the plus two stage was partly incorporated into the school syllabus and partly into the pre-university syllabus, the national pattern was started to take the load off higher education, and space out the rush for jobs. Following the recommendations of the Kothari Commission, a separate intermediate council was formed to take care of institutions and examinations related to the plus two course. A decision was taken to start a new variety of 'inter colleges.' But till there was a complete transfer to inter colleges the plus two course was to be taught in degree colleges. The students, however, would be under the charge of the intermediate council, which would decide the syllabus and hold their examinations, while being taught by university teachers. The council was also responsible for giving affiliation to new inter colleges (against monetary deposits which varied with the number and nature of faculties). But once the council began holding the examinations, there was pandemonium. Even with computers being used, the results were full of errors, and invariably kept pending for years. Eventually, from 1984 the government decided to entrust the examinations to different universities. The council's functions were limited to drawing up the questions and declaring results, besides according affiliation to new colleges. The universities would evaluate the papers. Everything went off well last year—only to go awry this year. The question papers were leaked, and the examinations proved a hoax. Now teachers and students are calling the council a white elephant that has no right to exist.

Meanwhile, inter colleges have been sprouting all over the state. There are already about 500 of them in Bihar now, of which nearly 250 are affiliated to the council. The rest are waiting for affiliation—which is not always given in the most deserving cases. Many colleges have already deposited money with the council, expecting to get affiliation, and have started operating. Most of the institutions are working as purely commercial establishments: many of the staffers, who number 20,000 to 30,000, have actually 'bought' their jobs after making generous 'donations' to the colleges. The prices were fixed: Rs 10,000 for a teacher's job, Rs 5000 for a non-teaching post. In many cases, it is these deposits which provide the colleges money for affiliation to the intermediate council. This also rules out agitations and strikes. Said Prof. Parmanand Singh Madan, MLC, and a member of the Federation of University Teachers' Association of Bihar, "But for a few good colleges, most private institutions are merely doing business. We have been agitating for the abolition of private management from education. In 1972, as a result, the then CM Kedar Pandey ordered the takeover of primary education." The move paid off. Bihar has won a Rs 30-lakh award for its commendable drive for enrolment of girls in elementary schools. There are already 64,000 primary and middle schools in the state with a teacher for every 64 pupils in the former and a teacher for every 40 pupils in the latter. A total of Rs 264 crores is spent every year on primary and middle school education in Bihar.

But the pressures on Bihar's education system are taking their toll. Just as there are hardly any jobs for the thousands who pass out of intermediate and degree colleges every year, there are few seats in college and university to compete for. There has, over the years, been a tremendous increase in the enrolment of students at all levels, making examinations, admissions and even teaching a mammoth task. In 1983 about three lakhs took the matriculation examinations; in 1984 the figure rose to over three lakhs; this year the number was 4,90,000. Of the three lakhs last year, a little over two lakhs passed. As a result, inter colleges which were finding it difficult to run at one time are now doing brisk business. "If around 3,50,000 of those who appeared this year pass the examination, the whole of Bihar's education system will collapse," said Prof Madan.

What is important is that the facilities in schools and colleges, even at their existing strength, are grossly inadequate and of poor quality. "Most of the schools do not have proper accommodation or academic facilities," said Mr Sudarshan. "There are over 4,000 schools under the matriculation board, with more than 50,000 teachers. Out of these 4,000, the ones which have proper accommodation for students (classrooms etc) number only 600-700." A natural result is poor teaching. As for the use of unfair means, Mr Sudarshan added, "It can be minimised with adequate help from the administration. I have two suggestions: there should be executive control over students—they should be arrested if caught cheating; and magistrates should be empowered to imprison students indulging in malpractices." Can draconian measures solve the problem? If social conditions have caused student morbidity, something had better be done about them first.

PUNJAB

Akal Takht to be Rebuilt

S G P C president G.S. Tohra claims "divine sanction"

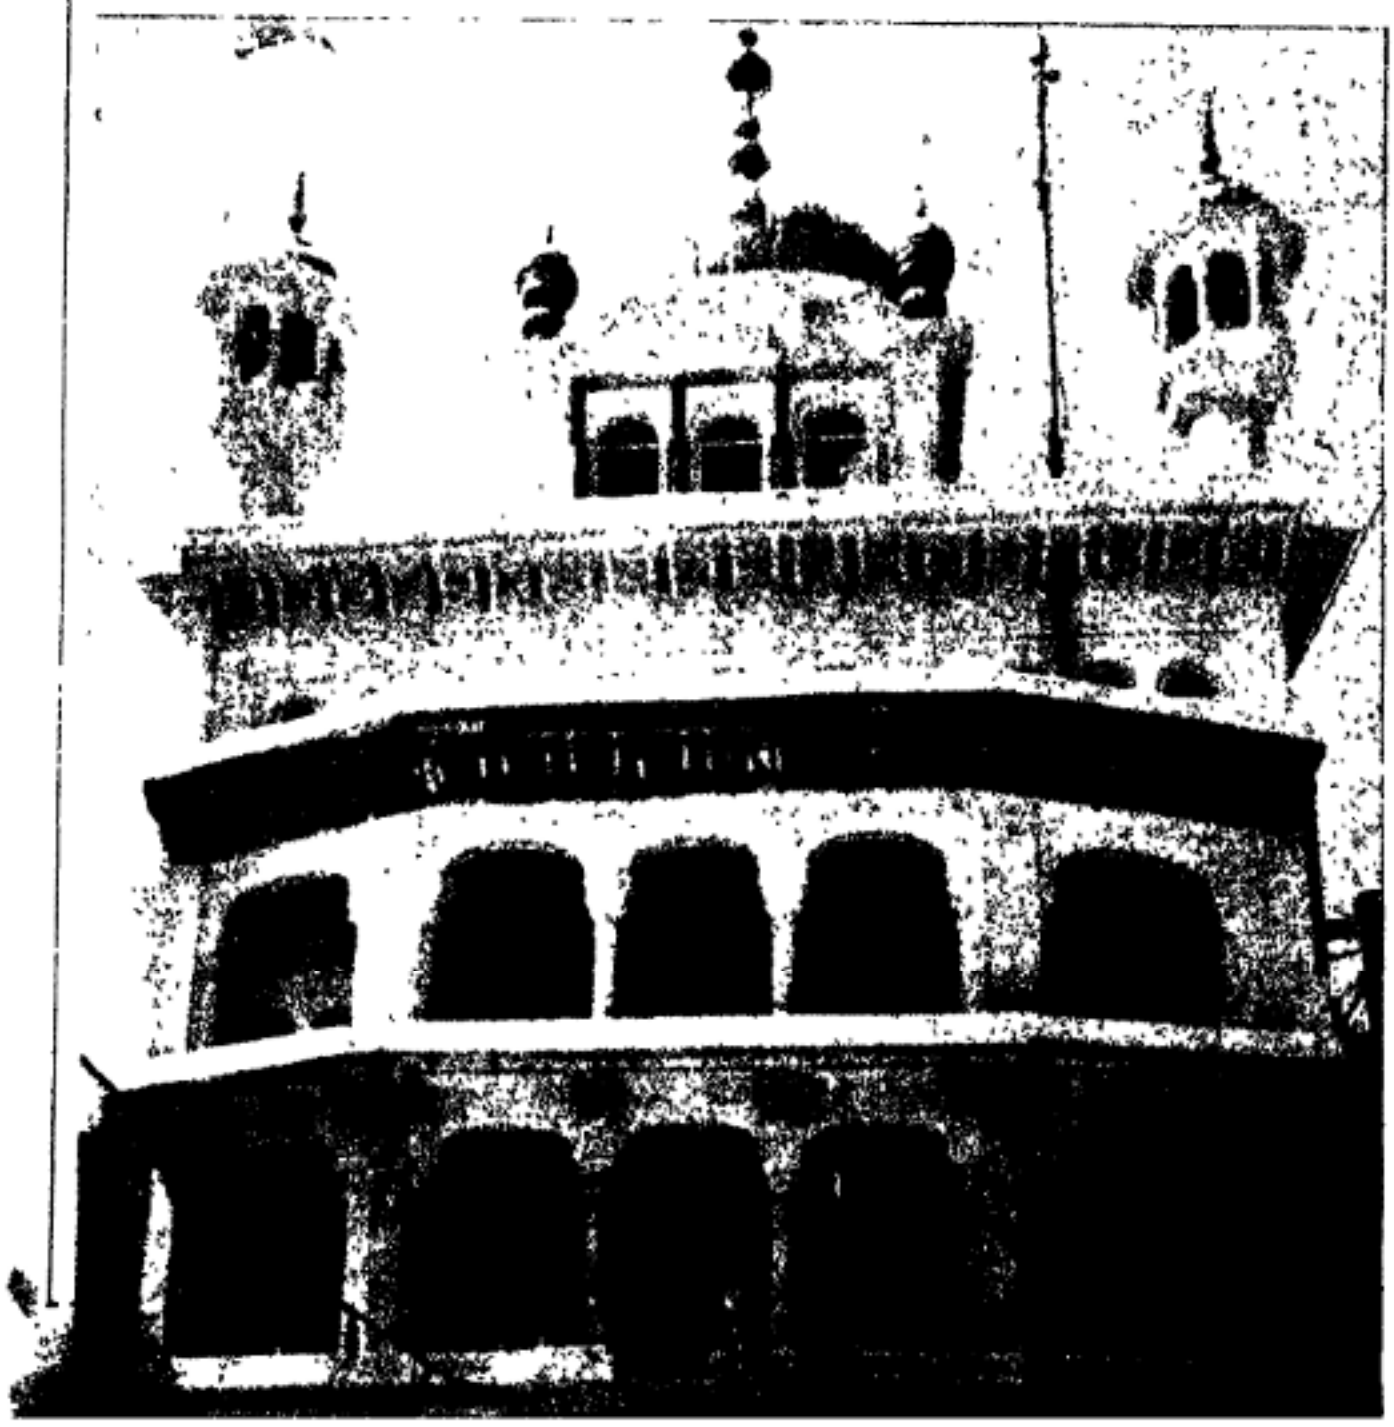
The Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) ex-president Gurcharan Singh Tohra could not have asked for anything more. On 20 April, Tohra declared in Amritsar that the Akal Takht, the highest seat of the temporal and spiritual authority of the Sikhs would be demolished and rebuilt. Exactly 16 days later, Tohra,to quote him, got "divine sanction" to demolish and rebuild the Akal Takht when a three metre by one metre part of the projection of the holiest Sikh shrine broke off on the evening of 6 May.

When the chunk collapsed, Tohra was in his room in the Teja Singh Samundari Hall and as soon as he heard the news, he rushed there. It was around six in the evening and a number of Sikh pilgrims and visitors were in the complex. Within no time a large crowd around the Akal Takht had gathered. Tohra's first reaction after seeing the debris was, "It is a miracle of God who has approved the rebuilding of the shrine." He told SUNDAY later, "the sudden collapse of the portion of the Akal Takht has expressed the will of the gurus who have approved the decision of the Sikh panth to rebuild it."

The senior Akali leader also ridiculed the government claiming that the incident is a rebuff to those who were claiming that the best material was used in rebuilding the Akal Takht."Imagine,it has started collapsing within eight months." On 21 April, at his first press conference in Amritsar, Tohra had announced "the panth will have to rebuild the Akal Takht. The present sarkari-built (government-built) Akal Takht can't be acceptable to the panth. It will have to be demolished and a new one built through kar seva. Religious buildings constructed by the sarkar can't be accepted by anyone."

The sudden collapse of a small part of the decorative awning from the topmost floor on 6 May is bound to quicken the launching of the rebuilding of the shrine through kar seva. The SGPC has already started contacting eminent architects and engineers about plans for the demolition and rebuilding. The five high priests led by Giani Kirpal Singh, the jathedar of the Akal Takht had earlier endorsed Tohra's decision.

The SGPC secretary Bhan Singh told SUNDAY, "The kar seva is likely to be entrusted to Baba Kharak Singh."However,hedid not say from when kar seva would begin. Baba Kharak Singh, the octogenarian Sikh saint lives in a gurdwara on the outskirts of Amritsar. To Akali leaders as well as the Congress(I) stalwarts like the union minister Buta Singh Kharak Singh is the most revered Sikh saint today and even Bhindranwale "obeyed" his commandments.



For the Sikhs, says Harbhajan Singh Brar, an Akali leader of the Talwandi faction, the Akal Takht is even more sacred than the Harimandir Sahib because it was built by the sixth Sikh guru, Shri Hargobind Sahib who built the Akal Takht in 1606. Says Manjit Singh, a former president of the All India Sikh Student Federation (AISSF) who is said to be close to Sant Harchand Singh Longowal. "Only three persons were involved in the construction of the Akal Takht Guru Hargobind Sahib, Baba Budhaji and Bhai Gurdas--the two most respected Sikh Saints. According to Manjit Singh, the attack or the desecration of the Akal Takht has never been tolerated and is always avenged by the Sikhs. He explains, "that is why Beant Singh and Satwant Singh have become instant heroes of the Sikhs today. Their families are being honoured. That is all Sikh tradition and a part of Sikh history."

After the 6 May incident, hundreds of Sikhs have been visiting the Akal Takht every day. They are not as much interested in seeing the shrine as they are in looking at the debris. The Sikh devotees openly curse the government, Mrs Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi for the destruction. Many of them pick up the debris and tell the others standing by, that the government used the "worst material" to rebuild the Akal Takht.

The Akal Takht was badly damaged during the June army action in the Golden Temple and later rebuilt by the government through the kar seva undertaken by the controversial Nihang chief Baba Santa Singh for whom there is nothing but contempt among the Sikhs today.

The Trigger-happy Minister

Ram Chatterjee is indicted by the CID

Ram Chatterjee, West Bengal's minister for civil defence has recently been indicted by the CID. He has been found guilty of opening fire on some people in his hometown, Chandannagar (40 km from Calcutta). There might be unity among the constituents of the Left Front in Writer's Building, Calcutta but in Chandannagar it is Ram Chatterjee who wields the maximum amount of clout. Reasons other than being a political leader (he is the chairman of the Forward Bloc-Marxist), he is also the person who wields the gun. Chandannagar, a CPI(M) stronghold for many years (it is represented by Bhabani Mukherjee, West Bengal's minister for environment) has resisted the musclepower of Ram Chatterjee and over the last few years the CPI(M) cadres have been trying their utmost to break the hitherto unchallenged supremacy of Chatterjee's men. The quarrels between the political parties get bitter when the spoils of power are at stake. And the political quarrels are often settled on the streets of the small town. It is no wonder then that Ram Chatterjee always carries a gun.

Matters came to a head of 8 July last year when Dipak Mukherjee (alias Babla, Ram Chatterjee's nephew) was surrounded by members of Ashok Patra and his gang, all supporters of the CPI(M). Babla warned Patra that he would not be spared by his uncle if anything happened to him. Soon afterwards, one of Babla's men pushed through the crowd from the back and shouted out to Babla: "Guru guli chalai? (Boss, shall I fire?)" Patra had no other alternative but to flee from the scene, While escaping he told one of his men, Ashish Roy, who was standing nearby, to run away since Babla and his gang were coming to get them.

Roy, however, could not escape. He was caught, taken into a blind alley and beaten up. Meanwhile, someone informed Ram Chatterjee in his home at Garbati that Babla had been kidnapped by Patra. Quick to react to such situations, Ram Chatterjee took his gun and his two securitymen, Madhusudhan Panda and Sitaram Misra and drove in his official car to Jelepara, where Babla had been attacked. Hearing from the residents of the area that Ashish Roy was in the blind alley, the minister brandishing his gun ran towards the dazed Roy who was still whimpering in pain. Then shoving the barrel into Roy's face, the minister wanted to know the whereabouts of his nephew. Roy could not answer. Then Ram Chatterjee tried dragging Roy to his car but the local people objected. In the melee which followed, the minister fired a round in the air. So did his two security guards. A short while later, the officer in charge of the Chandannagar police station, Harun-al-Rashid, arrived on the spot and advised the minister to leave the place since it was not safe for him. Moreover, advised the police officer, since Babla was safe, there was no need for Ram Chatterjee to stay there.

Roy was taken to Chandannagar police station and he filed a FIR there (case no 7, 8 July 1984). He said that he was hit on the back with a rod. He fell down and was helped up by the OC of Chandannagar police station. Ram Chatterjee, meanwhile, arrived in a T-shirt and a lungi and shoved the barrel of his gun in Roy's right eye and shouted, "Salakey guli korey phele dey" (Shoot him). Roy also mentioned in the FIR that the minister wanted to kidnap him. Two days later on 10 July 1984, on coming to know that Roy had filed a FIR, Ram Chatterjee filed an application for anticipatory bail. He was granted bail by the Hooghly Sessions Judge on 20 July.

The CID before indicting the minister had interrogated the OC of the Chandannagar police station. The intelligence men had even tried to question the minister but they had been unsuccessful In spite of the indictment, Ram Chatterjee is not sorry about his behaviour. The Telegraph which had reported the incident in detail on 22 July 1984 in its 9 May editorial headlined, Ram Chatterjee must go (written after the CID indictment) said: "The criminal background of Ram Chatterjee is hardly a secret. If this charge is not verified by the police and their files, then all one has to do is check with the people of Chandannagar who have been at the receiving end of Mr Chatterjee's extortion and bullying for decades...The (8 July 1984) incident was reported in all the newspapers and created a major furore which Mr Chatterjee tried to escape by less-than-convincing disclaimers. The surprise lay not in Mr Chatterjee's inept defence, but in the fact that (chief minister) Jyoti Basu apparently believed his version. Nothing happened to Mr Chatterjee; he continued in his ministerial chair, more confident than ever that his political alliances had put him beyond the reach of the law...Will Mr Chatterjee escape justice again (after the indictment by the CID)?"

Perhaps he might; for soon after the editorial when a Telegraph reporter Barun Ghosh, went to interview the minister in his home in Chandannagar, Ram Chatterjee was his usual arrogant self. Snatching Ghosh's press card, the minister told him, "Ask your editor to come to rescue you." He then took out his revolver and threatened the reporter: "Nobody can save you, neither your editor nor anybody else. If you leave this room," he warned, "my people will finish you off." The reporter was only let off after the minister had cooled down a bit. When the incident was reported to the Left Front chairman Saroj Mukherjee on 12 May he is supposed to have said that the minister's behaviour was "being looked into." It remains to be seen whether Ram Chatterjee continues to be retain his ministerial berth in the West Bengal cabinet.

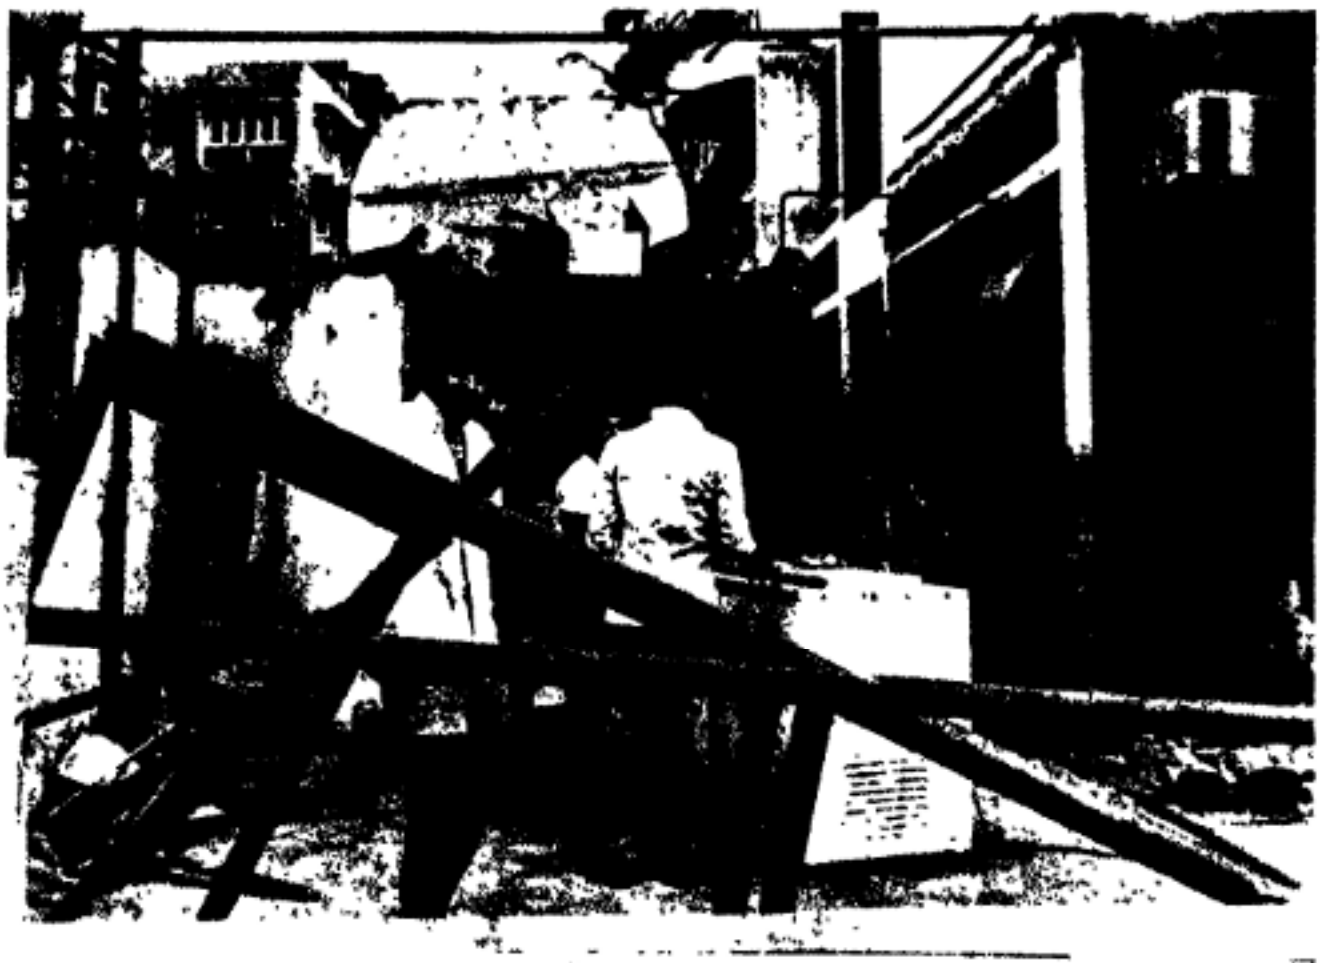
Operation Demolition

Monsoon shed of Vasantdada Patil's son is brought down

Will he, won't he, be permitted to put his monsoon shed back? There is speculation regarding the monsoon shed put up last year at the entrance of his restaurant 'Step-In' by Chandrakant Patil, alias Nandkumar Jadhav, step-son of the chief minister Vasantdada Patil and son of Shalini Patil the CM's currently estranged wife. The shed was demolished by 37 labourers and six officers of the Bombay municipal corporation under the supervision of the 'G' north ward officer, G.R. Khairnar, on 7 May. "We had given him a warning in April that we would demolish his unauthorised shed on 4 May and that he should remove it by 3 May," said Khairnar who had to face the fury of Shalini Patil's PA ,Mr Singh, and repeated phone calls from the municipal administrator, J.G. Kanga and the arrival of two sub-inspectors sent by police chief D.S. Soman after a complaint was lodged by Chandrakant Patil, during the two hour demolition. According to Soman, he received a complaint that some labourers who were demolishing the shed were drunk and so the sub inspectors were sent to check.



Chandrakant Patil told SUNDAY that the labourers had broken a steel rack and taken out crates of beer. He said he had handed over to the police 50 bottles of beer that the labourers had consumed. Mr Khairnar dismisses this as an attempt to make a false complaint to harass the labourers. He said, "First, Mr Patil accused them of having taken whiskey. When I pointed out that surely workers could not have drunk whiskey straight from the bottle without collapsing, Mr Patil changed it to beer." Mr Khairnar said he refused to hand over his labourers to the police. Instead, he first asked the police to tell him what they would do if the labourers were found not guilty,

Patil has been running his restaurant, Step-In, on three galas he "purchased" from Rizvi Builders in a housing society called Greenlawn Cooperative Housing Society. The area is 1,000 square feet but the area that he covered with a shed at the entrance of the hotel gave him 340 sq. ft more. He had applied for temporary permission for the monsoon period and had given an undertaking on a Rs five stamp paper that it would be removed after the monsoon, that is on 31 October. However, when he was sent a notice to demolish it in October, Patil refused and instead forefeited the security deposit of Rs 250, the demolition charge deposit of Rs 100 and Rs 250 for allowing the shed to remain during the monsoon period. He thought that by giving Rs 600 rupees, he could get away. But Khairnar persisted. Even though he could have demolished the shed without further notice, he did not want to precipitate the issue since the son of the chief minister was involved. So under Section 351, he sent a notice for demolishing the shed in January, and then a self explanatory letter in March, saying why it had to be demolished and why permission could not be given to let it remain. Finally, after giving Patil a hearing in April, he went ahead. Meanwhile, all these months Patil tried to get the urban development department to give his permission to keep his shed permanently. They did not agree, but he persisted. After the Assembly elections, when his father formed his own government and Rammanohar Tripathi was made the urban development minister, Tripathi considered Patil's case and on 16 April, gave a stay. Patil said, "They gave me a stay and asked the corporation to give me a personal hearing. What was wrong in giving me a hearing along with my architect? What is the harm in giving a personal hearing under the principles of natural justice? They could then deny me the permission. After all, the government didn't tell them what decision to take."

Khairnar retorted, "There is no need for a hearing and the Bombay municipal corporation being an autonomous body, there is no need for the corporation to follow instructions of the minister. "Mr Khairnar added that he did not receive Mr Tripathi's stay order. In fact, it came to his notice only on 9 May. On that day Patil sent a notice to the corporation asking them to reconstruct the shed and the weather frame which was also demolished. He said that the weather frame was put up only after permission was received and so it was demolished illegally. Khairnar, however, says that Patil had illegally welded the tin shed with the weather shed and the shed could not be removed without disturbing the weather frame. He further maintains that they gave Patil 20 minutes to remove the weather frame but he wanted two days. According to Khairnar not only did Patil put up the shed but he also sub-let the space to a coconut vendor and a paanwala.

Patil thinks he will automatically get the permission for the monsoon shed this time. Khairnar, however, says that once a licencee has infringed the conditions attached to the permission for such temporary sheds, it is normally not given again. But Chandrakant Patil is the son of the chief minister and may still manage it somehow.

POLITICS

A Return to the Fold?

Congress(S) chief Sharad Pawar dismisses speculation about his joining the Congress(I)

Speculation about Congress(S) leader Sharad Pawar joining the Congress(I) started after his very pro-Congress culture speech at the Vasant Vyakhyan Mala lectures in Pune. Pawar who was speaking on the situation in the country today ruled out the possibility of a national alternative to the Congress(I) and said that only the Congress culture which is secular and national in outlook could solve the problems of the country. While appreciating Rajiv Gandhi's political outlook Pawar criticised his economic policies as they had nothing for the farmers, the unemployed and the poor who form 70 per cent of the people of this country.

As Pawar later explained to SUNDAY, the opposition parties can never form a national alternative. "For instance, our views on Punjab and Assam are different to those of the BJP. So how can we agree on a solution to those problems. Then again we are all regional parties, let's face it. In this context I said that it was only the Congress culture that could solve the problems of the country. If in Karnataka they have a good government, it is because that gentleman (Ramakrishna Hegde) belonged to that culture. The situation has changed since Indira Gandhi's death. Rajiv Gandhi has brought in a qualitative change. He did not give tickets to Gundu Rao, Antulay and Jagannath Mishra. He has started a dialogue with the opposition parties while Mrs Gandhi had an attitude of confrontation with the opposition."

A few days after Pawar's Pune speech, one of Pawar's senior colleagues, the former Rajya Sabha member Abbasaheb Kulkarni's statement led to more speculation when he justified Pawar's speech. He said that Pawar was right in taking a national perspective towards national issues. He asked why Pawar should have to confine himself to opposition politics which is concerned only with seat and ticket sharing. This ruffled opposition feathers. The chief whip of the Progressive Democratic Front (PDF) in the Assembly, Datta Patil immediately wrote to Sharad Pawar who was holidaying in Kashmir, asking him to explain the "misunderstandings" created by his speech in Pune. Releasing the letter to the press even before it could have reached Pawar, Datta Patil said that as Pawar was the leader of the Progressive Democratic Front, he owed an explanation to the legislators and so "should call a meeting of all the legislators for this purpose." Pawar had earlier told SUNDAY that he was enjoying reading about the controversy, and said that it had no basis. He also clarified that "I have not been invited to join Congress(I) nor have I given any thought to it."

Sharad Pawar

Pawar, however, has for some time been under pressure from his rank and file members to join the Congress(I) This pressure increased particularly after Indira Gandhi's assassination. Several members whom this correspondent had met,many of whom have joined the Congress(I) said that Sharad Pawar's antagonism was to Mrs Gandhi's style of functioning. "Now that she is not there we should go back,' one of them said. Many of them did not want an alliance with the opposition parties, particularly the BJP. Even Sharad Pawar has realised that the alliances proved counter-productive for the Congress(S), especially in the Assembly elections. He said that they could have got more than 54 seats, had they not bartered away seats to the alliance members who lost them.

Arun Mehta, another Pawar lieutenant was definite that Pawar had not met Rajiv Gandhi in connection with his return to the Congress(I) but in the course of Mr Gandhi's meetings with opposition parties. He said, "Our disagreement with the Congress(I) is on two counts, namely, the structure and functioning style of the party and its economic programme." The name of their party, he said, still smacks of individualism. They do not have regular elections so there is no scope for good workers in the party to get any party positions as these are reserved for sycophants. The party's economic policies are industry-oriented and their planning would have to be reoriented with emphasis on the farmers, the unemployed and the poor, Mehta said.

He added that unless these two differences are reconciled, there will be no merger with the Congress(I). When asked if discussions have started on reconciling the differences, Mehta replied with a categorical "no."

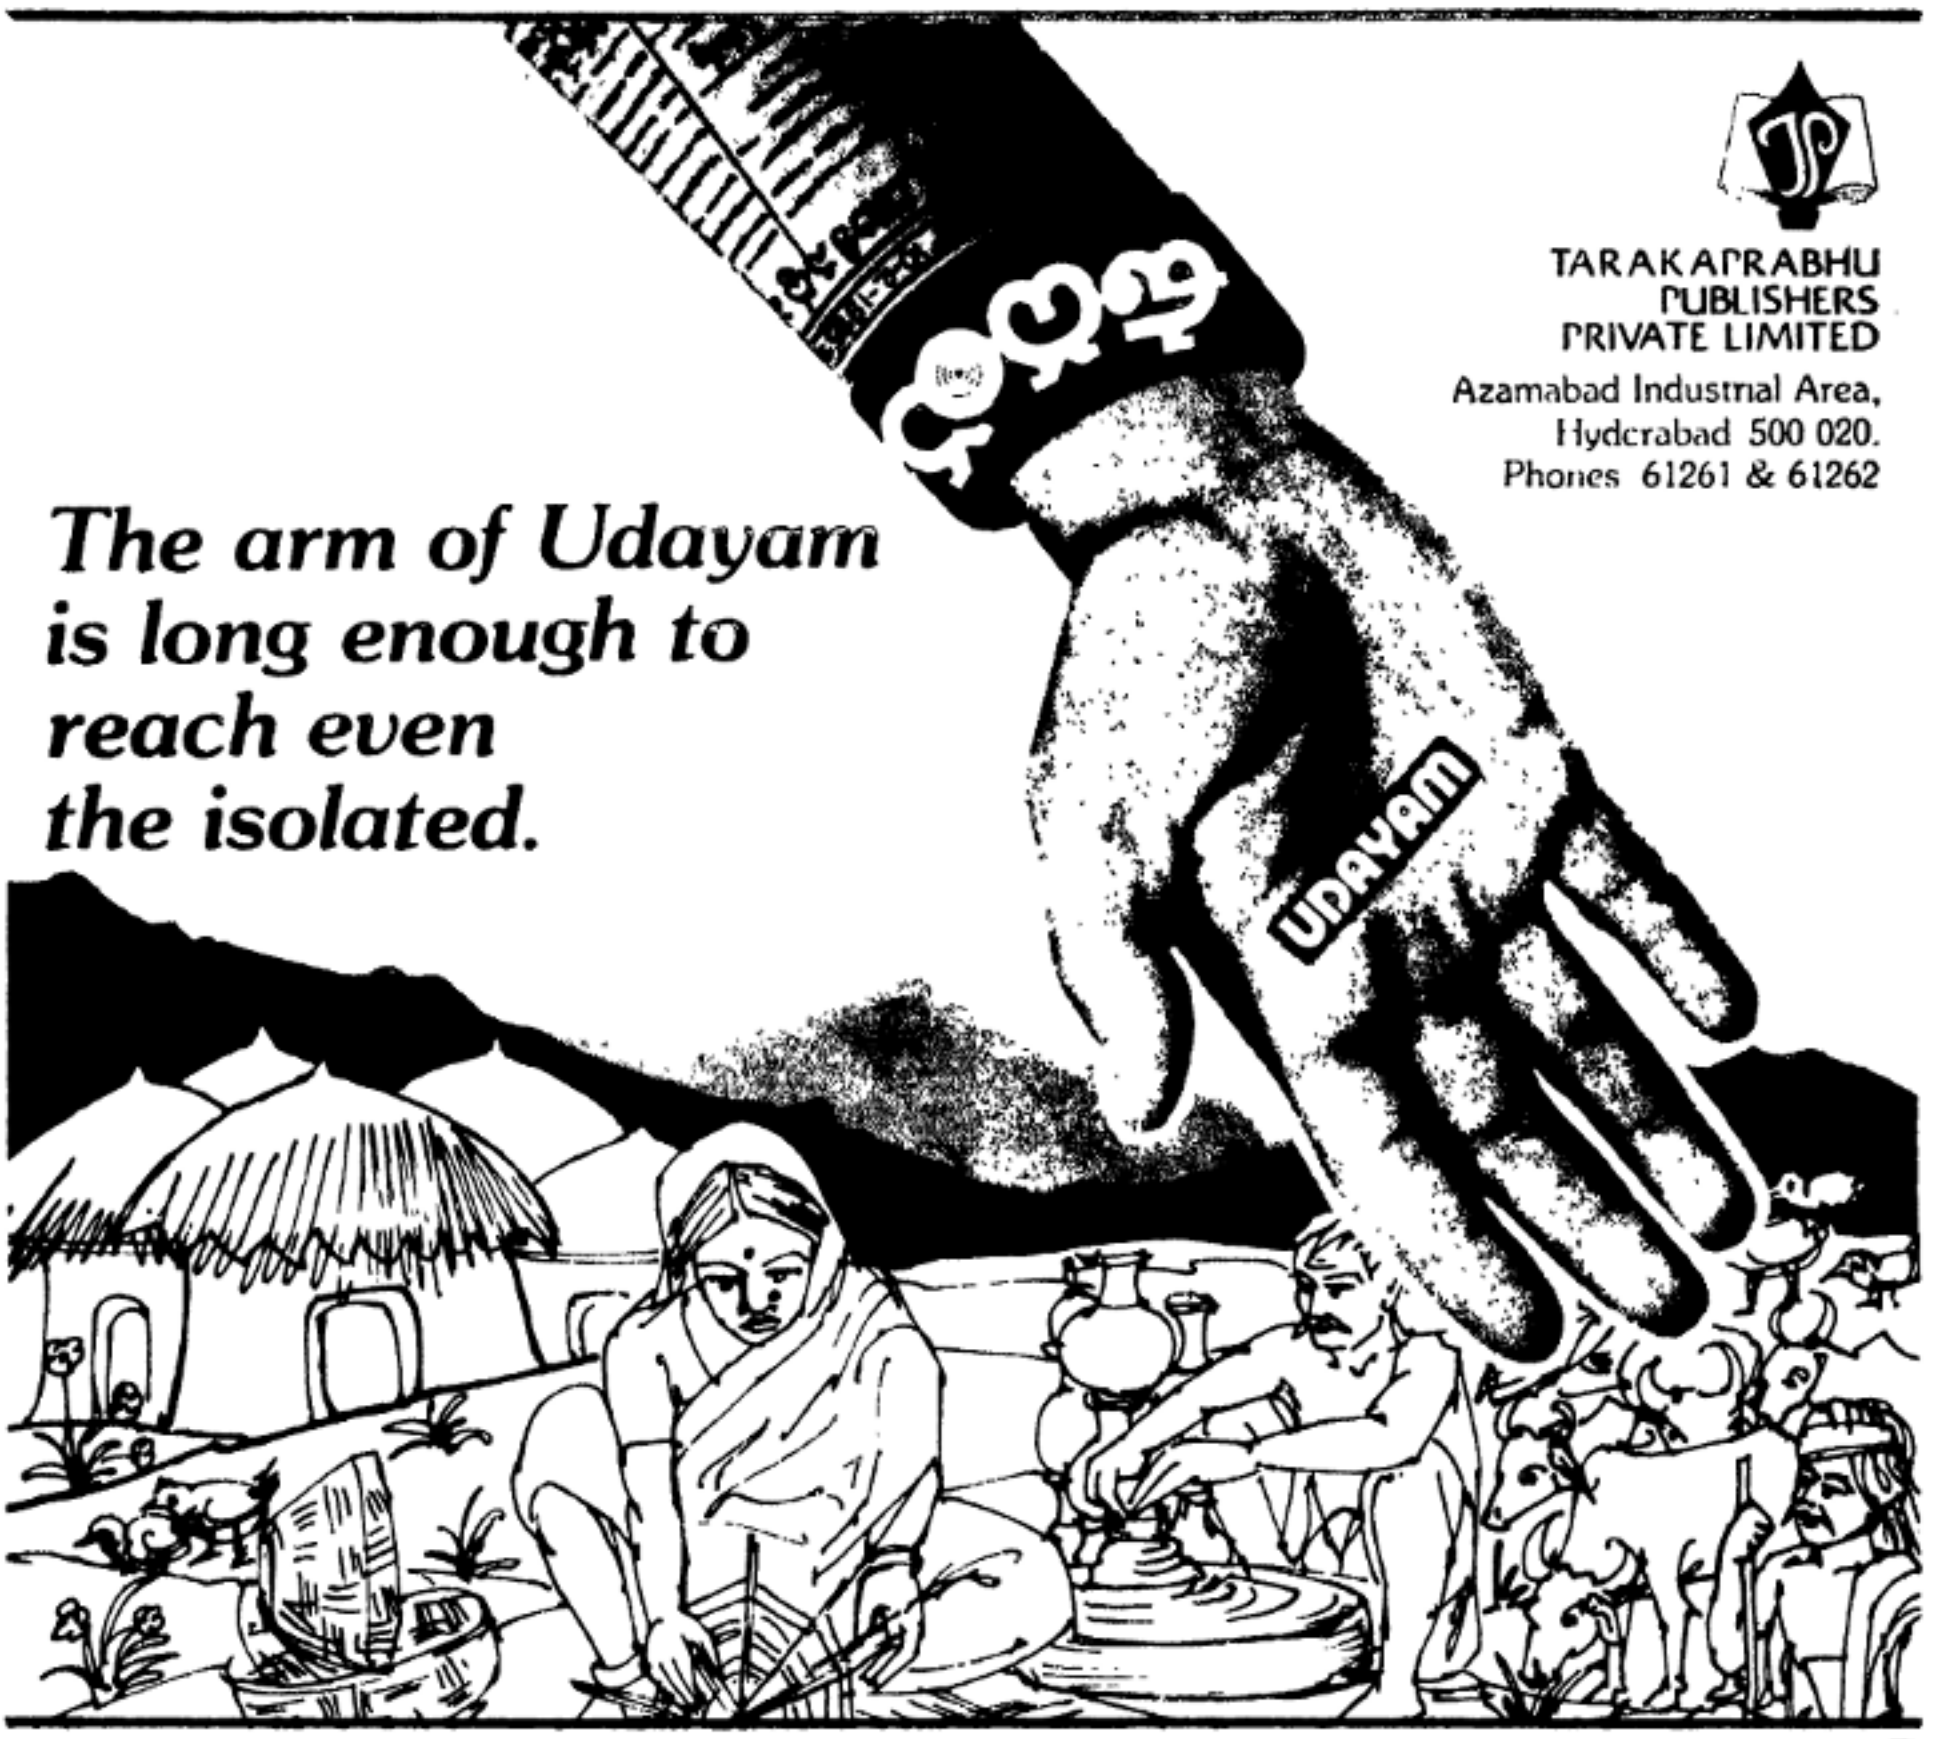
MRS GANDHI'S ASSASSINATION

Bimal Khalsa Files Charges



Policemen who shot Beant Singh are charged with murder

The police guards who shot Beant Singh dead, the accused in the Indira Gandhi murder case, have now been charged with "murder." Beant Singh's widow, Bimal Khalsa, moved an application in the Delhi High Court on 30 April, alleging that her husband had been "murdered" by two Indo-Tibetan Border Police(ITBP) guards: Tarsem Singh Jamwal and Ram Saran. With the filing of this application not only has a new twist been given to the case, but an interesting point has been put forward for adjudication.

The prime accused in the case, constable Satwant Singh, Kehar Singh and Balbir Singh were charged with being party "to a criminal conspiracy to commit an illegal act, to wit, to commit the murder of Smt. Indira Gandhi." The charge-sheet concluded that the other accused assassin, Beant Singh, had died on 31 October and, therefore, criminal charges against him could not be put up. No further details of how the death occurred or how the prime accused, Satwant Singh, was critically wounded were disclosed. The lawyers of the accused, at that time had declared that they intended pursuing the case of Beant Singh's murder

Bimal Khalsa's application was filed in the court of the additional chief metropolitan magistrate, S.L. Khanna charging the two commandos present in the guardroom at the time of the shoot-out with the murder of Beant Singh. The petition was filed under Section 302 of the Indian Penal Code and Section 27 of the Arms Act by Bimal Khalsa and Shamsher Singh, elder brother of Beant Singh, an advocate practising in Chandigarh. The petition has questioned the circumstances under which the late Prime Minister was killed and the subsequent sequence of events once again. The teams investigating the assassination, namely the Anand Ram enquiry team and the Thakkar Commission (both of which have not presented their reports yet) have been delving deep into the events that followed the action of Satwant Singh and Beant Singh. Eyewitness accounts of the incident and the charge-sheet clearly states that both Beant Singh and Satwant Singh threw down their weapons and put up their hands in surrender after they had fired at the Prime Minister.

Bimal Khalsa and Shamsher Singh allege "that it is clear from the events that followed that Beant Singh was murdered in the same transaction in which Mrs Gandhi was murdered." The application also states that the fact that the security guards of the PM were escorted inside the guardroom of the PM's house was corraborated by the statements of the prosecution witnesses including D.K. Bhatt, additional commissioner of police, R.K. Dhawan, personal assistant to the Prime Minister and M.L. Fotedar, the political aide to the Prime Minister, all of whom figure in the list of 144 witnesses in the case.

The application seeks to negate the version given out by the investigating teams that Beant Singh was killed and Satwant Singh wounded after a scuffle ensued between them and the ITPB commandos. The applicants have pointed out that at the time of the shoot-out Beant Singh had already surrendered and he had thrown down his revolver from which he had shot the Prime Minister. They have also demanded that the two commandos, Tarsem Singh Jammal and Ram Saran, be called before the court so that criminal proceedings against them can be initiated. They have also demanded that the records of the investigation of FIR No. 241/84 be called and the circumstances of the shoot-out presented before the court

STOCK MARKETS

The Galloping Bull

Share prices of TISCO continue to shoot up

"Shares are not essential commodities that one would like to peg their price down to a certain level," says the controller of capital issues, D. S. Mehta. But when a scrip shoots up by more than Rs 250 in just two months, there is obviously cause for concern, he admits. This is what happened to the Tata Steel (TISCO) shares following the announcement of the steel price hike on 20 February. Initially, it appeared to be a temporary phase. The growth factor was predominant with anticipated profits of the firm being Rs 150 crores for 1984-85. But after the union budget was presented this year and the price spiral began, TISCO was undoubtedly the market leader but share prices of TELCO, Reliance, ACC, and Premier Automobiles too began to show a rise.

By the end of April, the TISCO scrip had touched an all-time high in Delhi at Rs 650 and in Bombay at Rs 621. The persistent price rise was a result of frenzied buying at the markets, and there seemed to be no stopping the strong bull pressure. It was then that the finance ministry decided to intervene. The worry was not so much the rise in prices but the fear of such an abnormal increase precipitating a sudden crash or a payments crisis. The controller of capital issues rushed to Bombay on 2 May to convene a meeting of the prominent members of the Bombay Stock Exchange. At an earlier meeting, he had appealed to the brokers for an "automatic self-regulatory mechanism," which obviously had not worked. This time, he was wiser.

It was decided at the meeting that the TISCO scrip would be shifted to the cash list. With this changeover, all transactions in the TISCO scrip would have to be in cash thus putting an end to all speculation. The Bombay Exchange gave an immediate notice that after the stipulated three months, the scrip would be transferred to the B list on 2 August. There were murmurs of discontent among the bulls and some people are even known to be lobbying with the Tata management to protest against the discrimination. Finance ministry officials say that the decision to transfer TISCO and no other share was meant as a signal to the rest. According to them, it should not matter to the management which list the share is in since the Tatas, unlike some other business houses, do not trade in their own stock. Besides the curb imposed on the TISCO shares, it was also decided at the meeting that a 25 per cent margin would be imposed on all transactions on 12 particularly volatile shares in the specified group.

The outcome of these decisions was a downward trend in prices. The very next day the TISCO share prices declined by Rs 40 to stand at Rs 570. At Delhi too, the situation was going out of hand. The stock exchange had even imposed a frantic margin of 100 per cent on the purchase of the TISCO scrip for a few days. Although the Delhi market quietened down relatively following the Bombay meeting, it was decided to hold a joint meeting of all the presidents and executive directors of the Bombay, Delhi, Calcutta and Madras stock exchanges

This was convened at the office of the controller of capital issues at the finance ministry on 7 May. It was decided that any action taken on any share scrip by its principal stock exchange would automatically be implemented by the rest of the exchanges where it was listed. Such concerted action, it was felt, was necessary to control the stubborn price spiral. On the same day, Delhi brought into effect a 25 per cent margin on five scrips at its exchange: TISCO, TELCO, Reliance Textiles. Hindustan Lever and Century Spinning.

With the combined effect of the meeting along with the fresh margins, the TISCO price, which suffices as a barometer of the trend, fell from Rs 590 at the last closing to Rs 560 on the very same evening. But the effect was shortlived. Over the last few days, the prices at both Bombay and Delhi are rising again. While in Delhi, TISCO is hovering just below Rs 600, at Bombay, just two days after the Delhi meeting, it closed once again at Rs 604.

There is one section in the stock exchange that believes that no amount of margins of buyers would help matters until these margins are also imposed on the sellers. The present margin on sellers is just three per cent. According to these circles, the sellers are committing far beyond the stock at hand and usurping the money from the "Badla" without having even a tenth of the stock committed at hand. (badla is the part-payment pending delivery.) According to one estimate, while the total transactions at the Bombay Stock Exchange in the TISCO scrip have been to the tune of seven lakh shares, the deliveries have been just 70,000. They form a strong lobby for restrictions on the sellers, or bears, who they feel are fuelling speculation.

According to finance ministry officials, the very members of the stock exchange who are in a position to curb the speculative activity are themselves party to it, thus leaving little scope for self control. "Some objective regulatory system has to be evolved," says Mehta. With the unprecedented growth in the resources being generated at the stock markets, some basic reform has to be conducted, he feels. But the resistance to these measures is stiff. One finance ministry official trying to get a telex installed at a stock exchange for instant communication between different markets was astounded by the opposition from some of the bigger brokers. The perplexed official was later told that the influential brokers did not want to lose the edge he had over the others since he had a personal telex installed at his office.

These initial obstacles have to be overcome if the stock markets have to tackle the growth in the volume of money pouring into them, Mehta stresses. Besides, there has to be close monitoring to check defaulters which is next to non-existent today. The resources generated at the stock market are expected to total Rs 2,000 crores in the financial year 1984-85.

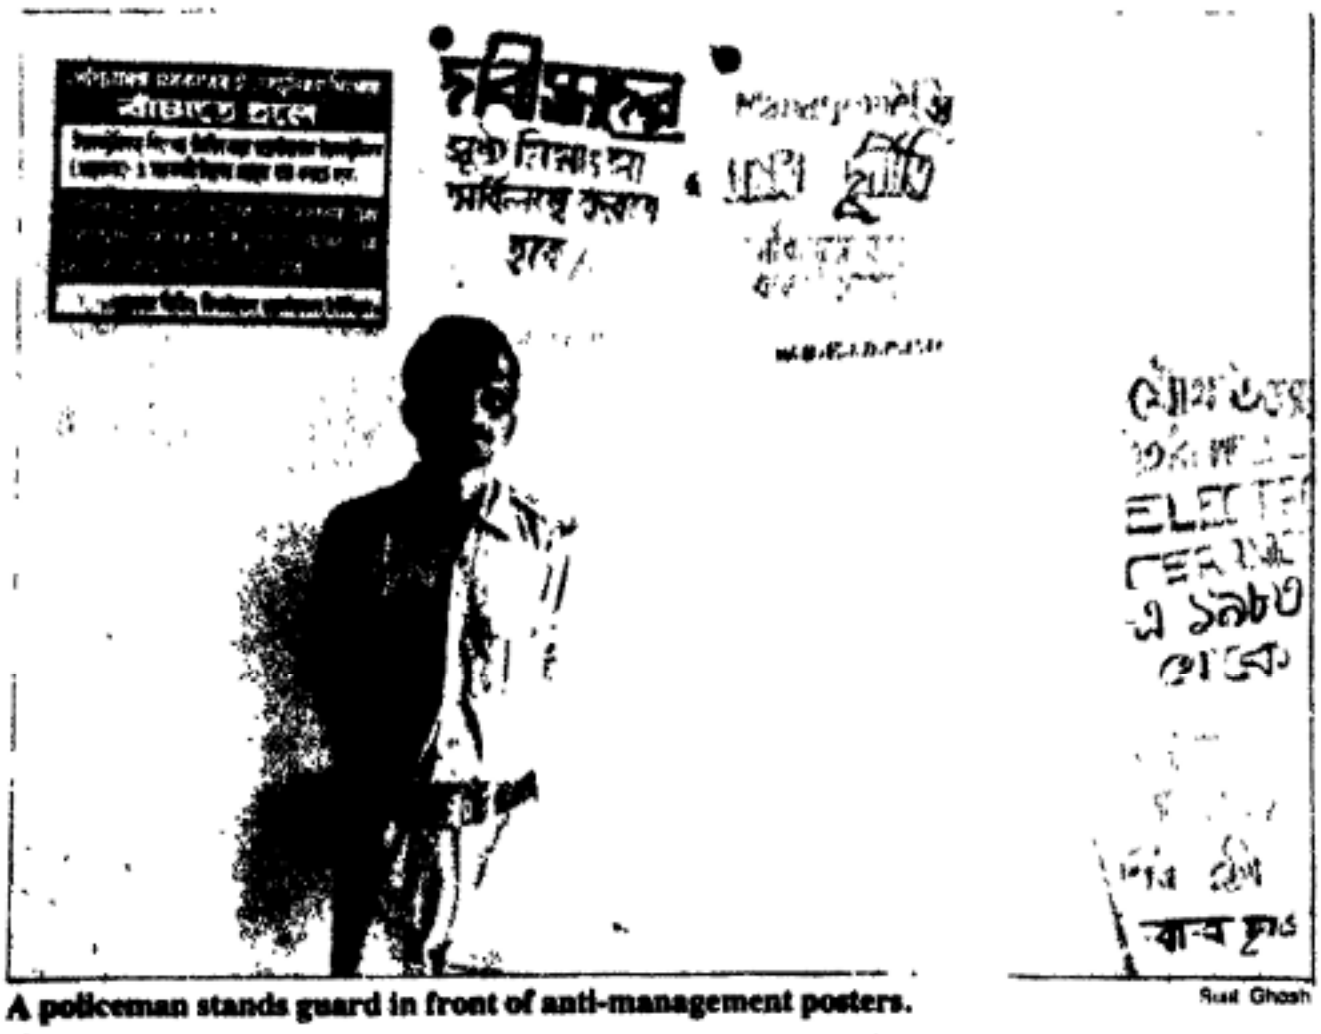
NICCO-WEBEL TIE-UP

Workers at War



The Left Front's new corporate experiment runs aground

It seemed like a pragmatic step or so claimed the West Bengal industries minister Nirmal Bose. Despite ideological contradictions, the decision to offer 26 per cent of the equity of the totally government-owned WEBEL TV manufacturing unit to the National Insulated Cable Corporation (NICCO) of Calcutta and convert it into a joint sector project was necessary "to save Webel from the onslaught of foreign companies in the field of electronics," explained the minister at a recent press conference. The Left Front government as a policy had always supported the expansion of public sector industries in the state. But now, the scope for expansion at the state level was limited because of financial difficulties explained Nirmal Bose defending this novel corporate experiment. Despite such rationalisation the attempt to revive one of its loss-making units—an estimated cumulative loss of Rs 20 lakhs on a capital of Rs 25 lakhs—has been strongly criticised.

Dissident party members and a hurt and angry labour force have described the decision as a sellout, a desertion of socialist values and more forcibly as attempts at privatisation. But the architects of this tie-up, chief minister Jyoti Basu and his industries minister have both reiterated their stands and blessed this unorthdox alliance. Thus, in spite of requests by the Webel TV workforce to withdraw the appointment of Subrata Paul, the NICCO-appointed general manager of the reconstituted company, both ministers have stuck to their guns and given full support to the Webel board. With its promised "dowry" of Rs 8.34 lakhs which NICCO brought along at the time of signing of the memorandum of agreement, the capital base of the reconstituted company has gone up from Rs 25 lakhs to Rs 32 lakhs while Rajive Kaul and Dr Abhijit Sen, chairman and managing director and vice-chairman of NICCO were inducted into the Webel board.

The terms of the tie-up are clear. Of the paid up capital of Rs one crore of the reconstituted company, the West Bengal government will hold 26 per cent of the equity, NICCO 25 per cent and the balance will be offered to the public. The new company plans to increase production from 800 black-and-white TV sets a month to 2,000 sets a month and by 1987 an ambitious target of 8,000 TV sets has been set. There are also plans of foreign collaborations and talks with Sharp of Japan to provide state-of-the-art technology are on. Yet the 90-strong Webel TV workforce are unhappy with NICCO as well as the the new alliance.

Since 8 April although there has been no officially declared strike or cease work, employees have been holding the Webel TV Taratolla headquarters under seige. It was initially led by the then general manager of the company A.K. Mukherjee (who subsequently resigned in early April), but the resistance petered out on 26 April when the management, reluctant to take everything lying down put up notices warning that if indiscipline continued, wage cuts would have to be resorted to. The workers reported back the next day (27 April) but refused to talk or negotiate their grievances with the NICCO representatives. In fact on that day, Subrata Paul, the NICCO-appointed general manager was not allowed to carry out his duties and was forced to quit his chair under threats of physical violence. However, with Nirmal Bose's assertion to the members of the Indian Chamber of Commerce on 20 April that no irresponsible trade unionism should be tolerated, a head-on collision was inevitable. Thus, backed with police protection Subrata Paul entered the premises the next day and suspended four employees on charges of gross indiscipline.

Since then, a curious situation prevails. The factory still under police protection, is technically open: Paul is given access to the managerial chair, the workers report to work but production is at a standstill. The only consistent activity is the lunch time morcha during which some Webel TV employees together with those of contiguous units denounce the government for selling out.

On their part, the workers seem to be divided on the issues that they are fighting for. The six-member CITU team, the only recognised union according to the Webel board, claims "the deal was made secretly and there was no communication regarding the working environment, service conditions, etc." "Nothing has been given to us in writing and unless we see what the new package of services has to offer, how can we agree or disagree" said a CITU spokesman.

However, the 300-strong Webel Employees Federation, an unregistered organisation, which claims the membership of a large number of employees of the other Webel units is fighting on ideological grounds. There is no justification for converting a 100 per cent government-owned unit into a joint sector venture, they claim. The arguments of financial and managerial paucity is not one that the federation is willing to buy.

The management predictably, has a different story to tell. Repeated attempts to get the warring factions to negotiate and air their grievances have failed, claims the Webel TV board. According to Subrata Paul, a meeting convened at the Lower Rawdon Street headquarters of WBEIDC at the behest of the striking employees with the Webel TV chairman to explain the consequences of the restructured board dissolved into a slanging match when instead of the four representatives of the employees, ten turned up and the meeting had to be abandoned. On his part Subrata Paul on behalf of the new management has offered the olive branch. "Except for non-issues, we are prepared to discuss any grievances and I am certain any anomalies that exist due to service conditions can be worked out amicably once we sit together."

However, such an assertion seems to have done very little to quell the fears of the Webel TV workforce. As things stand today, a curious impasse prevails with the warring factions—the Webel TV workforce and the management surveying each other across the battlelines with the police on hand to intervene should things hot up. But unless a sense of mutual trust and confidence is built up between the management and workers and the workforce is convinced of the efficacy of the joint sector agreement, NICCO's dream to manufacture 8,000 TV sets by 1987 could well be a pipe dream. Worse still, the continued cold war and lack of production could precipitate drastic measures—and embarrass the government. Should a lockout be declared, it would not only mean a large number of red faces amongst the government ranks but also the sounding of the death knell for any industrial innovation in the state.

Odd Man Out

Mitterrand changes his stance

Throughout his career as President of France, General de Gaulle had earned the reputation as the odd man of the Western Alliance, at least in the eyes of the Anglo-Americans (or the "Anglo-Saxons," as De Gaulle himself called them in derision). Since he became the French President three years ago, Francois Mitterrand has built for himself the reputation of a conciliatory partner, certainly more pliable than his predecessor, Giscard d'Estaing, a Gaullist; so much so that most Europeans and especially the left-wingers in France and Britain had almost come to the conclusion that Mitterrand had become a tool in the hands of the Americans.

But in the middle of May, the French President's image underwent a radical transformation due to his stand at the Bonn summit of the seven industriaiised countries. Mitterrand refused to discuss any reforms in the trade policies of the seven countries or of the EEC or of GATT (General Agreement on Tariff and Trade) unless the Americans discussed reforms in the international monetary system. He made it clear that France would not approve or participate in the Reagan administration's "Strategic Defence Initiative" (Star Wars Research programme) in its monopolistic form because he (Mitterrand) himself was sceptical about America's willingness to share knowledge about the Star Wars research programme with her allies. Mitterrand also expressed concern that the US research programme into space-based defence could jeopardise the concept of nuclear deterrence.

Mitterrand's detractors, however, criticised this on the grounds that his independent line both on trade and defence is primarily for home consumption, and a vote-catching gesture keeping in mind the legislative elections in France early next year. They also point out that Mitterrand, was pandering to the farmers' lobby when he pointed out that the liberalisation of trade, as wanted by the Anglo-Americans would threaten the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) of the EEC.

It is too early to evaluate the long-term effects (on domestic politics in France) of Mitterrand's "intransigence" on trade and defence.

However, commentators in England have reacted adversely to the newly acquired independent line of France's socialist President There is no doubt that it produced enough impact on the heads of government and delegations who attended the Bonn summit to prompt Margaret Thatcher of Britain to launch an all-out attack on Japan for its protectionist policies, to which the British press gave so much publicity that it obscured the full impact of Mitterrand's views.

Nevertheless, as the summiteers left for their home countries, it looked as though other countries will not forget easily two points made by Mitterrand. First, the trade and financial problems of the Western countries need a more fundamental approach than the superficial remedy of another ("Reagan") round of GATT negotiations. Secondly, a more fundamental remedy is a reform of the international monetary system, a point which was made by Indira Gandhi during her last visit to Washington

Meanwhile, the uneasiness over America's Star Wars programme is spreading not only in the Eastern (Soviet) Bloc but among European countries, because they cannot trust the Americans at a time when both France and Germany are striving to build up their own defences. It is important to note that Mitterrand made his views on defence known only in a private meeting with President Reagan and not in a plenary or closed session of the economic summit because defence was not an item on the agenda of the summit.

Predictably, a majority of the Anglo-American papers have tried to play down this aspect of the Bonn talks. But it is evident that the misgivings voiced by Mitterrand over America's Star Wars programme would attract attention among the nonaligned nations and the countries of the Eastern Bloc. Thus, although the Bonn summit has been ridiculed in Britain and America, perhaps the net gain of it was the emergence of Mitterrand as the "Doubting Thomas of Europe."

WEST GERMANY

Furore Over Past Horrors

Nation-wide controversy over Reagan's visit to Bitburg

While the rest of Europe celebrated their victorious roles in World War II, West Germans remained preoccupied, being at the same time their own prosecutor and defender. 8 May, the 40th anniversary of VE (Victory in Europe) day found West Germans acknowledging their burden of guilt for the horrors and barbarities of the war. The last days have, however, also seen a growing assertion, symbolised by Chancellor Kohl's frequent utterance "I was 15 in 1945," that two-thirds of the West Germans are post-war stock.

There was no cringing about the German role during the war and the President of the Federal Republic, Richard von Weizsaecker told his countrymen during his special speech in the Bundestag (legislature) to commemorate the day that "every German could have seen what Jewish fellow citizens had to suffer from cold indifference to hidden intolerance to open hate. Those who had their eyes and ears open, those who wanted to inform themselves could not have failed to see that the deportation trains were rolling." He also added, "There is no guilt or innocence of a whole people because guilt like innocence is not collective."

For most Germans, 8 May is something between the stunde der kapitulation (hour of capitulation) and Die stunde der liberation (hour of liberation) Hence, the agonising soul searching and the awkward balancing attempts at solidarity with the Western Alliance and pride in the new democratic country which has risen from the rubble of Fascism. That the shadows of the past still exist was apparent over the furore surrounding President Reagan's visit to a German military cemetery in Bitburg during the American President's state visit to West Germany last week. Critics condemned the visit since the cemetery contained among others 47 graves of SS soldiers (this elite force was responsible for running the concentration camps) but Reagan went ahead with the visit, by saying "They were victims of Nazism too." Mr Reagan said that many SS soldiers were young boys forcibly drafted by the Nazis. "Most middleaged Germans rather liked this Presidential explanation and opinion polls have shown that 72 per cent of West Germans were happy that President Reagan did go to Bitburg. The mayor of Bitburg, Herr Theo Hallet spoke for many when he said Reagan was going to honour the unknown soldier and if there are any guilty buried there, they have already been punished by the ultimate punishment: death. The government spokesman, Herr Boenisch was even more blunt and said he "found it grotesque that people were thinking of war crimes and not about things like American-German friendship."

On the other end of the political spectrum, the ecologically conscious and anti-nuclear party, the Greens refused to attend the special address by Weizsaecker, saying it was too non-commital. They travelled instead to Auschwitz, in Poland, to portray a younger generation of Germans who were ready to remember Hitler's infamous holocaust and to publicly demonstrate that the new German generation is deeply ashamed of what happened and to acknowledge that concentration camps will always be on Germany's conscience. The major opposition party, the Social Democrats organised a huge peace march in West Berlin, their leaders having publicly condemned Reagan's visit to the German military cemetery.

Remembrance services took place throughout the country where Germans perhaps asked themselves quietly about their involvement. There is little doubt however that most Germans are beginning to resent the publicity surrounding a nation's coming to terms with its darkest hour. A respected German daily, Die Suddeutsche Zeitung wrote: "The shame of having waged and carried on the most horrible of all wars, fighting for an unjust cause and for criminal goals is something the Germans have to deal with .... leave us Germans alone with it."

The West Germans, unlike the East

Germans who have never acknowledged their part in the atrocities of the Nazi dictatorship, have apart from acknowledging the historical and moral responsibility made financial payments to the victims of the holocaust. It is however, not the financial burden of the war which reminds Germans of their historical legacy but the geopolitical reality of their old country being divided into two with a wall cutting the old capital into East and West Berlin. Another unpleasant reminder is the fate of the refugees who had once lived in the eastern territories. Over 14 million of them fled to the west as the Red Army swept through East Prussia. Many of them live in West Germany, still hoping to go home one day. Chancellor Kohl has promised to speak to an association of such refugees in June, something which is bound to stir things up once again.

Kohl's attempts to focus attention on West Germany's present and loyal membership of the Western Alliance has the official backing of the three western victorious nations. Hence Margaret Thatcher's unwillingness to have any form of victory celebrations in Great Britain and then a compromise commemoration service in Westminster Abbey. This is why Ronald Reagan has been ready to prove his spirit of reconciliation stretching to the Bitberg cemetery despite pressure from home; and hence the famous handholding ceremony in Verdun with President Mitterand last year. All of them are gestures which West Germans have not failed to notice or be heartened by. Summit observers at Bonn noticed that Chancellor Kohl seemed particularly intent at pleasing the US President. It was a concerted though clumsy attempt at not letting the new, democratic West Germany be crippled by the sins of the old Reich. But it still left many of the younger generation Germans saying "I don't think it should ever be forgotten (the past) but I wonder if I should feel guilty or not?"

SRI LANKA

A Call for Military Intervention

TESO wants India to liberate the Tamils

Two schools of thought have emerged in India regarding the plight of the Sri Lankan Tamils. One group feels that India should strive for a negotiated settlement between President Jayewardene and the Tamils. The other is of the opinion that India should intervene militarily in Sri Lanka to "liberate" the Tamils. The latter school of thought has now crystallised into a full-fledged organisation called the Tamil Eelam Supporters' Organisation (TESO). Spearheaded by the DMK, it has drawn support from many local political parties like the Tamil Nadu Kamaraj Congress (TKNC) headed by P. Nedumaran, the Namathu Kazhagam headed by S.D. Somasundaram, the Dravida Kazhagam headed by K. Veeramani and a host of private citizens and industrialists.

One of the fundamental beliefs of TESO is that Eelam (a separate state) is the only solution and too much precious time has been wasted on talks. The need of the hour is an armed intervention by India along the lines of Bangladesh. "If India could do it then, she can do it now, provided of course there is the political will to do it."

As TESO is still in the formative stages, the promoters are not sure of its functions and objectives and the final shape of things will probably depend on the response it musters. The organisers, however, are firm on a few issues. The primary purpose would be to mobilise support from Eelam on an international scale and dispel the misconceptions about Eelam. TESO would also undertake to establish, among other things, that it is not a secessionist, separatist struggle but an oppressed people's fight for liberation. Propaganda would be undertaken on a global scale so that the world is given a true picture of Tamils being victims of genocide. TESO is also committed to providing moral and financial support to the 'Tamil patriots' who are engaged in their "war of liberation."

One reason why Rajiv Gandhi is not as strong as Mrs Gandhi about pursuing a solution to the Lanka problem is because Punjab is clearly the PM's priority. The centre has allowed the Lanka problem to 'drift' and the kind of urgency Mrs Gandhi had shown in her efforts to find a political settlement for the Tamil problem seems to be missing. Apart from domestic priorities, there is a feeling that Mr Gandhi is disinclined to make an issue of the Tamil problem because of his pro-West stance. In an interview with SUNDAY, Nedumaran admitted that he sensed a distinct dilution in Mr Gandhi's stand vis-a-vis the Tamil problem. Moreover, he himself was new to the problem and that too was creating several hurdles. Nedumaran pointed out that Romesh Bhandari was a poor emissary compared to Mrs Gandhi's special envoy G. Parthasarathy who had a profound knowledge of the situation and a historical perspective of the Tamil problem. Prior to his missions to Colombo, he always made it a point to stop at Madras, to hold discussions with Tamil leaders like Amirthalingam, M.G. Ramachandran and M Karunanidhi. But Bhandari did not consult a single Tamil leader before his departure. Nedumaran believes that the cause of the Sri Lanka Tamils received a setback in the "sidelining" of "GP" (as G Parthasarathy is known). According to Nedumaran, the impact of the loss of Mrs Gandhi's "triumvirate" is already being felt. During her time,

S.D. Somasundaram

Parthasarathy, P.C. Alexander, her principal secretary and external affairs minister P V. Narasimha Rao were all deeply involved with Sri Lanka. All three had a natural sympathy and understanding of the problem, he said.

TESO has dismissed the advisory committee on the Tamil problem appointed by Rajiv Gandhi as an 'eyewash.' They point out that the committee is not powerful enough because it comprises junior ministers and officers, who have neither authority nor clout. Moreover, most of the committee members are new to the problem. Nedumaran could not help comparing it to the powerful cabinet committee appointed to look into the Punjab problem. He pointed out that during the Andhra agitation. Nehru had appointed a powerful committee that comprised himself and Sardar Patel apart from other prominent personalities. TESO also resents the fact that Mr Gandhi chooses to be eloquent about Namibia while he maintains a diplomatic silence on issues that are far closer to home.

SUNDAY learns from reliable sources that the DMK and the TNKC had planned to hold an opposition conclave on the Tamil problem. They wanted to keep the AIADMK and Congress(I) out because they were "insincere." All major political parties in the opposition would have been invited for the conclave which was to have been held in Madras. The plans, however, fizzled out because the local units of the CPI and CPI(M) (who are members of the DMK-led opposition front in Tamil Nadu) firmly opposed the concept of Eelam because it would mean the division of Sri Lanka.

The Indian government is also unlikely to encourage TESO as the only factor behind TESO is Tamil chauvinism. It was revealing that the DMK MLA of the Pondicherry Assembly D. Ramachandran (who was the former CM) while sponsoring a resolution on Eelam said that as a "true Tamil," chief minister Farooq should impress upon the union government to intervene effectively to protect the suffering Tamils. This is a dangerous parochial attitude, for the issue at stake in Sri Lanka is not Tamil chauvinism but human rights. One is sympathetic to the Lanka Tamils not because of communal affiliations but because of the violations of human rights. Raising the issue of Tamil chauvinism is self-defeating because by the very same argument Mr Gandhi need not do anything because he is not a Tamil.

Mr Karunanidhi's recent statement that the Prime Minister's indifference to the Tamils would drive the Tamils in India to demand secession is a dangerous one. In fact, one of the main reasons why the union government was firm on a political settlement within the framework of a united Sri Lanka was that talks of Eelam would revive the forgotten demand of secession this side of the Palk Straits However, at present, the saving factor is that the people of Tamil Nadu no longer want a separate state for themselves.

Provided it is able to steer clear of chauvinism, the TESO is a healthy development because only a meaningful, effective and dynamic democracy can accommodate a wide range of views. In its own way, the TESO (representing the Indian hardliners) can be useful to the Indian government Just as President Jayewardene blames the hardliners in his cabinet and outside whenever convenient, Mr Gandhi can also demand an early resolution to the problem to keep his 'hardliners" at bay.

The overwhelming majority of Indian opinion is in favour of a political settlement which would give a measure of regional autonomy for the Sri Lanka Tamils. Everyone concedes that India has a role to play in resolving the problem.The major political parties including the Congress(I), DMK, AIADMK, CPI, CPI(M), the Janata Party and the recently formed TESO, concur on seven points. They are: India should persuade President Jayewardene to withdraw the army from the Tamil areas and hand over the administration to the civilian authorities in the north and east as part of the efforts towards normalisation and hold meetings of the non-aligned countries to discuss this issue According to some hardliners, Sri Lanka should be threatened with expulsion from the non-aligned movement if it does not show an inclination to settle the problem soon and amicably. Other points are: a committee of Indian MPs should go to Sri Lanka to hold discussions with the Sri Lankan parliamentarians; and that India must internationalise the issue on two counts—the problem of Sri Lankan refugees (estimated to be a lakh in India) and the violations of human rights. These aspects of the problem have to be raised by India in various international forums, the United Nations and also with the super powers. India should initiate an economic blockade of Sri Lanka if the latter continues to be unresponsive to a negotiated settlement. Finally, the Tamil rebels should be accorded the recognition given to SWAPO and the PLO. Perhaps, the advisory committee appointed by Mr Gandhi could focus upon this seven-point charter if it wishes to disprove the theory that "the best way to shelve a problem is to appoint a committee."

Image-maker

There is nothing cosmetic about the grand Image India award instituted by the Indian Institute of Marketing Management, despite the choice of the recipient for 1985, the graceful Shahnaz Husain. A woman of extraordinary drive, she was recently presented the accolade by the union minister of state for external affairs, Mr Khurshed Alam Khan, for her contribution to the improvement of India's image in the world of cosmetics, by popularising herbal beauty aids. Among the luminaries at the ceremony were Chief Justice Y.V. Chandrachud, and union minister for health and family welfare Ms Mohsina Kidwai, who presided. All the speakers showered praise on Ms Husain for her work.

An Officer and a Politician

Praveen Davar

Capt Praveen Davar, one of the new office-bearers of the Indian Youth Congress appointed by the IYC president Anand Sharma, has come a long way: he was the former aide de camp to Prabhudas Patwari when the latter was Governor of Tamil Nadu during the Janata days. Born into a family of politicians, the young army officer simply could not resist the temptation of joining politics. As the Governor's ADC, he was seen driving to Congress leaders' homes in the Janata days whenever his official duties brought him to the capital with the Governor. When the Congress(I) finally came to power in 1980, Patwari complained against Davar to the defence ministry and the controversy saw him out of the army. Till recently, the bespectacled Youth Congressman was a close confidant of Arun Nehru. In the Anand Sharma team, he has been entrusted with the foreign relations and publications departments of the IYC.

Eyes on Phoolan

At any wedding, the cynosure of attention is usually the bride. But the wedding of Bhoori Ram and policeman Ram Ashray was different. All eyes were fixed on the bride's elder sister, none other than one-time queen of the Chambal, Phoolan Devi. The former woman-dacoit, who has been undergoing detention in the Gwalior Central Jail ever since her surrender in 1983, was let out on parole and escorted under heavy guard to the wedding. Naturally, it was a strange wedding party that consisted mainly of armed guards deployed to protect Phoolan—and prevent her from escaping. Over 400 uniformed and plainclothes guards were positioned around the pandal, on treetops and terraces of surrounding structures.

It was the first time that Phoolan had stepped out of prison since her sensational surrender in March 1983. The day of Phoolan's brief sojourn with the world outside, however, ended disappointingly for her: for months she and her paramour Man Singh were planning to get married along with Phoolan's sister, according to Hindu rites. But the jail authorities did not grant Man Singh parole, lest the two attempt to escape. Man Singh's application for parole was rejected at the eleventh hour and Phoolan's period of freedom reduced from 24 hours to eight hours. According to reports, she spent most of the time during her journey to and from the wedding flinging abuses at all the policemen around her—save her new brother-in-law.

Robots for Surgery

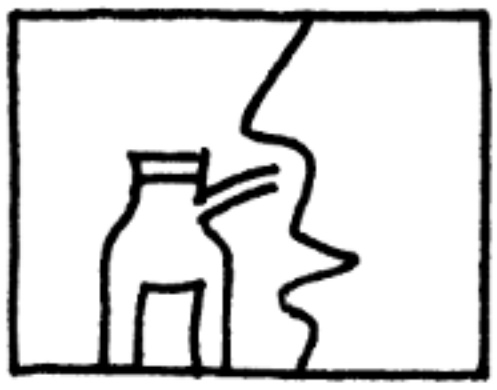
It could be called the first application of robotics in human surgery. In an operation performed in California, a robot arm of the size of a kitchen mixer, described as safer and more accurate than a surgeon's hand, has helped doctors remove a tumour from a 52-year-old man. Dr Yik San Kwoh, who developed the computer programme that makes the arm work, said the machine would never replace a surgeon but was a major improvement in the way brain tumours are located and removed.

The arm holds a probe that guides the surgeon through a hole drilled in the patient's skull and down a narrow tube to the tumour. The patient's head is held in place by a frame that contains the coordinates of the tumour The robot is accurate to within 1/2,000 of an inch.

Slow but Sure

People who stammer should first learn to speak slowly; only then can they speak fluently No one is certain why this technique works but it seems that it compensates for the difficulty that stammerers have in coordinating their thinking, breathing and using their vocal cords. Most normal speech is controlled by the left side of brain; stammerers according to one theory, suffer from interference from the right-hand side

A Remarkable Feat

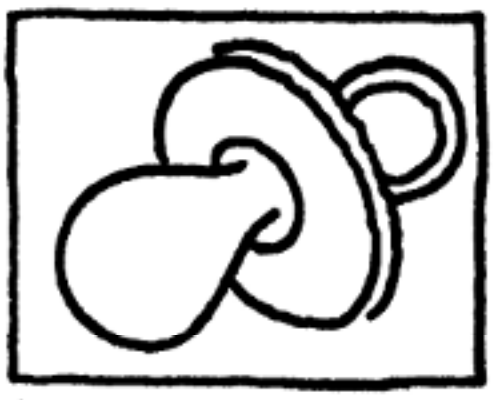


Scientists at the university of California, San Francisco, have redesigned an enzyme to alter its function, which could eventually benefit the chemical and food industries as well as medicine. According to Prof. Robert Fletterick, chairman of biochemistry and biophysics, the feat "represented" one of the first steps in custom-designing enzymes to do highly specific tasks with high efficiency.

No Between-meal Snacks, Please

Children, if you don't want to have tooth decay, just keep away from between-meal snacks and eat only at mealtimes. According to Dr Martin Curzon, head of Child Dental Health at Leeds university, England, all foods can potentially cause tooth decay in susceptible individuals. Many foods, which would be a natural alternative to sweet snacks—cakes, french fries, biscuits, bananas and raisins—were likely to cause tooth decay. That is what was discovered in animal tests. Sugar may not be the only culprit. Although regular brushing is important, Dr Curzon warns against sticky foods which are high in refined carbohydrate.

Insulin Through the Nose

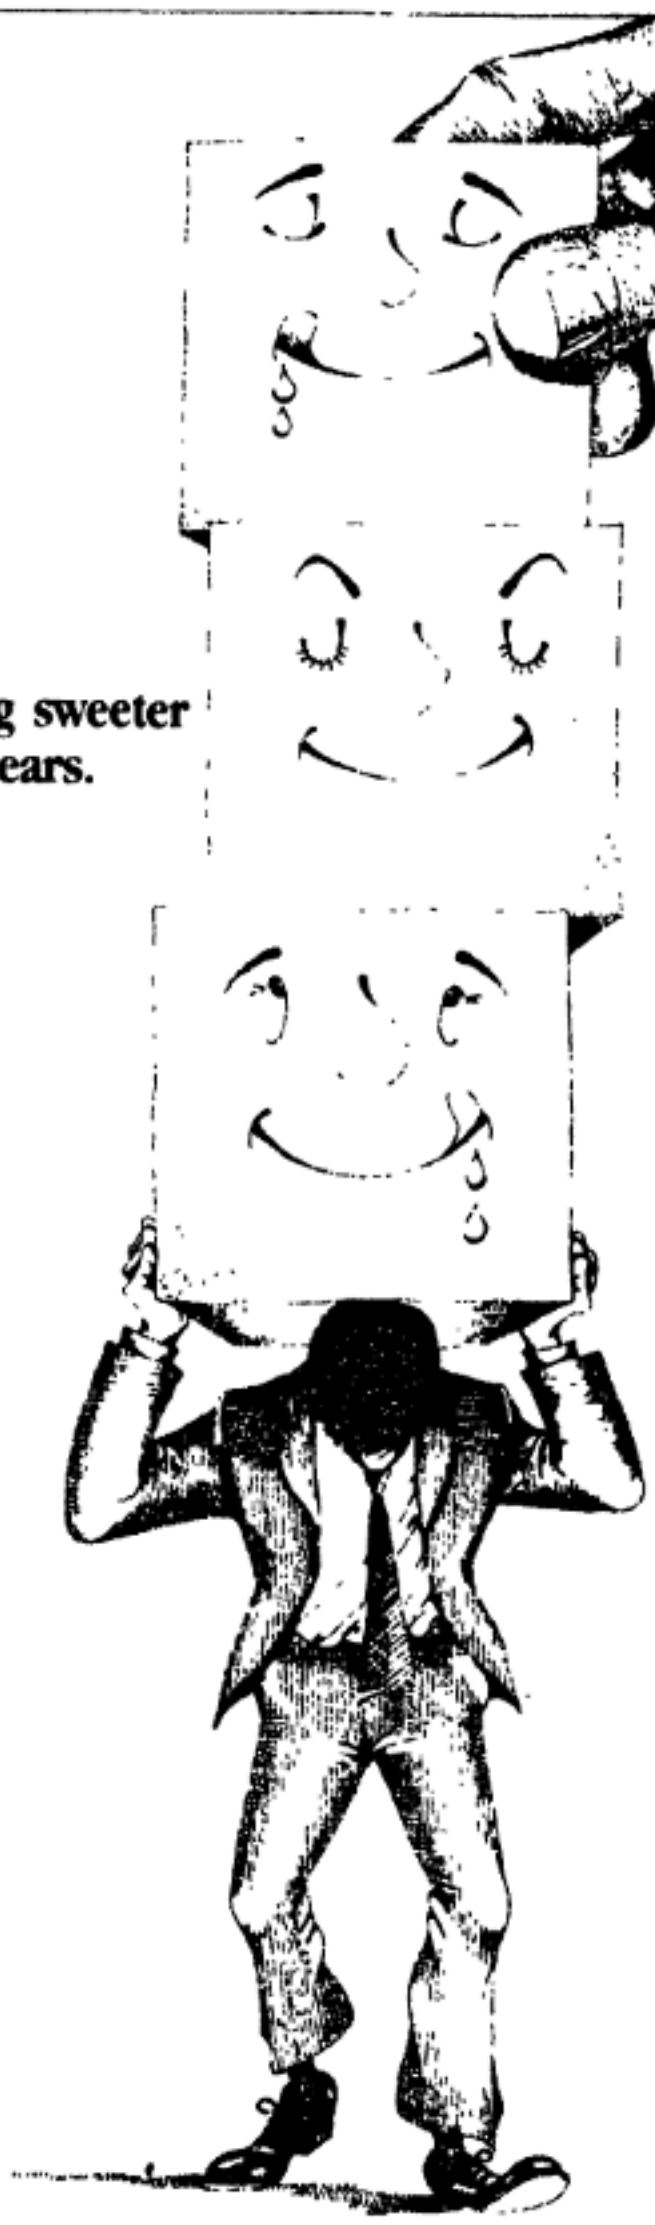


A new method of administering insulin—a nose spray used before meals—may largely eliminate the need for insulin injections in severe diabetics, according to a study conducted by a team of researchers at Boston, USA. In their experiment, eight people used the spray at home for three months. One of the researchers, Dr Renate Kimmerle, said that "this study shows that it can be tolerated, and you achieve the same amount of glycerine (blood sugar) control as the patient can achieve with injections." The key to the new technique is an aerosol pump that sprays insulin mixed with detergent into the nose. The detergent helps the insulin penetrate the membranes in the nose. The defect of this technique was that it caused an irritation in the nose in some patients; diabetics would still need the injection a day to provide insulin while they sleep. Insulin cannot be swallowed because it is destroyed by enzymes in the digestive system.

Hope for Arthritics

A new ray of hope now emerges for arthritis patients. Researchers at the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology (MIST) in north-west England believe they have made a major advance in the "golden shot" treatment of this crippling disease.

Gold-based compounds injected into the blood stream have been used by doctors for several decades to relieve severe inflammation in affected joints. But until now the precise mode of action of the "golden shot" has never been known. The "golden shot" injection takes the form of a colourless liquid with a gold base. Some doctors have been reluctant to use it too frequently because of the unknown action and the occasional side-effects of dermatitis and vomiting. The researchers have now devised a measurement technique which for the first time makes it possible to follow the course of the injection, to study the changes, if any, it undergoes in the blood and to see how it works.



Problematic Dummies

A dummy or a rubber teat may stop a child from crying but it may be problematic: it could be the source of a troublesome fungal infection. Babies with oral thrush (a disease affecting the mouth and throat) have a "white mouth" caused by the growth of a yeast called Candida albicans. This is usually a minor infection but can get severe enough to affect a baby's ability to feed. Fifty per cent of the dummies can carry the infection and children who suck a dummy are much more likely to suffer from it. In an ideal world, says a doctor, babies shouldn't have dummies at all.

Sugar has been getting sweeter over the years.

And cheaper.

If sugar prices had kept pace with inflation, sugar would cost over Rs. 10 a kilo today.

Guess who's behind this sweet state of affairs?

The facts, just the facts

In the last decade, prices in general have shot up 142%. And in the case of sugar? Only 77%.

In effect, sugar has been getting cheaper over the years. One thing accounts for this seemingly sweet state of affairs.

A crushing annual subsidy of Rs. 300 crores. By the sugar industry.

The Govt. picks up 65% of the sugar in India, at prices well below the cost of production. This is sold through ration shops. Here, prices are kept artificially low because the sugar industry subsidises them. To the tune of Rs. 300 crores.

The industry is expected to make up these losses by selling 35% of its produce in the open market. In practice, these losses seldom get made up.

The Govt. controls prices in the open market also, simply by dictating how much sugar should be dumped into it, and when.

One way road to disaster.

Of the 339 sugar mills in India, 166 are in the cooperative sector, 103 in the joint stock sector, and 70 in the public sector.

The outlook for all of them is bleak.

Losses in the last three years—suffered by mills in all sectors and all regions—are upwards of Rs. 800 crores. To finance these losses, the industry has had to borrow sizeable sums from the banks and State Govts. This is having a crippling effect on its finances. Consequently, payments to sugarcane growers are regularly getting delayed. A cash crop has become a credit one. Cane growers are suffering for no fault of theirs, and are naturally growing less and less sugarcane. Production of sugar has plummeted from a peak of 8.4 million tonnes in 1982-83, to 5.9 million tonnes today. India, which once exported Rs. 800 crores of sugar (1975,76), has now spent Rs. 200 crores (1984,85) of precious foreign exchange on imports.

This is the state of an industry which, by any international parameters, is productive and efficient! An industry which is the second largest in the country.

Is this in the interest of India?

For those born between 15 April and 14 May:

Your desire to excel in life makes you ambitious by nature. At times you do not hesitate to resort to unfair means to reach the top You are also proud and you tend to neglect the feelings of others. Most of you are also endowed with a rare aesthetic sense. You may choose the creative arts as your profession. Women born during this period are usually very fair and they make good housewives.

The way sugar prices fluctuate, you'd think somebody manipulates them.

Who could it be?
The sugar barons?
The sugarcane growers?
The wholesalers?
Or the retailers?
Perhaps it is something altogether different

It is a fact that sugar prices in India have simply not kept pace with inflation

It is also a fact that sugar prices in the open market fluctuate like nobody's business, something the sugar industry is totally against

One thing accounts for this oscillating behaviour

A correct policy, but ...

It is this policy that makes the sugar industry subsidise controlled prices — to the tune of Rs 500 crores

As a result of the wrong implementation of this policy the Govt has dumped excessive sugar into the open market This has further increased the losses incurred by the sugar industry

For instance this year, the industry has been forced to release 75% of its open market quota, in the first six months, at artificially low prices Naturally shortages loom on the horizon And prices are bound to shoot up

The role of imports

The Govt is planning to import sugar because of expected shortages Fair enough

But what's more crucial is how this sugar is brought to the end consumer

If it is through State agencies a repeat of 1980-81 can be expected Then shortages persisted, despite imports Prices shot up to Rs 15 a kilo Black marketeers flourished

If it is channeled through ration shops, it will serve the purpose That in fact, is what the Govt has been doing for the past two years It works

Apart from correctly utilising imports, the very state of the industry needs to be looked into

One way road to disaster.

Of the 349 sugar mills in India, 166 are in the cooperative sector, 105 in the joint stock sector and 70 in the public sector

The outlook for all of them is bleak

Losses in the last three years—suffered by mills in all sectors and all regions—are upwards of Rs 800 crores To finance these losses, the industry has had to borrow sizeable sums from the banks and State Govts This is having a crippling effect on its finances. Consequently, payments to sugarcane growers are regularly getting delayed A cash crop has become a credit one Cane growers are suffering for no fault of theirs, and are naturally growing less and less sugarcane. Production of sugar has plummeted from a peak of 8.4 million tonnes in 1982-83, to 5.9 million tonnes today India, which once exported Rs 800 crores of sugar (1975,76), has now spent Rs 200 crores (1984,85) of precious foreign exchange on imports

This is the state of an industry which, by any international parameters, is productive and efficient! An industry which is the the second largest in the country

Clearly, a lot needs to be done

And time is running out

MORADABAD: A novel way of copying has been adopted by an examinee who was caught redhanded at the Inter College examination centre in Narauli town. The examinee, Naveen Agarwal, had placed a polythene bag filled with small slips in his mouth. To show that he was eating a betel he kept on chewing the bag. This aroused the suspicion of the invigilators who pulled out the bag and found the slips which contained handwritten notes from which the examinee was copying—Northern India Patrika (Anjali Khare, Lucknow)

CALCUTTA: Mr Shekhar Biswas, a resident of Jubilee Park, has received a telephone bill for Rs 800 15 years after returning the instrument. According to Mr Biswas, he had deposited the instrument in 1970 when he moved house, along with a request to shift the telephone to his new residence at 47 Jubilee Park, Calcutta 33. However, despite repeated reminders, the authorities did not transfer the instrument and in a letter informed him that as the 47-exchange was fully booked, it would be impossible to carry out the transfer. But Mr Biswas was surprised when a few days back he received a bill charging him Rs 800 for calls made on an instrument which did not exist—The Telegraph (B. Ganesh, Jamshedpur)

FAIZABAD: Coin shortage should have pinched his pocket at most, but it left an unpleasant impact on his cheeks, instead. It was too late when the victim, a shopkeeper of Akberpur town in this district, realised his mistake in offering Nirodh to his customers in lieu of small coins. The shopkeeper had invented his own method of getting over the problem of coin shortage and his customers would cooperate with him by accepting the contraceptive. Recently, however, when, by force of habit, he offered a packet of Nirodh to a woman customer, she instantaneously lost her temper and left the shop after raining slaps on his cheeks. By the time the nonplussed shopkeeper regained his composure, she had disappeared—Indian Express (S.S. Raju, Bombay)

RAIPUR: On 23 April, a youth from a village in Bilaspur district came to the rescue of a Muslim girl who was rejected by her fiance on the eve of the marriage. The bridegroom's party reached the bride's village on 21 April and immediately started wrangling for more dowry. The girl's parents, unable to meet the demands, approached the village elders who, with the consent of the bride, decided to send back the marriage party. However, the girl's disappointment did not last long as a youth of the same community came forward and agreed to marry her without any dowry. Inspired by this chivalry, another youth sought and won the bride's younger sister's hand in marriage—The Times of India (Ajai Bhalchandra Kher, Allahabad)

MADURAI: Visitors to the collector's office at Ramnad move carefully with their eyes fixed to the ground for fear of stepping on a snake. The building, where a number of departments including the collector's chamber have been located since 15 March, is haunted by snakes. Invariably, class four servants either drive away the reptiles or kill them. On 19 April a snake coiled itself among the files in the corner of a room. The bewildered staff members ran about the town and caught hold of a snake charmer who took away the reptile—The Hindu (R. Venkatesan, Tiruchirapalli)

For years the sugar industry has been squeezed out of shape.

Now the crunch is coming. Soon sugar could become very scarce in the open market. And even if it is available, it'll be at prices nobody will find sweet

How could this happen?
Can anything be done?

The problem lies in the open market That's where severe shortages loom And that's where prices are threatening to sky-rocket

Who's responsible?

The sugar industry is allowed to sell only 35% of its produce in the open market. This is to make up for the losses it incurs in subsidising sugar in ration shops — to the tune of over Rs 300 crores

Unfortunately, the Govt has forced the industry to release 75% of its open market quota in the first six months

The result? Not enough sugar for the future Hence the impending shortages, and hence sky-high prices

Something needs to be done Immediately

What can be done?

First increase the open market quota to 50% This will help in stabilising prices, and in reducing the expected shortages Enough sugar in the open market will also keep the speculators at bay

The Govt is already importing sugar This can make up for whatever shortages occur in ration shops

But much more needs to be done if the sugar industry is to survive

One way road to disaster.

For Tony the vital breakthrough may well have been victories over his two arch tormentors, Portisch and Timman His game against the latter, a crisp cut-and-thrust affair, shows the immense potential of an unopposed queen's bishop

Has the time come to write the obituary of India's second largest industry?

The facts suggest so
Sugar industry losses in the last three years are upwards of Rs 800 crores
Production has plummeted from 8 4 million tonnes in 1982-83 to 5 9 million today India, which once exported Rs 800 crores of sugar (1975,76), has now spent Rs 200 crores (1984,85) on imports

Worse still, to finance these losses, the industry has had to borrow sizeable sums from the banks and State Govts This is having a crippling effect on its finances Consequently, payments to sugarcane growers are regularly getting delayed A cash crop has become a credit one They are suffering for no fault of theirs, and, are naturally growing less and less sugarcane And that's what is really scary No sugarcane no sugar

This is the state of an industry which by any international parameters, is productive and efficient!

So has the time come to write its obituary? The new economic order.

There is a mood of optimism in India

The new Govt. has shown every intention of liberalising controls, removing irrational and counterproductive policies

That is precisely what needs to be done in the case of the sugar industry

The solutions.

First, and immediately, the industry should be allowed to sell 50% of its produce in the open market

This will take care of the impending shortages in the open market, and the consequent sky high prices This will also keep the speculators at bay The Govt is already importing sugar This can easily make up for whatever shortages occur in ration shops

But for the industry to survive, much more needs to be done

Make sure sugarcane growers find it profitable to cultivate sugarcane APC (Agricultural Prices Commission) recommendations in respect of cane prices should be implemented without delay A national policy needs to be formulated

No industry can survive in the face of regular and staggering losses Make sure it becomes profitable to produce sugar Rationalise prices

This will help the sugar industry in getting out of its present nosedive Over a period of time, this will also help in building up buffer stocks

Then, and only then, will the Indian sugar industry become stable And only then can India go back to earning precious foreign exchange by exporting sugar

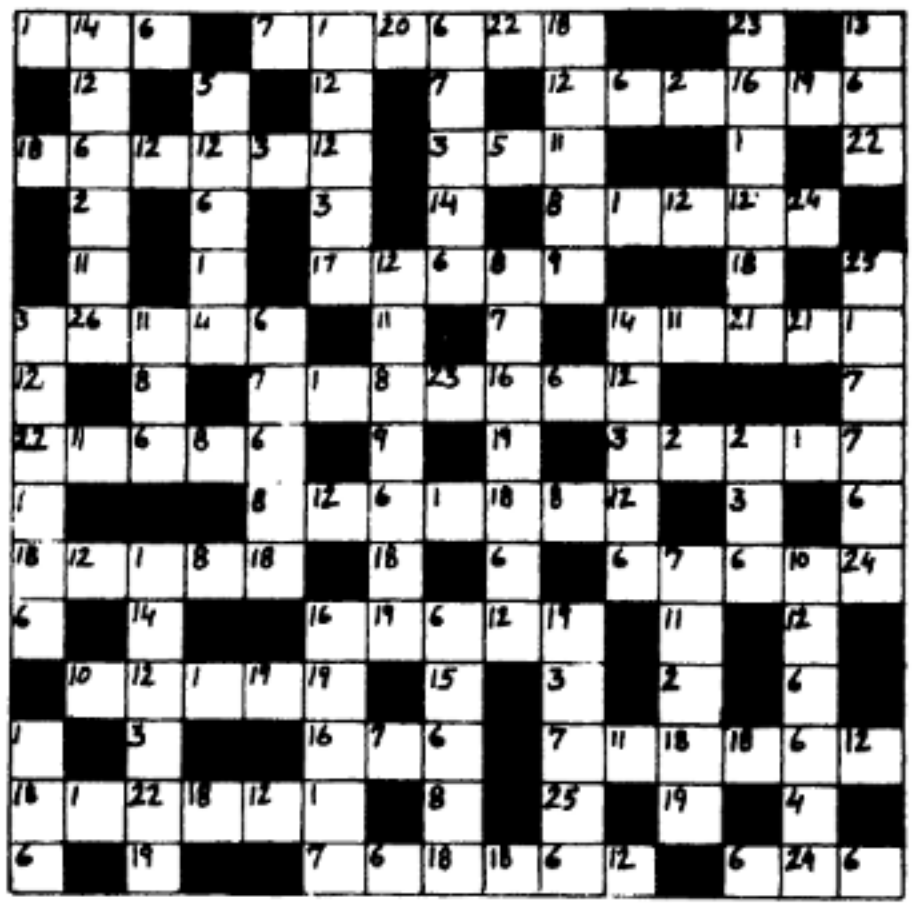
These four clocks have only dots where the numbers should be. What is more, the hour and minute hands are identical, so it is rather difficult to tell the time. To make matters worse the clock faces have been rotated by various amounts, and, as you can see, each face has lost one dot. But we know that:

a) Two clocks are missing the dot for 12
b) One clock is exactly one hour slower than two of the others
c) None has lost the dot for 2
d) Two faces show the same time.



Can you work out the times that the clocks show?

The resurrection of Sunjay Dutt is now the talk of the industry. Prakash Mehra set the trend by signing him up to play the leading role in Imandaar and a number of other filmmakers followed suit. Sunjay has already signed eight films and is awaiting the release of Jaan ki Baazi, which will determine his future as an actor.

The success of Pyar Jhukta Nahin (which is as big a hit as Sholay and Jai Santoshi Maa) has given Padmini Kolhapure a fresh lease of life and made her take her career very seriously. Prior to the release of this film, she was down in the dumps while she watched other actresses climb up the ladder of success. Now, things are brightening up for her. Says Padmini, "I am lucky this film came along. I don't know what I would have done or where I would be."

Akbar Khan is a very disturbed man these days. His first film, Haadsaa, was a fiasco after years of hard work. Akbar is getting more offers but the only film which he is now going ahead with is his brother Sanjay Khan's Kaala Dhanda Goray Log. His brothers, Feroz and Sanjay, are worried about his future. Even his marriage with Ranjeeta, the actress whose career is facing a crisis, is also on the rocks. "I have had enough for at least five years. I am now going to concentrate on my career as an actor," says Akbar.

Silk Smitha: Hollywood's loss

After achieving a good deal of success in the Kannada film industry, Pavithra is now flooded with offers from Telugu filmmakers. A confident Pavithra replies, "Now I am all set to prove that I have both glamour and talent." Only the future will tell whether she means what she says.

Money appears to be the sole cause of a misunderstanding between the singer S.P. Balasubramaniam and Krishna. Balasubramaniam no longer sings for Krishna. Now other male playback singers are vying with each other to fill up the slot.

Silk Smitha, the south's reigning sex symbol, has turned down an offer from a Hollywood film maker to act in his film. The reason, according to her, was lack of time. She had to give six months of her time, which was a very tall order. So she told the filmmaker that if he wanted her so badly he could shoot her scenes in India!

Has Dasari Narayan Rao's position weakened considerably in Hindi cinema? Four of his films, Prem Tapasya, Aaj ka MLA (based on his own Telugu hit, MLA Vedukondalu), Haisiyat and Sarfarosh have flopped in a row. Now he has two other films to prove himself.

As character artistes, Sujatha, Sarada and K.R. Vijaya—the trinity—are fine actresses. Competition among the three is always intense. But recently, Sujatha scored an edge over her rivals when she won the Savithri best actress award.

Mohsina Kidwai

Cabinet minister Mohsina Kidwai and union minister of state, Arif Mohammad Khan, seem to be drifting apart Someone has gone and told the senior minister that as both she and Khan are Muslims from UP, sooner or later Khan will try to usurp her position in state politics The jealousy dates back to the Lok Sabha elections. Mrs Kidwai, who represents Meerut, had her eyes on Bahraich, the constituency to which Khan shifted after representing Kanpur for five years Behraich is next door to Mrs Kidwai's home district. This has further enraged her Suspicions between Mrs Kidwai and Khan have grown since then and a spate of complaints and counter complaints have followed

No Successor to Alexander?

Will Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi abolish the post of principal secretary to PM? Since the resignation of Dr P C Alexander, following the involvement of his office staff in the spy scandal, the post has been lying vacant. Arun Singh the seniormost parliamentary secretary, is in charge of everything in the PM's office: he combines in himself the roles formerly taken up by Dr Alexander and special assistant R.K Dhawan in the Indira Gandhi days. The other two parliamentary secretaries, Oscar Fernandes and Ahmed Patel, are in fact aides of Arun Singh While Fernandes is assigned some government work, Patel mainly deals with party matters. The most important bureaucrat in the new setup is G K Arora, an additional secretary A former aide of Gulzarilal Nanda and D P Dhar (in their heyday in New Delhi), Arora is trusted with matters related to the cabinet secretariat. Montek Singh Ahluwalia is in charge of economic matters V S Tripathi, who quit the IAS to serve Mrs Gandhi's team, is entrusted with the home ministry. The new special assistant, Venkatraman, has gone on long leave. The aide trusted most by the Prime Minister apart from Arun Singh is V. George, his private secretary He has been in Rajiv Gandhi's staff from the very first day he started taking interest in politics Among the AICC staff, political adviser Makhan Lal Fotedar is the most trusted Rajiv Gandhi seems to prefer dealing with the bureaucracy directly through the cabinet secretary. With the principal secretary to the PM enjoying equal rank as the cabinet secretary, there used to be a lot of confusion in the past Now the supremacy of the political bureaucracy (the parliamentary secretaries), coupled with due weightage to the cabinet secretary, seems to be the rule

Dearer Friendship

The Russian Rouble has become dearer No, the international value of the Soviet currency has not shot up suddenly But in the bilateral trade between India and the USSR, the Rupee has been devalued. On 15 March the government fixed the exchange rate at Rs 11 3442 per Rouble as against the prevalent rate of Rs 10 9934 The Rouble, however, was not so strong in the international market at that time: Whereas in January 1984 one US Dollar was quoted at 0 75 Roubles, in January 1985 the exchange rate was 0.87. When the Rouble had depreciated in the international market, how could it have appreciated against the Indian Rupee? The fixing of the exchange rate between the Indian and Russian currencies has been a controversial subject since long During the Janata regime a formula was evolved linking the exchange rate to the value of the Rupee in terms of a specific basket of currencies Already, due to the Rupee trade arrangement, the USSR enjoys considerable leverage in the Indian market. With "friendship" making the Rouble dearer, the leverage has been enhanced.

The 66th birthday of Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna (the many-party politician of the opposition) was celebrated on the "green lawns of the Constitution Club" on 5 April. A 33-member committee was constituted for the 66th birthday celebrations Dr Sarup Singh, Lok Dal leader and former Delhi University vice-chancellor headed the committee which had many eminent Lok Dal personalities. The Lok Dal chief, Charan Singh, addressed the gathering. The Chaudhary concentrated on attacking Jawaharlal Nehru, while feting known Nehruite, H N Bahuguna with the Lok Dal's green flag.

Housing Problems

First-term MPs usually are not given bungalows in the capital (though there were exceptions in the past when Rajiv Gandhi, Arun Nehru, Jagdish Tytler, Kamal Nath, Rajesh Pilot and a host of others got bungalows). This time, the rule seems to be followed judiciously. As a result, a modest flat in South Avenue was offered to the MP from Allahabad, Amitabh Bachchan. The filmstar-politician has responded by moving into a private posh bungalow in Vasant Vihar. With this, the Bachchans have three private houses in Delhi now.

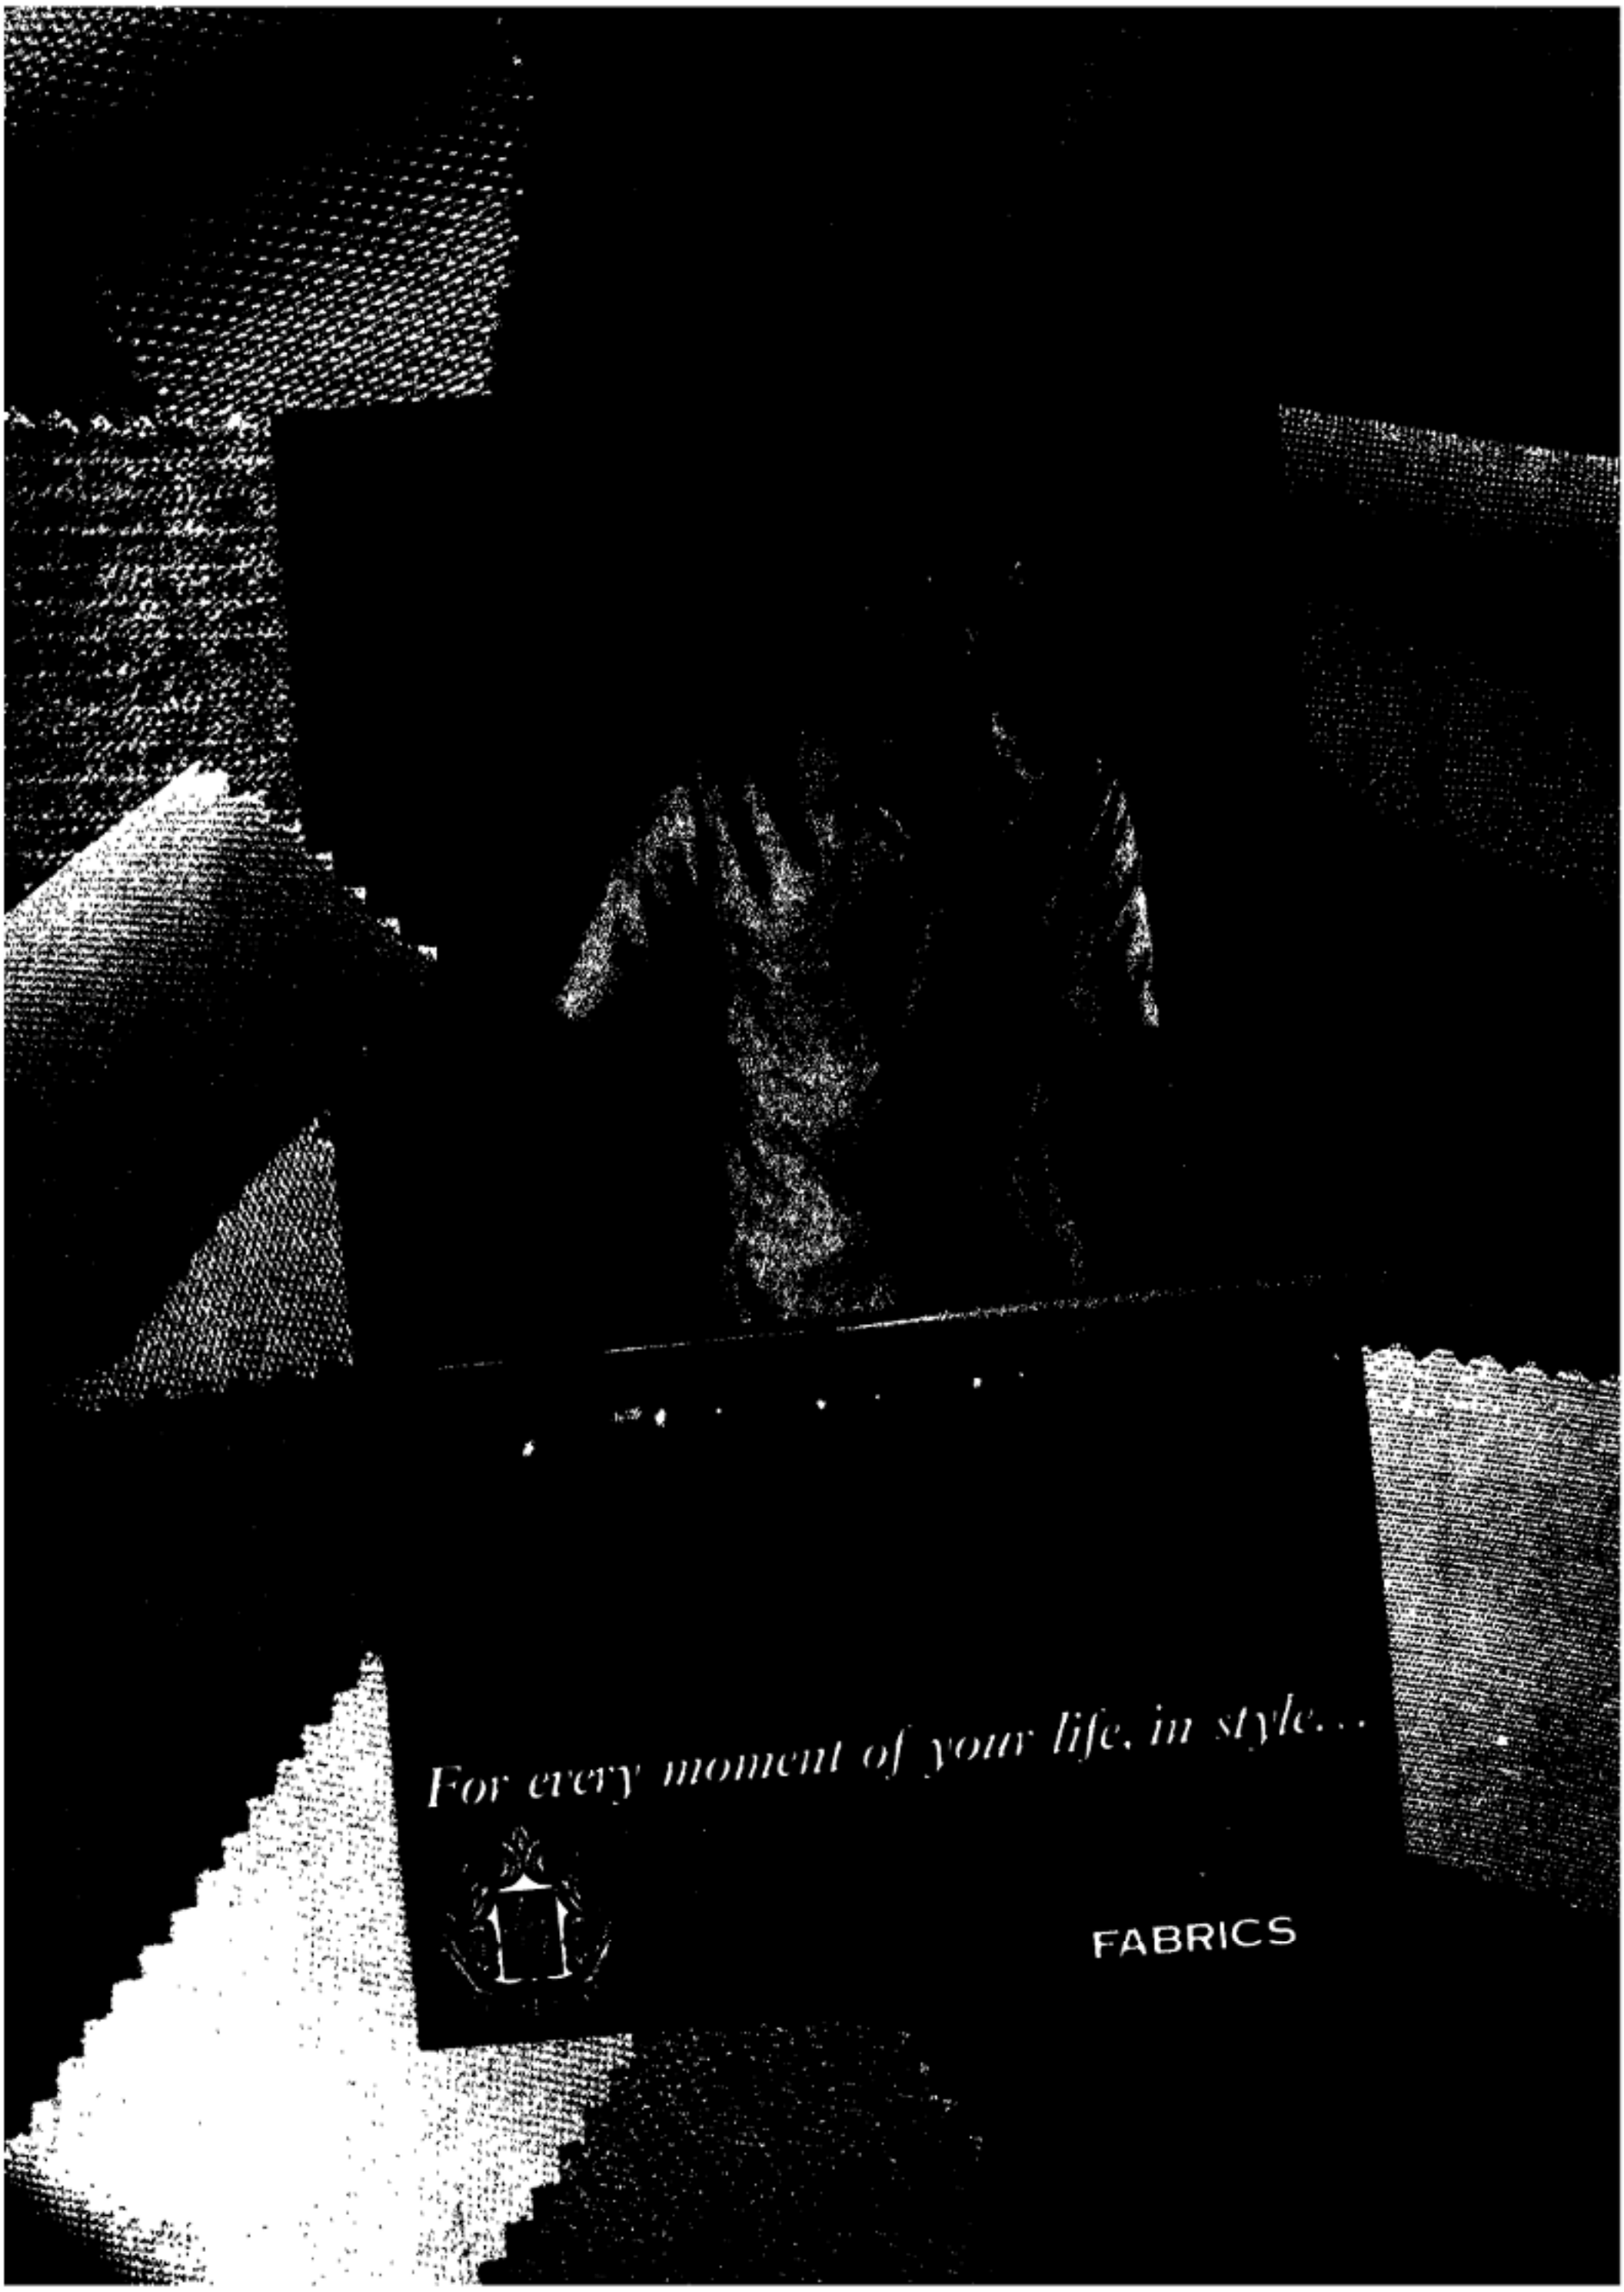
Voltas technology

Voltas technology is geared for innovation. Because Voltas does not have to depend on hand-me-down technology from one single foreign associate. Voltas can directly avail of the best of the international market. These include Merlin Gerin, leading switchgear manufacturers; May & Christe, pioneers of the cast resin design transformers; Research Cottrell, leaders in air pollution control; and Ames Crosta Babcock, specialists in water pollution control.

It was Voltas which introduced Medium Voltage SF6 circuit breakers to India. These modern, low maintenance circuit breakers will be used by the Vizag Steel Plant, Chettinad and Priyadarshini Cements, Tata Electric, BEST and BSEB. This is the first time SF6 switchgear at medium voltage will be used in cement and steel plants.

Along with superior technology, Voltas has the kind of commitment which starts at the top. A management attitude that filters down along the line, creating the ability to solve problems, execute the most exacting tasks, all within a tight time framework.



Combined with capability backed by sophisticated manufacturing facilities and quality control techniques. With dedicated professionals that form a power house of 200 trained engineers and 1800 support personnel. With the experience to put together individual products or complete turnkey projects.

Voltas technology, capability and commitment together form the kind of winning combination that has been proven time and again. With a single goal before us.

AGE CARE FOR MEN

Novopan presents all the excitement of Executive Class!

Was it the airlines who decided that the executive deserved to be put in a separate class?

It doesn't really matter who started it.
The fact is that most companies today treat it as a ground rule.

So who adds this touch of class?

Perhaps there's no candidate for the job with as much all-round potential as Novopan.
Novopan is the only pre-laminated particle board in the country.
It's pre-laminated on two sides.
Ready for the job.

This means your office panelling can go up almost overnight.

There's no disruption of work.
And look at the choice.
A range of wood finishes — teak, rosewood, oak... whatever you would!
As well as a variety of colours and designs.

For doors too, there's nothing like it.
You can order just the size you need. And shut the door on the problem!

Novopan is great for tables, cabinets, bookshelves... everything.
You can choose between regular Novopan and phenol-bonded Novopan Exterior.
So you can use it indoors and outdoors.

And here's the final qualification to clinch the appointment.

Novopan doesn't cost the earth.
As a matter of fact, it costs less than those one-sided laminate and plywood combinations.

Novopan — for all the excitement of Executive Class.

DATELINE / M.J. Akbar

Jamshedpur: Perhaps only a Parsi could have done it. It needs a subliminal relationship with fire to create steel. Air, water, earth, fire: all the elements play their part in the magic of the chemical interaction, but it is in the fire that the base ore is chastened, cleaned, strengthened and moulded into the shapes that can serve society.

It is not easy to come to psychological or physical terms with fire. Fire was the difference between the gods and man, said the Greeks, and it was a secret which the gods were not willing to share easily. Prometheus had left his brother Titans to fight alongside Zeus in the war for ultimate power, but that did nothing to check the rage of Zeus when he learnt that Prometheus had handed the secret of fire to human beings, the secret which not only preserved mankind but gave man the confidence to challenge the gods. And so Zeus sent Pandora to take revenge on man. Pandora married Prometheus' brother and her suicidal curiosity led her to open the forbidden box, the box in which evil had been contained till then. Disease, sin, pain now seeped across the earth to trouble mankind till eternity; all he had in his favour was a thin layer at the bottom of Pandora's box, hope. And Prometheus was chained to a rock in the Caucasus, where a huge, cavernous eagle tore at his liver each day—and the pain would not end with death since the liver was renewed each day so that the insatiable eagle might feed endlessly off human ambition. The gods put a high price on impertinence, and the most unforgiveable crime of all of course was the temptation to know a secret of divinity. Prometheus was, in the end, rescued from the vengeance of the gods by a man, a hero, Hercules. Fire had altered the world of man, as much the inner as the outer.

That fire is still at the service of man. And there are few places that offer a glimpse of its many dimensions as a steel plant. That dry, white furnace, with its terrifying empty heat, bursting into an awesome confusion as oxygen is pumped into it. Or the unbelievable sight of liquid iron pouring out of the furnace in a stream of fire, elements in the middle of change, life caught in the act of transformation. Or a blazing, squat, geometrical ingot, six sides and three dimensions, moving fast over whirling rollers whose speed disguises their strength till the ingot gets caught in the heavy trap of merciless hammers coming from either side and hitting the ingot with a power that translates into an echoing roar. Quickly, even as the fascinated eye stares bewitched, that squat ingot has become a long, flat beam of steel.

That beam, produced with sophistication and verve, is the end result of a vision. When the nation's young industrialists were thinking of cotton and textiles, one man had the daring to think of a huge fire in which a metal would be forged which could create the framework for a modern nation state. Jamshedji Tata was not just creating wealth; he was contributing his abilities to something far more important—progress. There is a difference and a distinction between the two which industrialists do not necessarily recognise. Jamshedji Tata saw the future and prepared his country for it; he was a man born in the nineteenth century who built the twentieth. The twentyfirst century is only fifteen years away. Are the heirs of J.R.D. Tata at all ready for it? Is there a dream in someone's mind today which will shape and improve the lives of our children and grandchildren in 2085?

When the nation's young industrialists were thinking of cotton and textiles, one man had the daring to think of a huge fire in which a metal would be forged which could create the framework for a modern nation state. Jamshedji Tata was not just creating wealth; he was contributing his abilities to something far more important—progress... Jamshedji Tata saw the future and prepared his country for it; he was a man born in the nineteenth century who built the twentieth.

I never believed I would actually ever see it. But there it was. On the morning of Wednesday 29 May two passengers were on the wrong flight. The Vayudoot aircraft which hops from Calcutta to Jamshedpur is very much a club class plane. The passengers know one another, the atmosphere is thick with "in" jokes as the younger people check out their bits of information while the elders exchange quiet acknowledgements before going back to serious-looking files full of plans and accounts. The bonhomie is understandable. Virtually every passenger is a Tata executive. Jeans, T-shirts, public school English, management school confidence—or perhaps just Tata confidence. Perhaps it was this culture gap which alerted the couple, a very middle class Bengali pair going in fact to Siliguri. Just a little before the flight to Jamshedpur was about to take off, when the doors had come down, and that mood of nervous expectation had brought silence into the aircraft, suddenly the couple felt that something was wrong. They checked. And rushed out. The flight to Siliguri, sitting alongside, luckily had not left yet. But the mystery was not that our unsuspecting couple had boarded the wrong plane but that the mistake had gone undetected from the time they checked in.

Well, small things like this apart, it was a good flight attended by courteous men. They don't have air hostesses on Vayudoot, it is still an airline without too many complications. There is the small family air about Vayudoot which will disappear sooner or later. The friendliness will be replaced by efficiency. And the small errors probably give way to big ones.

Komagata What?

A youngster preparing for his general knowledge paper asked me to test his information. He had crammed names of capitals, heads of states and what acronyms like MCC, UNO, UNICEF etc. stood for. I tried him out on items of recent history. "What and when was the Komagata Maru?" I asked.

"Komagata what?" he asked very puzzled, "never heard of it. It's not in my G.K. cram book."

That, perhaps, would be the reaction of most people of the younger generation. It would surprise them to know that it was an important milestone in our freedom movement and a play entitled The Komagata Maru Incident is currently doing the rounds of major cities of England. It is written by Sharon Pollock and produced by the Jericho Theatrical Productions. Although the theme is almost entirely Indian, the director and most of the cast are English, Canadian or Caribbean. The only two Indians amongst the actors are Rashid Karapiet, once an announcer in A.I. Radio and Jamila Massey, wife of poet Reginald Massey. They picked on this incident that took place 70 years ago because it was an early example of racist prejudice and has bearing on the attitude of the Caucasian races towards the coloured to this day.

The scene is laid in Vancouver (Canada) The time is the summer of 1914. A few thousand Indian emigrants 'mainly retired Sikh soldiers' have found employment in lumber mills. Even the presence of this small group in a vast, unpopulated country has created hatred in the minds of Canadians of European descent. A popular song is entitled "White Canada Forever"

We welcome as brothers all white men still,
But the shifty yellow race,
Whose word is vain, who oppress the weak
Must find another place.
To Oriental grasp and greed
We'll surrender, no never.
Our watchword be "God Save the King"
White Canada forever.

Exactly 71 years ago this May, a Japanese ship, the Komagata Maru chartered by one Gurdit Singh of Sarhali arrived in Vancouver with 376 Indians intending to settle in Canada. The Prime Minister of British Colombia, Sir Richard MacBride, refused to let them come ashore. "To admit Orientals in such large numbers would mean in the end the extinction of the white people and we have always in mind the necessity of keeping this a white man's country," he said.

For two months the ship stayed in Vancouver harbour till it was forced out by Canadian gunboats. When the ship arrived at Budge Budge (Calcutta), Indian police tried to force its passengers into railway trains. A fracas ensued: the police opened fire killing 18 and wounding another 25.

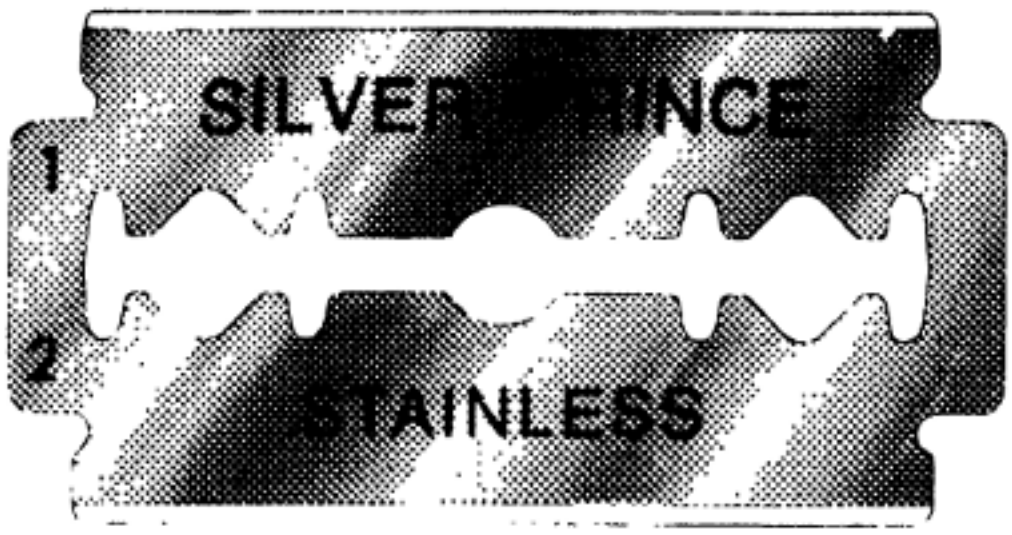
Some years ago a Hindi film made on this episode proved to be a flop. Now the same incident has been turned out into a successful play. Some enterprising organisation should get it over to India.

Loving India

"Delhi lives, breathes, eats and sleeps politics; politics hits every facet of life," writes Louise Nicholson, The Times (London) travel columnist, in her recently published guide book entitled India in Luxury. She goes on to make comparisons between our metropolitan cities: "The difference between Delhi and Bombay is India's version of that between Washington and New York. Indeed one Delhi gentleman looked down his knowledgeable nose, dismissing Bombay as a cheap imitation Manhattan. As the saying goes: Delhi is structured red tape, Bombay is money—to which Calcuttans add, optimistically, Calcutta is living."

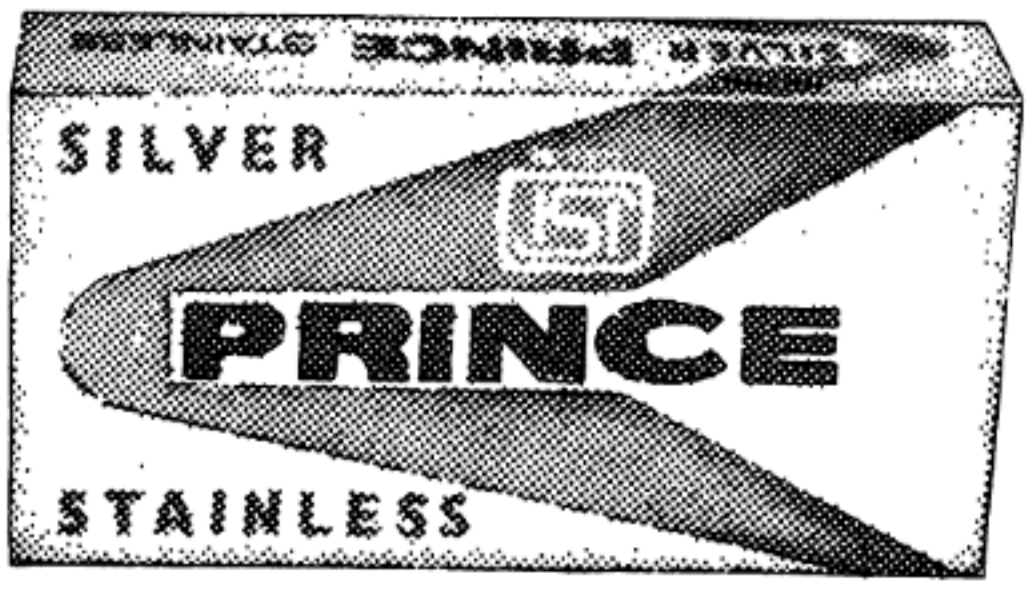
Not all Indians will agree with this blanket judgement. Nor with Mrs Nicholson's view that "social rank in Delhi is measured solely by political power. A new-boy politician is several rungs above an eminent lawyer, and certainly above any outdated nonsense like maharajas. Indeed, Delhi is the only city where the former princes are most definitely former-...Indian filmstars do not fare much better here, a unique experience for them; in a magazine article on the dining haunts of the Delhi celebrities, four were politicians and six were writers, painters or performing artistes—but not a single filmstar."

This should convince the reader that India in Luxury is no run-of-the-mill tourist's guide book. It has all a visitor who has a week or so to spend in India needs to know about its history, climate, monuments, hotels, eating places, air and rail travel as well as the hazards that may be encountered in the way of professional pests like beggars, pimps, cab-drivers and guides who earn commissions from dealers in antiques and handicrafts. And a lot more



Louise was introduced to India by her husband who brought her here for their honeymoon. The union was apparently satisfactorily consummated: "He gave me a month in paradise," wrote a very fulfilled bride. She came again and again, travelled extensively and decided that India provides more luxurious experiences at less cost than any other country in the world. Its wines may be sour, its whiskey undrinkable, its girls unwilling, its nightlife only slumbering and snoring, its telephones always out of order, but it more than compensates for these shortcomings by its kaleidoscopically colourful and hospitable people.

Not Cruelty



An inspector of schools went to a government-aided school and put the following question to students of sixth class: "You have read the Ramayana. Tell me who broke the Shiva's dhanush? Only one boy raised his hand: "Sir, I do not know who broke it but it was not me."

The inspector turned to the teacher and reprimanded him for not having done his job. The teacher replied: "Sir, the boy is very naughty. I am sure it was he who broke it, but will not admit it."

The inspector went to the headmaster and narrated the whole story. After hearing him the headmaster said: "Why make a fuss about such a petty thing. Whatever is broken is broken for ever. While paying us the grant you may deduct the price of a new dhanush and pay the balance." (Contributed by R. R. Bajaj)

EXCLUSIVE/KULDIP NAYAR

Two Nations, One Story

On a recent visit to Bangladesh, I saw for myself how much that country still has in common with Pakistan, which it tore off from in 1971: in both countries the people are struggling for a democratic structure and are being denied one. In both countries, there are entrenched military juntas and oppositions that are outliving their utility, the old leaders having exhausted themselves. In both countries, it is the students who hold out any hope for change.

General Zia-ul Haq of Pakistan and General H.M. Ershad of Bangladesh have both held referenda, but they have not given them the legitimacy they had sought within their own countries or abroad. But the elections to the national and provincial assembles in Pakistan and to the Upa-Zillas (the equivalent of the panchayats) in Bangladesh have had more credibility as it appears the military rulers of both countries had decided to remain 'neutral' after 'winning' their respective referenda. Interestingly, in both countries the opposition parties later regretted not having fought the elections.

Both Ershad and Zia can afford to loosen the reins of power only to a certain extent. If they ever try to transfer power to popular representatives, I have no doubt they will be swept aside. Zia, who is more of a politician, having been in power for eight years, is perhaps a better manipulator and more confident than Ershad. But he is evidently of the view that the armed forces have a permanent role to play in the affairs of Pakistan. Ershad, who is more of a simple, straightforward soldier, however, denies having ever envisaged military participation in his country's political system to go on indefinitely. The poet that he is, he has a rather emotional approach to the problems which confront his country, he also sees no contradiction in a democratic government assigning a permanent political role to the armed forces: "We (the army) are not a mercenary force, and we have to participate in the liberation of Bangladesh."

Both Ershad and Zia can afford to loosen the reins of power only to a certain extent. If they ever try to transfer power to popular representatives, I have no doubt they will be swept aside.

The most striking similarity between the two countries is the absence of institutions. The press, the judiciary and elected representatives function within the parameters laid down for them and have to accept the reality of military rule. But the people in both countries have not lost their voice—even though they might not be expressing their resentment against the rulers openly. While the Pakistanis have been under martial law for three decades and are less optimistic about retaining their basic freedoms, the Bangladeshis have had to put up with it for only one decade, and do not appear to have lost all hope. Economically, of course, Pakistan is much better off. Both countries produce few industrial goods and depend on remittances and aid from abroad for over 50 per cent of their foreign exchange reserves. But Pakistan, with a smaller population, receives more aid and remittances and does not have the stark poverty of Bangladesh Both countries devote more than 40 per cent of their budgets to defence. Since Islamabad is obsessed with the Indian 'threat,' its large outlay on arms and ammunition is perhaps understandable, but why must Dhaka follow its footsteps? Bangladesh has a peace and friendship treaty with India and good relations with China.

India is not popular in either country, but anti-Indian feeling is more visible in Pakistan than Bangladesh. Delhi has better ties with Dhaka than Islamabad. And though Bangladesh is no less 'Islamic' than Pakistan, the government in Dhaka claims that the Hindus are as much a part of their nation as the Muslims. Pakistan on the other hand continues to propagate the two-nation theory, calling the Hindus a separate nation. However, no Hindu is a member of the cabinet either in Pakistan or Bangladesh.

Ershad is more liberal than Zia. When I told the former that one of his ministers had remarked in an interview to me that Bangladesh could create the kind of problems for India that Sri Lanka has by persecuting Tamils, he grew furious: "The Hindus are part and parcel of our nation and there is no question of treating them differently."

Despite their similarities, there is no love lost between Pakistan and Bangladesh The Bangladeshis are still bitter about the years of repression under the rulers of the erstwhile west Pakistan. All those who died in the liberation war of 1971 have been made into national heroes. The monument built in their memory is shown on Dhaka TV every evening Pakistan, on the other hand, looks upon Bangladesh as lost territory. The creation of Bangladesh was a demonstration of the fact that religion alone cannot form the basis of a nation; it was a blow to the two-nation theory on which Pakistan was founded

Perhaps this was even willed. The Muslim League's Lahore Resolution, which prepared the ground for Pakistan, had said that "the areas in which the Muslims are numerically in a majority, as in the north-western and eastern zones of India, should be grouped to constitute independent states in which the constituent units shall be autonomous and sovereign." (italics mine). Mohammed Ali Jinnah, Pakistan's founder, tried to explain later that due to a typing error, 'state' had gone down as 'states.' I recall asking the late Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, then President of Pakistan, to comment on the 'misprint' theory when I met him in Rawalpindi in March 1972. He laughed it off: "Quite a costly misprint. I must be careful about my stenographer!"

Bloody Revenge

SUNDAY correspondents deserve to be congratulated for the brilliant cover story, The Sant's Revenge (19—25 May). The government should take the strictest possible steps against the Sikh terrorists who are trying to undermine national unity. The photographs will continue to haunt me for a long, long time.
Bibek Sen, New Delhi

• M.J. Akbar had correctly analysed the reason behind the dastardly bomb blasts which killed and maimed many innocent people. The ghastly act by a few terrorists need to be dealt with an iron hand. As suggested by Sankarshan Thakur, an IRA connection cannot be ruled out. However, I was releaved to learn that most of the Akali leaders had condemned the incident.
Kajvir Grewal, Calcutta

• A small group of committed fanatics is disturbing communal harmony and threatening the unity of India. As rightly pointed out by M.J. Akbar, whenever a solution to the Punjab problem seems in sight, this group becomes active as was noticed in the 'transistor bomb' explosions which rocked the capital and parts of northern India It is time the centre took steps against such anti-national activities.
S. Ejaz Ahmed, Burnpur

• I was moved by the pictures of the victims of the bomb blasts. 'Blood for blood' seemed to be the guiding principle of our society. Are we head ing towards a major social unheaval?
P. Lala, Akra (West Bengal)

• The cover story was well researched and M.J. Akbar's expatiation on the background to the terrorist activities in Delhi and other places was apt. The terrorists are bent upon marring the camaraderie existing between the Hindus and the Sikhs and stopping their leaders from cooperating with the centre of find a solution to the Punjab problem. The government headed by Rajiv Gandhi agreed to grant a number of the Akali demands but the Sikhs seemed to be divided and confused. Much innocent blood has been shed and terrorism should reach its nadir very soon. Wake up Sikhs! Your unification is most needed to solve the Punjab imbroglio.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• Last November, when innocent Sikhs were butchered, the government was silent. There was bound to be retaliation and soon bomb blasts rocked the country. But why is there so much hue and cry from the administration this time?

Ravinder Kaur Dua, Calcutta

• The bomb blasts were a natural retaliation for what happened soon after Indira Gandhi was assassinated. There will be more such occurances if the government does not stop the indiscriminate arrest and torture of innocent Sikhs.
Balbir Singh, Calcutta

• While condemning the bomb blasts by a few anti-socials, I wonder how the administration could apprehend the criminals so fast since this is the same government that had shown callous indifference when Sikhs were butchered in broad daylight in the capital last November.
Pritpal Singh, Calcutta

• The bomb attacks in the capital and some parts of northern India resulted in the killing of innocent persons who had nothing to do with the November riots and Operation Bluestar. It is now clear that foreign governments are behind the extremists in their nefarious activities. However, the most heartening thing was the unequivocal condemnation of the incident by the Sikh leaders.
Smita Narang, New Delhi

• I do not agree with M.J. Akbar that the recent bomb blasts in northern India are a manifestation of Sant Bhindranwale's revenge. But, yes, it was an outrage perpetrated by extremists in the Sikh community. The background built up by the government for negotiations with the Akalis has come to nought.
Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

A Democratic Dictator

M.J. Akbar's report from Pakistan, In the Name of Allah (12—18 May) followed by the interview with President Zia-ul Haq ('Halwas and Mithais Make a Lot of Us in Pakistan and India Join Hands Together') was enlightening. The dictator President's hypocritical remarks about democracy bordered on the ridiculous. However, Zia-ul Haq seemed to have forgotten the past and appeared to be interested in developing relations with India. Our youthful Prime Minister should make use of this opportunity and initiate fresh talks with Pakistan.
N. Ellango, Tirunelveli

Akshaya Kumar Boity, Rourkela

• Whatever explanation Zia-ul Haq gave to defend his decision to acquire sophisticated arms, history reveals that such armaments have been used against India. Zia appeared hypocritical and shrewd throughout the interview and it is our bitter experience that there is no co-relation between Zia's pious thoughts and his actions. His determination to resolve the volatile Kashmir issue has no significance since Pakistan loses no opportunity to make provocative statements regarding Kashmir in the UNO.
Tilok Upadhyay Koirala, Dibrugarh

• I was impressed by President Zia-ul Haq's remark that there is confidence among the common people (of India and Pakistan) but there is no confidence at a higher level and perhaps there is none at the top. If the people of the two countries are consulted or allowed to have contact with eachother, there would never be any war. When Kuldip Nayar visited Pakistan some years ago and talked to the people there, he found that the man in the street was not interested in a war with India. Neither does the average Indian want to attack Pakistan. If the crores of rupees spent on arms by the two countries are utilised for the welfare of the people of the respective countries, the world will be a much better place to live in.
S.S. Raju, Bombay

• I agree with M.J. Akbar that Jinnah's two-nation theory along religious lines did not do any good for the followers of Islam. Everyone knows what is going on in Pakistan in the name of religion.
Rama Bisht, Meerut

Are Khadi Weavers Exploited?

In The Weavers of Despair (21—27 April) Binoo K. John has tried to weave a story of ruthless exploitation, hunger, tears and denial of basic rights to workers of the khadi industry. This is far from the facts. Perhaps, khadi is the only industry where there is no scope for the exploitation of the artisans. The khadi economy is based on humanitarian consideration only. It is governed by a scientific and full-fledged costing system based on minimum overheads. The khadi industry is run on a no-profit-no-loss basis and even if any profit is accrued in the course of trading activities, the same is credited to the Artisans Benefit Fund and not appropriated by the institutions for any other purpose. There is a certification committee under the Khadi & Village Industries Commission (KVIC) which ensures that the prescribed cost charts are scrupulously followed by the institutions and that the interests of the artisans are safeguarded and the purity of khadi maintained.

The earnings of spinners and weavers of khadi are based on their performance. There are weavers who earn up to Rs 500 a month in our centres. In one place the author states about the "meagre Rs three per eight hours working day." In another place Mr John writes that "a girl takes home Rs 5" and yet in another context the writer states that "a weaver weaves three meters for which he gets Rs six at Rs 20 for 10 meters." All these show that he has not tried to correctly assess the details. It is incorrect to say that a few girls manage to weave over a meter only a day. Perhaps the writer has been misled by the interested unionist. We can demonstrate to him and prove that his information about the speed of weavers is incorrect. The wages are revised from time to time by the KVIC throughout India whenever the situation calls for such a revision. The earnings of artisans may be low when compared to other industries since the technology employed is so devised as to suit the conditions in villages which call for minimum cost and maximum employment at a wage, be it ever so low, so as to increase the national wealth utilising the idle hours of the villagers. If employment opportunities on better wages are available elsewhere as the writer points out, who is preventing these artisans from availing themselves of these facilities?

The writer had entered our premises surreptitiously with some parties who are intent on maligning the institution and it was the local people who intervened and protested against taking photos of girls in a clandestine manner even when the institution was open to all for entry for genuine purposes. There was nothing to hide from the public as the writer tries to establish. A little bit of courtesy on the part of the writer could have saved an unpleasant situation.

It seems that the writer wanted to test the old Biblical dictum of "turning the other cheek" (which he ascribed to Gandhiji) in our premises at Chenkottukonam. We are sorry that our workers on the spot could not give a demonstration of the same as they are still far away from Christ and Gandhi. However, we are told that they gave a passive resistance to a seemingly improper act in a true Gandhian manner.

Mr John has concluded his article by stating that I had remarked that khadi today has become the symbol of shame. I have been quoted out of context. The shame has to be transferred from khadi to the society which allows half of its population to remain below the poverty line. I said that khadi is a symbol of shame to a society which practises the theory of survival of the fittest, as khadi is trying for the survival of the weakest by just helping them to keep body and soul together. Khadi puts annually about 100 crores of rupees (with minimum of overheads) into the pockets of about 14 lakhs of people who belong to the lowest strata of society. In case the same amount is distributed to hundreds of people, the per capita earning may be more and khadi can escape from this kind of criticism. But khadi workers have to bear the cross so long as there are human beings in this land, who are prepared to work even for lesser wages.

V. P. Appukuttan, Programme Executive, Kerala Gandhi Smarak Nidhi, Trivandrum

Binoo John replies: In the last sentence of the rejoinder Mr Appukuttan himself had put very clearly what my article was meant to expose: that khadi workers are being made to "bear the cross." Throughout the letter he substantiates the issues the article raised. At least twice he says about the wages of the khadi workers: "Be it ever so low" and "low paid artisans." And that exactly, Mr Appukuttan, is what exploitation is all about. The question is why should poor girls be made to sweat in dingy sheds for wages "ever so low" without being given even the basic rights guaranteed to labourers by law?

Regarding wages of the khadi workers, Mr Appukuttan says that I have given different figures in different parts of the article. The reason is that there is no fixed minimum wage. Recently there was an announcement that minimum wages of spinners would be raised to Rs ten and that of weavers to Rs 15. The announcement was an eyewash. No labourer has yet got this minimum wage benefit.

One can understand Mr Appukuttan's impatience and ire against "interested unionists." If finally these girls have the courage to unite, Mr Appukuttan and his clan will probably have to move out from the comfort of the two-storeyed mansion in which they are now.

What is soclandestine about a press photographer taking two photographs which we published in public interest? Why did Gandhi Smarak Nidhi try to prevent the exposition of the truth by getting the police to forcibly seize the negatives? Mr Appukuttan is lying once again when he says that only "the local people intervened." Not only were officials of the unit directing the goondas but later the secretary of Gandhi Smarak Nidhi Mr Luckose Benjamin arrived on the scene to lend support to Mr Appukuttan.

However desperately Mr Appukuttan might have tried, he could not deny the basic points in the article: that girls have to buy cotton from their own meagre wages, that they have to make glue with the pittance they get and that they even have to make allowance for the shrinkage of khadi. Why doesn't Mr Appukuttan take the trouble to venture out of his office and go into the huts of the girls who are struggling to eke out an existence? He would then have seen the tears as I did. If the khadi industry is based on "humanitarianism," why should the mothers of these girls cry? Luckose Benjamin who as secretary should have written the letter, did not dare to do so because then he would have had to answer uncomfortable questions like for instance, his trip to Kathmandu to discuss "development programmes."

*Regarding the expression, "*khadi has today become the symbol of shame," Mr Appukuttan says that he has been quoted out of context. But how can such a quote be out of context? What other context can there be to this quote? We stand by every word of the story.

IS VIDEO KILLING CINEMA?

Can Bombay's once record-shattering Hindi film industry withstand the onslaught of video and television as modes of mass entertainment? Will video piracy be a final nail in the coffin of Hindi cinema? The selling of the video rights of the film Saagar before its release indicates the shape of things to come, says Lekha Dhar.

The Bombay film industry is on the verge of closure. The cost of exhibition and production have shot up, while the collections are nosediving—Gulshan Rai.

The peak of Hindi cinema is over. The Hindi film industry is finished as it existed. It has got to don a new mantle. The role, the reach has to be redefined—Amit Khanna.

Very bad days are ahead for the film industry if video piracy continues. Piracy as well as television are a threat. We are not against the technology—video and TV look like the future of the film industry. Theatres will become godowns or cold storage cellars. It is written on the walls—Prakash Mehra.

Closure? Disaster? Far from it. Through the history of cinema there have always been technical upheavals, whether it has been sound, colour, television—and now video. None of them have killed it. If you look at the west, neither the cinema nor the theatre has died down. At the moment it has taken a big toll. The industry was not aware of the effect, nor the pace at which it has proliferated. It has upset everyone's applecart—Ramesh Sippy.

The fate of one of the world's most proliferous film industries, headquartered in Bombay, today hangs precariously in the balance: Will Hindi cinema, for long the premier mode of mass entertainment, survive the onslaught of video and TV? Even if it does, what will remain of its size and fertility? Answers to these queries have been attempted with varying degrees of optimism or despair. But one thing is certain: the industry is going through a period of flux, with its productivity at an all-time low. Ironically, while it is the bigger names in the industry who are expressing their fears most voluably, it is the smaller fries who will eventually prove to be the worst victims of the slump—as it happened in other countries where films entered a similar phase.

Why does an industry which has an annual investment of around Rs 2,000 crores, flounder? (Capital investment in 1981, excluding the central and state government film departments, was estimated at Rs 1,895.45 crores.) The film industry's magnates are quick to point out that Rs 300 crores from the steadily plunging net box-office collection of Rs 750 crores by way of entertainment tax, is the main malaise. However, it is the flourishing video industry with a Rs 1,000 crore turnover, 99 per cent of which is illegal, that is slowly choking the life out of Bombay's tinsel Hindi celluloid world, and threatening to spread its tentacles to regional cinema.

The film industry sees its most tangible threats as video and television. The boom in television serials is often compared to the phenomenon in America where TV emerged as the most powerful medium of communication; where the downslide in cinema witnessed a rush by producers to compete for TV time; and where under-quoting saw many fall by the way. While TV and video loom large in the horizon as threats, a myriad other factors have combined to slowly wear away the edifice.

Over the last 20 years a slow erosion has taken place. Regional cinema, especially south Indian cinema has become a force to contend with as statistics show. In 1947, 281 feature films were produced of which 184 were in Hindustani or Hindi. Thirty-three were in Bengali, 29 in Tamil, 11 in Gujarati, 6 in Marathi, 5 in Kannada, 6 in Telugu, 2 in Assamese and one in Sinhalese. In 1979, 714 feature films were produced of which 140 were in Tamil, 133 in Telugu, 131 in Malayalam, 59 in Kannada, 114 in Hindi, 19 in Marathi, 15 in Oriya, 15 in Punjabi, 10 in Assamese and seven in other languages.

This shows that the Hindi film industry controlled 65 per cent of the production in 1947 while south Indian films had a poor 14 per cent share. The balance swiftly shifted in 1979, with the southern languages taking over 65 per cent of the production share. This ratio is evident where theatres are concerned also. A survey in 1981 showed that 5,897 of the 10,813 theatres were located in the southern states while this ratio has become more than half now, with about 7,000 of the 12,000 cinemas in the country in the south.

Although the Telugu film industry is heading for a crisis, by crossing budgets it has managed to keep the local population in its grip and independent of Hindi films. This trend in the south, especially in Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh where film stars have taken over as chief ministers and cult figures, 70 per cent of the Hindi films produced never get released here.

Regional cinema has also received a boost from the respective state governments which give subsidies and have slashed entertainment tax. In Gujarat for instance, slashing entertainment tax has eaten into the Hindi film audience. The Seventies saw an upswing, attracting small timers from the Hindi film industry to it. Snehalata, a lesser known Hindi screen actress, made it to the top in Gujarat. Others like Asrani, Aruna Irani and Upendra Trivedi turned to Gujarati films. According to writer-director Amit Khanna, "The Hindi film industry is the national orphan. States give incentives to regional language cinema, so Maharashtra will give incentives to Marathi cinema. You cannot expect Uttar Pradesh or Bihar to give incentives to an industry located in Bombay."

Another subtle contribution is from the fading or rather the narrowing of the star system to a few names. The Fifties and Sixties were dominated by a galaxy, among whom Dev

Anand, Dilip Kumar and Raj Kapoor featured prominently along with Madhubala, Nargis, Meena Kumari, Nutan and so on. Till the early Seventies, there were almost two dozen top stars. The Seventies saw the top thinning, despite the influx of film magazines and the tinsel world that they brought into focus. They should have sold a star system, invading homes the way they did and selling a mixture of fantasy and gossip. But they unconsciously narrowed the top. to a few Amitabh Bachchan, Rekha and a few others have managed to keep to the first rungs, giving rise to a subsequent increase in star prices and making doubtful the saleability of a number of others.

This kind of narrow cloistering at the top and the failure of commercial films to generate a number of stars who could maintain a sort of equilibrium at work, resulted in the multi-shift system and chaotic working conditions. For instance, Shashi Kapoor could be working in as many as six films in a day. As the star system polarised around a few, so did the work. Besides the polarisation of the star system the dichotomy between popular or commercial cinema and "good cinema," is a recent phenomenon and has probably determined the formulae being churned out in both categories. When Shantaram and Guru Dutt made films, no one spoke about "art" cinema and "commercial" cinema. Today the two are sharply delienated, they stand apart on their own, each sneering at what the other upholds.

"There is no set formula for success, we have to keep on groping in the dark to find the right one. We are in business, we must succeed," says Kamal Barjatya of Rajshri productions, commenting on their last film Abodh which was a total flop, turning them in 1984 from feature film production to the TV. This kind of groping in the dark has resulted in producers and directors not willing to go outside tried and tested formulae for their films, rejecting others. The successful formula has come to rest on the 'cannot-miss-the-box-office' scores.

"Good" cinema on the other hand has never had an eye firmly fixed on the box-office. Writer-director Amit Khanna told SUNDAY in an interview. "It is only in India that filmmakers are thrilled to make films for ten critics. The kind of new wave that we are seeing has done more harm than popular Hindi cinema. To combat the values the latter upholds and propagates, the fight has to be from the main stream. A kind of phoneyfilm has been generated, with a few aiming at the Cannes festival, while the vast majority are obviously competing for the "cans" festival here. There are two avenues in the film industry today, the con shop and the pawn shop. If you don't make it in the con game, you obviously end in the pawn shop. Some guys fool the Director general in Delhi that they are making some kind of great art film, while the others 'con' some financier into parting with his money. The products range from a tedious eye sore, to probably, Daku Mangal Singh.

The need for experimentation in the art form has been related by some film-makers to complexity and obscurity. A charge levelled at

Jeetendra and Sri Devi in Suhagan

Malayalam filmmaker, Adoor Gopalakrishnan is that his growth is gradually acquiring the merit of obscurity.

Combined with these are the physical drawbacks. There is a gross inadequacy of exhibition outlets. There are at present seven seats per 1,000 persons available, as against the UNESCO norm of 30 per 1,000. The annual growth rate of theatre construction, which is four per cent is hardly going to catch up to any norm. Meanwhile,unviable land costs in urban areas and a low population base in rural areas where land is available at cheaper rates, have made theatre construction prohibitive, and made the video theatre a likely alternative.

The decay has set in where theatres are concerned. Film producers lament that people now prefer the comfortable alternative of their homes to a trip to the cinema theatre, especially when faced with the odds of finding parking space, booking in advance, having to put up with the constant failure of the air conditioning unit and terribly maintained lavatories. In Hyderabad alone, 28 cinema theatres have closed their doors for good, with losses piling up. The law in Maharashtra which prohibits the demolition of an existing theatre for an alternative residential or commercial premise, is the only reason why theatre owners in Bombay have not put the buildings to some other use.

So much so that even if cinema which has a 1.3 crore daily attendance succumbs to television which has a greater reach with a captive audience of about five crores, the scope for recovery would be limited. In America where a similar upheaval took place, cinema has managed to stabilise, what with an existing infrastructure of about 70,000 theatres—six times the number here. With this the fact that video and TV have become a reality has to be faced. If the print media said that the eighth Lok Sabha elections were won single-handed by an assassinated woman, TV had its say too. The image of Rajiv Gandhi lighting his mother's funeral pyre remained in most memories and brought in the "sympathy" vote.

On the brink of a media takeover, the Hindi film industry's situation looks far from happy. On an average, out of a hundred films that are made, 50 are never completed. Out of the 50 completed, 15 are never released. Out of the 35 remaining, 20 are washouts anddo not recover even the capital. From the 15 survivors,ten are commission earners, that is, they recover the capital and earn some interest. Five are hits.

In reality the numbers are less kind. In 1977 out of ten films, four made more than Rs one crore per territory—Amar Akbar Anthony, Dharam Veer, Hum Kisise Kum Nahin, and Parvarish. In 1985, only Pyar Jhukta Nahin falls into this category. In the previous year only Chota Chetan, the dubbed 3-D film fell into the above category, while Tohfa made half this amount per territory and Aaj ka Awaz, Ghar Ek Mandir, Purana Mandir and Yeh Hai Aurat, have done about Rs 30 to 35 lakhs business per territory. In 1984, of the 165 Hindi films made (270 Telugu films were made last year), only 118 were released according to censor board figures. Recovery of profits was 12.72 per cent, 30.51 per cent just managed to cover the cost of production, while the loss was in the range of 56.77 per cent.

Located all over the country are more than 30 film processing laboratories and 70 film studios which aid the capture of an audience of over 65 million per week, with the average budget of a Hindi film being Rs 60 lakhs and the average budget of a multistarrer stands at over Rs three crores. From producers, distributors, laboratory personnel and camera men to export-import units, permanent and touring cinemas, the film industry employs over 2,51,500 persons. In the industry, mainly because of its wider linguistic reach, Hindi films have played a prominent role. They have exported their star culture to other countries and served as ambassadors of goodwill. In the central Asian regions of the Soviet Union, every Indian is considered to be from Bombay and a relative of Raj Kapoor or Shashi Kapoor; for Dubai and the Gulf countries video films are mainly Hindi video films. According to one actor who had performed for the Indian troops, Indian music and films (especially Hindi) are appreciated by Pakistani soldiers and citizens alike and have probably served as the best ambassador. Though the Satyajit , Mani Kaul and other prominent exponents of good cinema are the only ones remembered by film critics and students abroad, it is strangely the mass entertainment commercial that has offered an Asian alternative to the glittering world of Hollywood.

What do the moghuls of mass entertainment have to say about their industry? Says Gulshan Rai, producer, distributor and president of the Indian Motion Picture Distributors' Association: "Today only five per cent of the films are running, 95 per cent are failures. All the average films of yesteryear have become failures today. How can the industry exist on 95 per cent failure? The fault is in the production system—selling stereotypes. There is a dearth of good writers and stories are not being written, they are rewritten. The industry is on the verge of closure. Over all inflation, the high rate of entertainment tax (the government does not understand that slashing tax rates will increase the theatre-going audience), video piracy and TV are the major contributory factors. I personally feel threatened and think daily that I should change my profession."

If you are a thief or a murderer you know you will be caught and punished. Not so the video pirate. He is not scared of the law. The government itself cannot understand video piracy, its seriousness and the loss of revenue through piracy. The other evils are the excise levy and the cost of prints. The levy was imposed several years ago by Morarji Desai, and still exists—four fold," said Prakash Mehra, producer and president of the Indian Motion Picture Producers Association, and added, "Look at the situation: Can you imagine the agony of a producer? We make a film costing Rs two or three crores, and a man enters the room with a cassette worth Rs 300, saying he has enjoyed it. It cost me Rs three crores to make the film. He is the owner at Rs 300. We have only an alternative: the entire film industry should close for an indefinite period for the government to realise our contribution. But as far as the industry is concerned, I think everything has a saturation point, and that point has come."'This year, except for Pyar Jukhta Nahin, Arjun and Tawaif, the rest have failed at the box office Previously even movies which were not good used to get first and second week audiences. Now they don't even get by one week. It is only in this country that video piracy is there for the asking, across the counter. It is blatant and operating with impunity. We have seen the chief minister about it. He has promised a special police cell and courts to be set up to try those guilty of piracy. To combat piracy, we are going to market videos of our film Saagar," said G.P Sippy, producer and president of the Film Federation of India, All India Film Producers Council and Producers Guild of India.

Kamal Barjatya of Rajshri Productions is of the opinion that "unless a picture runs for 28 shows, houseful, we have no chance. Theatre hire is 65 per cent of the houseful capacity. And these days pictures just don't run. We expected Sun Sajana to click. It didn't Rakta Bandhan also did not. Saaransh brought us prestige, tremendous prestige—that's all. Though it ran 15 weeks at Metro theatre, we had to pay a deficit of Rs 30,000 to the theatre. After Abodh flopped last August—we didn't even recover the theatre rentals—it was time to close.

The big question in the minds of the film industry's czars is now: What next? Will they be routed by Doordarshan and video? Was Doordarshan, hitherto dependent on them for entertainment by way of feature films and Chhaya Geet, now exploring new avenues with plans for specially made TV films and sponsored serials? While some are crying themselves hoarse about how video piracy has cheated them and television is bearing them, others are keeping a sharp eye on the future, and trying to find out how the new media and its reach can be exploited. As a result, 27 TV serials are already under production, most of them by well-known film personalities. Basu Chatterji is the creator of Rajni, while Sai Paranjpe has made Ados Pados. After Abodh flopped, Rajshri Productions which has more than 42 feature films to its credit, turned to TV with Paying Guest. Filmmaker Shridhar Kshirasagar's Khandaan which features celluloid stars Shreeram Lagoo, Tanuja and Girish Karnad, is a testimony to the appeal of TV.

"Television is a threat to their creativity," former director general of Doordarshan, Kamleshwar told SUNDAY, adding that filmmakers could not expect to monopolise the media: "A or B cannot remain the single son of the family. They have to accept the third child of the media—television. In a poor country like India, television is the only answer. Given the speed at which it can reach far corners of the country, TV will be a threat to all those filmmakers who sign stars, take the money, never complete their films, and disappear. The genuine filmmakers will continue to produce films." Kamleshwar is currently making a serial for Doordarshan on the navy called "Akash Ganga." Lintas, the advertising agency, has also invited eight film directors to consider a proposal to work on a serial they are planning.

How long the threat will last remains to be seen. Doordarshan may be reluctant to relinquish its upper hand, as it busily juggles around producers and their serials to accommodate them in what is fast becoming precious and expensive TV time. For instance, the two sponsors of the 23-minute serial Paying Guest, have to split Rs 35,000, the cost of two minutes of advertising in the serial. But the beginning of the era of sponsorship in India has also brought in the attendant evils. The sponsor dictates terms, often changing them to suit his own needs. For instance, in America the break-time for soccer and baseball have been dictated by the sponsor. The end of a baseball final is considered the most expensive advertising time on television. Why? It holds captive the largest adult male audience in the age group 19-49, who have the largest earning and spending capacity.

According to one media critic, sponsorship is the biggest and most pernicious evil of western TV. It is threatening the next Olympics at Seoul, South Korea, where one of the big three American networks will be sponsoring the Games. The condition, of course, is that some of the games are played at 3 am (Korean time) so that it reaches the prime-time American TV audience. The Greeks can sit back and lament about their days of athletic glory. Today, from sweat shirt to canvas shoes, the magic word is "sponsored." And the people who matter are the sponsor and the TV audience, not the athlete and the spectator in the stadium.

Whether inspired by foreign programmes, be it a Mexican soap opera (Humlog) or an American Dynasty (Khandaan), television in India has come a long way since AIR set up an experimental TV service in Delhi on 15 September 1959 with the help of UNESCO. Nothing very significant featured on it till the 70s, when the government woke up to the fact that television might have potential. In 1971 popular programmes were introduced to offset the tedium of the didactic and agrarian programmes. Site, the programme for rural India, introduced in 1975-76 was shortly succeeded by TV's independence from AIR on 1 April 1976. The same year commercials came into being and are fast becoming the sustenance of popular television.

No one, least of all probably the government, had imagined that the unfairly dubbed 'idiot box', would one day challenge the supremacy of the industry that produced the masala-for-the-masses films and that the latter would some day have to bow to the 'box' to gain access to people's living rooms. Whether this is fair or not, the only consolation for the movie-maker is the statement of Sherry Lancing of Columbia Pictures: "The theatre-going experience will never die out."

A person who unsuspectingly sits through one of the Hindi film industry's extravaganzas, and gets a headache, or collapses from the sheer horror of it all, might have the satisfaction of watching his tormentor, the Hindi filmmaker, get similarly horrified—at the mention of the video. If any single industry has cut into the big apple that filmdom was wont to monopolise, it is video. And the industry of the video pirates, with a Rs 1,000 crore annual turnover, has comfortably beaten the movie moghul.

A state wise survey at the end of 1984 indicated that the country had 10,000 video parlours, 40,000 video libraries, 12,000 video coaches, about 1,200 of which operate the Bombay-Goa route, 11,000 five and three star hotels showing videos. Maharashtra alone has about 4,000 video parlours. In Ahmednagar (Maharashtra), there are five theatres for a two lakh population and 40 video parlours! A raid by the Indian film industry's anti-video piracy organisation (AVPO) at Ahmednagar, resulted in the owner of Deepak Video Club, Vilas Dhend, being taken into custody. What the AVPO men found in his club was astonishing. The club had three underground chambers, two rooms at different levels and remote control VCRs which took almost two hours to find, according to Vikas Mohan, secretary of the AVPO. And the total seating capacity of the video complex, which is also equipped with a canteen, is 1,000.

The AVPO, which since its inception has carried out 307 raid in Bombay, Delhi, Goa, Ahmednagar, Srirampur and some other places, arresting 461 persons and seizing property worth Rs 2.5 crores, has merely touched the tip of the Rs 1,000 crore industry. Piracy has helped reduce film production by 55 per cent and the average loss due to piracy in every film is 59 per cent. The repeat audience of even successful films has been greatly reduced. Dharam aur Kanoon, Duniya, Ek Din Bahu Ka, Kanoon Kya Karega, Jawaani, Karishmaa, Mohan Joshi Haazir Ho, Papi Pet Ka Sawal Hai, Raaj Tilak, Aaj Ka MLA Ram Avtar, Aan Aur Shaan, Bhavna, Awaaz, Divorce, John Jani Janardhan, Maqsad, Sparsh are some of the films badly affected by video piracy.

But what exactly is the video industry? Has the magnetic tape humbled celluloid? The British Broadcasting Corporation first experimented with a machine called Vera-vision electronic recording apparatus—a technique for recording television programmes on magnetic tape. This was an improvement on the highly expensive method of storing programmes by filming productions from high quality monitors. The breakthrough came with the American Ampex VR 100, which recorded across a wider tape, than along it, and moving slowly. And now the video boom has taken the country by storm and threatened to shake up its cinema. It has overnight been elevated to the sanctity of one of the highest status symbols.

While producers and directors flounder and curse at what the illegal video is doing, the pirates thrive and have made it big on this industry. Dhirubhai Shah started three years ago as a provision store owner, delivering goods himself. He smelt the chance of big money in the video trade and turned towards it. Now he is worth more than Rs four crores. He has a unit installed at Rathan Jyoti Industrial Estate, Irla, and a retail shop called Modern Electronics at Vile Parle market. Padambhai Sethia, the owner of Video King at Kings circle, Nithin and Mahesh Thakur who run the trade under the guise of a wafer shop at Matunga and Balbir Singh, a Delhi-based offender who supplies video films to most parts of north India are among the 'video kings' according to AVPO.

The outlets from which the films get pirated have been identified. The Santa Cruz electronics exports processing zone (SEEPZ), where masters are made from the prints to be sent overseas, is one of the outlets, according to AVPO. While the master is being made, one or two prints which are entered as "rejects," are sent back to the pirates for circulation in the video circuits Due to the leakage from here, the pre-view facility inside the trade zone has been stopped.

SEEPZ has seven video units. Among them are MG Video, Esquire Video, Home Video, VGP, Spectra, Emca Video Pvt Ltd, which are allegedly a major source of supply to Dhirubhai Shah. After the arrest of the owner of Emca Video last month while attempting to smuggle out a print of Hum Do Hamara Do, the export of masters to foreign countries has been stopped from SEEPZ Now they are allowed to only send the VHS cassettes. When prints are being sent to the different theatres, copies are made on the way. Or in some cases theatres managers, watchmen and operators are bribed to allow pictures to be filmed after the late show ends at 12 O'clock.

As a result, while the video industry blooms, it is in the process killing the film industry in Bombay.

The Sippy Success Story

Lekha Dhar profiles the master entertainer

Sholay's monumental and somewhat outrageous success left its young director, Ramesh Sippy, at a point where any step is a comedown. The biggest blockbuster in the history of Indian cinema gave Sippy an aura, which his colleagues in the commercial film industry would give anything to acquire. Ten years after Sholay was made no film has come even remotely near it and judging the financial track record of current Hindi films, nor is any ever likely to challenge it. Even Sippy knows that he cannot repeat his own history.

Besides lifting Sippy to dizzy heights the film put him in a situation where he would not be expected to do anything less than Sholay. Sippy's subsequent ventures, Shaan and Shakti have been dismissed as anti-climaxes to his stupendous success story: if it is Ramesh Sippy's film the box office returns must be high. The observation is substantiated by the fact that despite being labelled "flops," Shaan and Shakti grossed as much as any other film termed a "hit." But then by Sholay's standards, a hit for other film makers, is a flop for Sippy.

" I started out as a commercial film-maker and I intend staying that way. Certain ingredients are essential when you think in terms of the box office. I would like to make more socially relevant films "
— Ramesh Sippy

The 41-year-old director is currently giving the final touches to his latest film, Saagar, which has already passed the censors sans demur. The fact that four of the most important members of the unit have not lived up to the expectations of film industry watchers has raised apprehensions about Saagar's box office performance. While Rishi Kapoor has failed to repeat his Bobby performances, Kamal Hassan is treading the tight rope after his grand entry into the Hindi film industry with Ek Duje Ke Liye, as his subsequent Hindi films have skydived. Javed Akhtar, always regarded as the better half of the film industry's most successful story-writing duo, has also found himself among moderate hits ever since he split with Salim. And Sippy, despite having dished out films which would normally be considered hits, continues to be haunted by Sholay's success. Basing their arguments on these facts, film-writers have described Saagar as the balance on which their collective future lies.

"After the film, whatever be its fate, neither is Javed, Ramesh Sippy, nor the rest of his unit going to be out of business. Javed will continue to write, Sippy will continue to make films and Kamal, Rishi and Dimple, act," said Sippy dismissing speculations about their "uncertain" future as idle gossip, in an interview with SUNDAY.

The hangover of Sholay's wild success continues to linger and his industry colleagues wonder whether Sippy will repeat history in Saagar Shaan and Shakti though endowed with unmistakable slickness of the Ramesh Sippy style, forced many to wonder whether Sholay was a freak and its director, lucky. But the reconsideration stems from the fact that being Ramesh Sippy, the industry does not expect anything short of a miracle from him. And even the over Rs one crore-per-territory earnings by Shaan and Shakti have not fitted the requirements of a miracle. Asked whether history is likely to repeat itself in Saagar or any of his future ventures, Sippy retorted, "I think history will have to decide that There can be no success like Sholay today with television and video bringing everything to the drawing room. The market as such does not show signs of taking in that kind of business."

Sippy concedes that after Sholay he has certainly come down,if his box office returns are any indication. "The box office receipts certainly show that I haven't touched the heights of Sholay. Have I tried to put in all the factors to make each film a box-office hit? Yes, certainly. But the result was that people just didn't lap it up—and theirs is the final verdict," says Sippy.

By his own admission, a slow and fussy worker, Sippy has taken nearly two years to complete Saagar. And many in the industry say, his fastidiousness has proved a hurdle for Dimple who was trying to stage a comeback after Bobby and a stormy relationship with the cranky superstar of yesteryear, Rajesh Khanna. To this observation Sippy says, "First of all when I make a film, it is the film that is important, and not me or anyone else connected with it. If my delay has caused her (Dimple) some problems, it is unfortunate. But I can say this, she did not cause any trouble with dates and schedules, because of domestic and other problems, as the gossipmongers speculate. It is because we felt that the film was not ready, certain scenes had to be re-shot and there was a six-month gap between the first two shooting stints. And mainly because I am a slow worker. These delays probably created problems for her."

Ramesh Sippy

When Dimple decided to return to films, she was looking out for a director who could successfully take off from where Bobby left her. Sippy's decision to cast Dimple in Saagar, at once caused industry-watchers to speculate that after all the trauma in the Khanna household there could not have been a better development for her. Soon she realised, or so insiders insist, that Sippy's slow pace was increasingly proving counter-productive for Dimple. That probably explains why she accepted the roles she did in Zakhmi Sher and Manzil Manzil. Both sank into disgraced oblivion. This might prove a disadvantage for Sippy's Saagar as the audience has already rejected the star of Bobby.

Apparently unruffled by such speculations, Sippy discloses his "overpowering urge" to break into socially relevant films. But then what of the box office, which swings him back to the former view? "I started out as a commercial film maker and I intend staying that way. Certain ingredients are essential when you think in terms of the box office. I would like to make more socially relevant films. But so far I have not been able to line up a project which would work on both levels—on a level which is commercially viable, and on the other hand, something more. In any case which film maker would not like to make socially relevant films? I have not put values into my films, the way they are needed, and this goes for Saagar too. My films deal with basic human emotions. If they are enabling, then the values will be present. But far from social relevance, I just make neat, clean, entertainment films," replied Sippy.

To a suggestion that he could surely divert some of his resources into making relevant films without bothering about the box office, Sippy says, "Honestly I would like to try that kind of film But somebody has to approach me with such a proposal." When asked whether he was trying to usher in a soft, romantic kind of film into the milieu of commercial potboilers, Sippy vehemently disagreed, "I prefer to make each film as different as possible. There is no romance formula or any formula as such. I started my career with Andaaz which was a romantic film. Seeta aur Geeta was followed by the action films Sholay, Shaan and Shakti.

Sippy does not try to pretend that his films convey any message. "Tell me, is there no room for anything which does not convey any message? After all there is something called entertainment. In the hinterland you have audiences who do not understand the language. All they want is a couple of songs, a dance sequence and fight scenes. Only recently I read an article about a village totally inhabited by hunchbacks. Their life is so miserable. Do you think they want their miseries depicted on celluloid, or do they want an escape from it?"

While acknowledging the relevance of films like Ardh Satya, Sippy defends gross exaggerations in typical Hindi films and the simplistic solutions that they come out with. He feels that even though such methods are scorned by the intelligentsia, "to carry the message to a huge audience they are the only effective way."

PUNJAB

ONE YEAR AFTER

What do the people of Punjab feel one year after Operation Bluestar? Is the memory of the bloody battle between the army and Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale still fresh in people's minds? Sanjeev Gaur feels the pulse of the state

Indira Gandhi fought her last excruciating battle in the Golden Temple, the holiest of Sikh shrines. Apparently, she won the battle; in reality, she lost. She succeeded in liquidating the militant Sikh phenomenon that was Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, who virtually ruled Punjab from his seat in the shrine, ordering killings. But Bhindranwale dead became infinitely more dangerous. Within five months of his removal, Indira Gandhi was gunned down on the lawns of her own house by two of her Sikh bodyguards who had secretly sworn to avenge Bhindranwale's death.

Now, a year after Operation Bluestar, which hurt every Sikh in India and abroad, the situation in Punjab has worsened. The army action in June last year which Mrs Gandhi had thought would mark the end of Sikh terrorism, misfired. As a Sikh intellectual observed, "Mrs Gandhi thought that by killing Bhindranwale, she would be able to crush terrorism in Punjab. But she did not realise that by sending the army into the Golden Temple to kill Bhindranwale, she would not only make him a martyr and a hero of the Sikhs but also create many Bhindranwales and make the entire Sikh community her bitter enemy. No Sikh can tolerate the desecration of the Harimandir Sahib and the Akal Takht."

The Sikhs have not forgotten Operation Bluestar. The wounds are still deep and fresh. Even a year after the bloody operation, the Golden Temple is not the same place. Pilgrims coming to the temple are more interested in knowing the details of the army action and seeing the bullet marks on the walls of the Harimandir Sahib. Today the majority of Sikhs refuse to accept the new Akal Takht, the highest seat of Sikh spiritual and temporal authority, which was badly damaged during the operation and rebuilt by the government under the supervision of the controversial Nihang leader Santa Singh. There has been a marked decline in the number of Sikh visitors to the Akal Takht Standing outside the Akal Takht along with her two colleagues, Aman Deep, a young doctor commented, "This is not our Akal Takht. It is not real. The government made it after first destroying it. Sikhs will have to demolish the government-built Akal Takht and rebuild their own Akal Takht." The Shiromani Gurdwara Prabhandhak Committee (SGPC), which looks after the Sikh gurdwaras, has already declared that the present Akal Takht would be demolished and rebuilt.

If Operation Bluestar had wounded the Sikhs, the community felt hurt again by the attitude of the army and the para-military forces during the mopping-up operations in Punjab villages which went on for more than two months after the June action. Official sources admit that the army arrested fewer terrorists and more innocent Sikhs during the mopping-up operations. The army indiscriminately raided Sikh houses in the villages, abused their family members and took into custody young people. Said a police officer, not wanting to be named for obvious reasons, "Sikhs in Punjab villages today hate the army. The reason is simple. After Operation Bluestar, the army really let loose a reign of terror. Go to any Punjab village and they will have those sad and tragic stories to narrate to you."

Surinder Pal shows Sant Longowal the burns he got from the anti-Sikh riots in Delhi

And then the government brought in Santa Singh, who is known as a stooge of the ruling party, to undertake to rebuild the Akal Takht. The Golden Temple was still under the control of the army and the other security forces. Messrs Longowal, Badal and Tohra, the Akali trio, were already in jail. The arrival of Santa Singh with his fauj (army) of Nihangs further hurt Sikh sentiment. The Sikhs were unable even to protest loudly. The controversial Nihang chief, excommunicated by the five Sikh high priests, stayed in the Golden Temple for about four months with the full support of the government and also received a lot of media attention. Of course, the government knew that the Sikhs were feeling deeply hurt.

Then came the anti-Sikh riots in November, after the dastardly murder of Mrs Gandhi by Beant Singh and Satwant Singh who "avenged" the attack on their holiest shrine. When approached to sum up the events in Punjab during the last one year, Pritpal Singh, a student of Amritsar Khalsa College and president of the Khalsa Students Union (KSU) said, "The desecration of the Akal Takht caused immense pain to Sikhs. But Operation Bluestar became a small thing when compared to the November riots which alienated the Sikhs from the national mainstream. Later the unprecedented victory of the ruling party in the Lok Sabha elections made Sikhs feel that the majority community had given its verdict in support of the brutal genocide of innocent Sikhs. I heard some saying in Amritsar that each vote cast in favour of the ruling party is a greeting card congratulating it for the massacre of Sikhs."

The Punjab problem looks much more complicated today than it was a year back. With the Akalis having said more than once now that Chandigarh and the river waters are not the basic issues any more, the Punjab tangle has now basically become a Sikh problem. The tragedy is that the issues have become so complex in this turbulent state that it is becoming difficult even for the Sikh intellectuals and the Punjab observers to identify them. Bhagsingh Ankhi, a Sikh intellectual who maintains close links with the Akali leadership moaned, "Both the government and the Akalis are to be blamed for the tragedy of Punjab. The government is insincere and the Akalis have no clear goals." Ankhi traced the genesis of the current Punjab problem to the age-old tussle between Zail Singh and Darbara Singh. He said, "Darbara Singh is the real villain. Why did he arrest Bhindranwale at Chowk Mehta when the government did not have sufficient evidence to charge him with the killing of Lala Jagat Narain? Why did Darbara Singh enact that drama for arresting Bhindranwale?" But Ankhi, who is also on the managing committee of the Khalsa College, Amritsar, sounded more angry with the Akali leadership. He elaborated, "They are always fighting among themselves. Each Akali leader will have his own demands. The Akali leadership failed in delivering the goods. They also failed during the negotiations with the government. They failed because they did not know what exactly they wanted." But the Sikh intellectual was more bitterly critical of the SGPC president Gurcharan Singh Tohra whom he described as the "man who has damaged the Sikh community the most." "Tohra," he went on, "is less religious and more ambitious. He wants to be supreme in Sikh politics. And he also wants to become the Punjab chief minister." But he does not spare Longowal and Badal either. He thinks that after their release from jail, both Longowal and Badal and even Tohra should have quit after taking moral responsibility for what had happened to the Sikhs over the last one year.

Ankhi holds both Longowal and Tohra responsible for the recent emergence of Baba Joginder Singh in Akali politics. "Why did both of them call on him again and again and ask him to forge unity in the party? I am sure they played some clever game in first building up Baba Joginder Singh and later retreating."

Today when a political solution to the Punjab tangle is nowhere in sight, terrorism and Hindu-Sikh tension in Punjab are much more serious problems for the government. Obviously, the June army action had failed to crush terrorism. In the days before Operation Bluestar, the government at least knew that Bhindranwale was masterminding the extremist activities and the terrorists would often take refuge in the Golden Temple. But today neither the Punjab government nor the centre seem to have any knowledge about the terrorists' organisation and the centre of its operations. Even the general public in the troubled state has now started taking the claims of the Punjab government about the arrests of "suspected terrorists" routinely with a pinch of salt. In the past few months, the terrorists have struck not only in Punjab but in the whole of northern India. Their transistor bombs shook Delhi. Hindus in Punjab are scared and absolutely demoralised about the rapid growth of terrorism Balbir Kapoor, a leading tea merchant in Amritsar felt "The government has proved weak in dealing with the terrorists. This is the popular Hindu feeling. They should be crushed with an iron hand."

The son of the late J.S. Bhindranwale

Sikhs on the other hand are agitated about the frequent deaths of Sikh youths either in police encounters or during interrogation. An activist of the Punjab unit of the association for democratic rights (AFDR) told SUNDAY "The mala fide of the government is evident from the recent cases of mysterious deaths of Sikh youths in police custody. Here the case of Gurinder Singh who was captured by the police with minor injuries in a police encounter and died two days later with multiple injuries in Chandigarh's Post Graduate Institute of Medicine is a typical victim of police brutality. Gurinder, it is well-known now, had links with the PCC(I) president Santokh Singh Randhawa. That is why he was killed. Such incidents are causing more injury to the Sikh community at large and they are feeling disillusioned with the state day by day."

After terrorism, it is the communal tension which is worrying the government the most in Punjab today. Curfew had to be clamped in Dhariwal, Gurudaspur, Hoshiarpur and Ludhiana following the Hindu-Sikh clashes after incidents of terrorism in these important towns of Punjab during the last one month. Comrade Hazara Singh Jassar, a prominent CPI(M) leader of Amritsar said, "Both Hindus and Sikhs in Punjab want peace. They are fed up both with the government as well as the Akalis. But it is a sad reality that the two communities are drifting away from each other." But the RSS activist Shyam Sunder Bhatia, younger brother of the AICC(I) general secretary Raghunandan Lal Bhatia on whose life an attempt was made by terrorists, feels that though a wedge between Hindus and Sikhs has been created, it is an artificial one. The younger Bhatia, an industrialist, is still hopeful that peace can return to Punjab and the Punjab problem can be solved. He said, "First Rajiv must give his verdict on the basic Akali demands like the Chandigarh and the river waters. He should make an unilateral announcement (on these issues). And then with a firm hand, he should handle the terrorists in Punjab." Dr Baldev Parkash, president of the Punjab unit of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), too, does not sound pessimistic today about the Punjab problem.

He feels that the situation in Punjab has improved since Operation Bluestar. He remarked, "The few months before the army action in the Golden Temple were sheer terror, especially for the Hindus of Punjab. Daily they (terrorists) were killing on an average 20 people in the state. But now things are not that bad. Of course, things are not normal as yet but they are certainly better than the pre-Operation Bluestar day." The BJP leader also thinks that the wedge between the Hindus and Sikhs, too, will disappear as soon as a solution is found to the 'continuing Punjab tangle'.

But is a solution in sight? Ankhi sums up the situation aptly enough: "The Akalis must now realise that all problems are ultimately solved through negotiations. They can't continue on the path of confrontation. The government should also show its sincerity in solving this problem now. If Rajiv sincerely feels that Sikhs are the soul of India as he said in one of his statements recently then he should treat Sikhs psychologically and not with force."

The Kharak Singh Factor

The union agriculture minister Buta Singh is his great devotee. All the Akali leaders bow before him. Even the militant Sikh leader Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale always followed his commands. Baba Kharak Singh (91) is perhaps the most revered Sikh saint in the country. Said Kharak Singh, "I don't have a home. I don't belong to any village. I have no relatives." He has now been entrusted with the task of kar seva for the rebuilding of the Akal Takht—the highest seat of both spiritual and temporal authority of the Sikhs within the Golden Temple complex.

When approached for comments about undertaking the kar seva for the rebuilding of the Akal Takht, Baba Kharak Singh told SUNDAY, "I don't believe in demolishing buildings. It does not matter to me whether the government constructs a building or some one else does. I only believe in making new buildings. But if the Akal Takht has not been built with good material and the workmanship has been poor, and if the entire Sikh sangat asks me to rebuild the holy place, I will certainly do so." Kharak Singh, considered a totally detached person, avoids meeting the press. Explains Comrade Mota Singh, trusted follower of the Sikh saint, "Babaji does not want to be in any type of controversy. That is why he does not want to be in the news. All his life, he has devoted himself to building gurdwaras, buildings and roads. He is respected by one and all for his selfless service for the cause of humanity."

Kharak Singh is originally from a village near Lahore and has also served in the army which he joined as a carpenter. "I belonged to a poor family. Hence I could not even get married. Who would have agreed to marry a poor man like me," he said. Kharak Singh, according to sources close to him, unlike the Akali leaders and the SGPC officials including the Sikh body chief Gurcharan Singh Tohra, did not mind the Akal Takht being rebuilt by the government after the sacred Sikh shrine was badly damaged during Operation Bluestar. He stays in a dera, opposite Shaheedan Da Gurudwara on the outskirts of the holy city but has yet to visit the Akal Takht after its reconstruction by the government after the June army action in the Golden Temple. According to Dr Joginder Kairon, Sikh scholar and biographer of Kharak Singh, "Babaji has only two objections about the rebuilding of the Akal Takht by the government. He feels that poor quality material was used and that the workmanship has also been poor."

Kharak Singh, who undertook the kar seva of the Golden Temple sarovar after the Harimandir was finally handed over to the SGPC authorities on 1 October last by the government, is not sure when he would begin the kar seva for the rebuilding. He bluntly told SUNDAY "Let them (the Akali leaders and the SGPC officials) decide. Let the Sikh sangat be called and the verdict sought. I have nothing to do as regards fixing the date." A top SGPC source, however, disclosed that kar seva for the rebuilding of the Akal Takht, earlier expected to start in the first week of June to mark the first anniversary of Operation Bluestar has been postponed till either the end of September or the beginning of October. He said, "The Akalis today are too busy fighting among themselves. Their internal crisis is deep. Even Tohra, the SGPC chief, is fully involved in the battle between the hawks and doves in the Akali Dal. So they have no time to think about and finalise the date for starting the kar seva at least in the near future."

Incidentally, it was Tohra himself who decided to entrust the kar seva for rebuilding the Akal Takht to Kharak Singh. The SGPC president has written a letter to the Sikh saint in this regard. Punjab-watchers feel that Tohra picked the best man for the controversial job. Baba Kharak Singh is himself the most non-controversial person and is universally accepted by the Sikhs. He does not belong to any group or party.

Informed Golden Temple sources claim that the extremist lobby in the Akali Dal tried its best to get the kar seva of the Akal Takht entrusted to Baba Joginder Singh, father of Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale and currently the acting convener of the ad-hoc committee of the "United" Akali Dal but failed. Tohra had consulted Baba Joginder Singh before announcing Kharak Singh's name. Obviously even Bhindranwale's father could not object to Kharak Singh's choice since that would have clearly amounted to inviting the wrath of the Sikh community.

"A True Sikh Never Commits Atrocities"

Baba Joginder Singh told SUNDAY

Q: Tell us about your past.

A: I was born in Rode village (Faridkot district) around 1910. When I was seven my father died At the age of 11 or 12 I began learning the "path" of Guru Granth Sahib under the guidance of Sant Kripal Singh. Since then I have become a religious man.

Q: Why did you form the nine member ad-hoc committee?

A: For the unity of the panth

Q: Was there no unity in the panth?

A: The Akali Dal had different factions and that was the main reason for the differences among them. So, to weed out such differences I decided to form the new ad-hoc committee which can run the affairs of the Akali Dal.

Q: When did you decide to form this committee?

A: Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and Jathedar Jagdev Singh Talwandi met me separately at my residence in Rode after their release from jail. They gave me details of their arrest, atrocities on the Sikhs and asked my advice on how to run the affairs of the Sikh panth. I gave them the advice not to indulge in factionalism and told them to do something fruitful for the panth. Both of them orally agreed that whatever decision I take for panthic unity will be acceptable to them. Later, both of them met my son Jagjit Singh Rode in jail and gave him in writing (which was addressed to me), that my decision for the unity of the panth will be acceptable to them. It was clear that I was given the responsibility for the unity of the panth and after a lot of thinking I formed the new ad-hoc committee.

Q: Who helped you in the formation of the ad-hoc committee?

A: Vahe Guru (God).

Q: There are very few political leaders in your committee. Why?

A: For us politics and religion are the same.

Q: Why have you included people like Simranjit Singh Mann, Harinder Singh and Gurtej Singh in your committee? They do not have any political background?

A: Because they are highly educated people and they have made sacrifices for the panth.

Q: Last year after Operation Bluestar, the Sikh masses were leaderless because all the top Akali leaders were under arrest. At that time why did you not come forward to lead the Sikh masses?

A At that time the ad-hoc committee of the Akali Dal was running the affairs of the party and it was not necessary for me to come forward.

Q: But now Akali leaders like Sant Longowal, Badal and Talwandi have already been released What was the necessity of forming such a committee?

A: I have formed the committee, because these leaders themselves wanted it.

Q: Now that you have formed the committee for panthic unity and Sant Longowal, Badal and Tohra have dissociated themselves from the committee, how do you explain that the new committee is meant for panthic unity?

A: Go and ask these leaders, do not ask me. I nominated them as members of the committee for the panthic unity.

Q: From your nine-member committee these three leaders have dissociated themselves, four others are either in jail or in a foreign country or underground. Only you and your son (Jagjit Singh Rode) are left along with Inderjit Singh Sekhon, general secretary of the committee. How do you plan to run the committee?

A: I have not dropped anyone from the committee My committee is complete.

Q: But what about the four members who are not present?

A: We have appointed others in place of them till their arrival.

Q. Suppose the government wants to talk to Akali leaders for the settlement of the Punjab problem, who will then talk to the government on behalf of the Akalis?

A: If the government comes to us and asks our advice then we will talk to the government directly.

Q: If Sant Longowal continues as president of the Akali Dal (Longowal) then how do you explain the unity of the panth?

A: He has already given it to me in writing that my decision will be acceptable to him. I have formed the committee to run the affairs of the Akali Dal. Beyond this I do not have to say anything The rest you can ask Sant Longowal.

Q: Agreed. Both Sant Longowal and Jathedar Talwandi gave you such a commitment in writing but Talwandi put a condition that Sant Longowal should not become the head of the new committee. Do you consider both of them to be equal?

A: For me both are equal, and both have been appointed members of the committee.

Q: What is your opinion on Hindu-Sikh unity?

A: I have to say only one thing, "Nanak naam chadhati kala, tere panay sarbat da pala." A true Sikh never commits any atrocities on any one, but at the same time they never tolerate any atrocities on their religion.

Q: In your opinion what is the Punjab problem?

A: The government committed a lot of atrocities on Sikhs, our holy Granths had been burnt, the Akal Takht was destroyed, innocents have been killed and Sikh youths have been tortured. As I told you earlier, Sikhs never tolerate any atrocities on their religion.

Q: It has been said many times by Sikh and Akali leaders that the confidence of the Sikhs has been shattered after Operation Bluestar and later after the Delhi riots. How can the Sikhs overcome this?

A: Sikhs never commit any atrocities on anyone but we will not tolerate any atrocities on our religion. I will say a Sikh should be a true Sikh, a Hindu and a Muslim should also be true to their religions.

The Koran's Attitude to Non-Muslims

By Dr Rafiq Zakaria

What is the attitude of the Koran, the holy book of the Muslims, towards non-Muslims? The question has assumed importance because of a recent petition filed in the Calcutta High Court, seeking to ban the Koran on the ground that it preaches hostility against the followers of other faiths. The petition was dismissed by Mr Justice Basak as it was "totally without merits."

In going through some of the paras of the petition, which Sunday (19-25 May) published, I find that certain verses from the Koran have been cleverly taken out of their context and shown as if it advocated enmity towards the Christians, the Jews, the pagans, etc. These verses, torn out of their historical background, can create this impression, particularly that the Koran preaches violence against the non-Muslims. Hence a proper understanding of their contents and the contexts is necessary; it will remove the cobwebs and clear the air.

In the first place the Koran is not like any other religious book; its contents comprise not only moral and jurisdical injunctions but also historical narratives and references to various happenings in the Prophet's life. There are many verses, which cannot be understood without the facts and circumstances of the time, when these were revealed. Their correct interpretation became the object of a special branch of learning—tafsir or Koranic exegesis as it was called. The commentators relied on Hadith or Traditions of the Prophet, in order to interpret correctly its meaning with reference to the circumstances of the Koranic verses. The task was strenuous, which the Ulema undertook with great care; tafsir, therefore, acquired the status of science and scholars spent a life-time in unearthing their proper import, finding out the roots, idioms and usages and relating them to customs and events of the times. Maulana Azad, for instance, devoted more than two decades of his life in writing his Commentary, which then too remained incomplete. He completed only 23 surahs out of 30.

Moreover, the Koran cannot be translated; as Prof. H.A.R. Gibb points out, "The very qualities which give it its literary distinction render it impossible to translate with any success into another language, and Islamic orthodoxy wisely discountenances any attempt to do so. The vigour and intensity of its language becomes vapid, the grammatical forms lose their subtle implications, the arresting rhetorical constructions become shapeless, and little is left but a seemingly confused and repetitious compilation, loosely strung together without life or artistry." Hence the Koran has to be read in Arabic if it is to be correctly understood.

The attitude of the Koran towards the followers of all other faiths is of respect. In fact it recognises all the other prophets, known and unknown, and declares that there is no land to which God did not send a prophet. Moreover, it is clearly enjoined on the Muslims that they should make no distinction between them; nor should they be the judges of what men do in this world because that is the exclusive domain of Allah.

The attitude of the Koran towards the followers of all other faiths is of respect; in fact it recognises all the other prophets, known or unknown, and declares that there is no land to which God did not send a prophet (35:32). Moreover, it is clearly enjoined on the Muslims that they should make no distinction between them (4:149); nor should they be the judges of what men do in this world because that is an exclusive domain of Allah: "The judgment is of only Allah's. He knows the truth and he is the best of deciders" (6:57). But the Koran is uncompromising in its attitude to two categories of people. One, Kafirs, or disbelievers in the montheism of Allah, and two, Mushriks, those who associate others with Allah. Belief in the unity of Allah is, therefore, cardinal to Islam; it is the pivot of its faith. Hence atheism is the eternal foe of Islam and has to be fought unto the last.

The Hindus, who confuse themselves with the pagans of pre-Islamic Arabia, believe in a supreme being: hence many Ulemas have opined that they cannot be considered as Kafirs, nor even Mushriks, as Iqbal has said. On the contrary Christians, who associate Christ with God, as His son can be termed Mushriks, though they have been described in the Koran as "People of the Book." Hence the declarations to fight the Kafirs and Mushriks are meant against the disbelievers in God, whoever they be, including the hypocrites among the Muslims, and not against believers in God, whatever be their denominations. The crucial test is: Belief in the oneness of God and good deeds or amalus saleh.

Let us understand some of the Koranic verses, upon which the petitioners sought to rely.

Their translation of Ayat 193 in surah 2 is incorrect; the correct translation, as translated by Allama Abdulla Yusuf Ali, whose translation is universally accepted as authentic, is as follows:

And fight them on Until there is no more
Tumult or oppression,
And there prevail
Justice and faith in God.
But if they cease,
Let there be no hostility
Except to those Who practise oppression.

Another verse, badly translated by the petitioners (2:216) is:

Fighting is prescribed
For you, and ye dislike it
But it is possible
That ye dislike a thing
Which is good for you,
And that ye love a thing
Which is bad for you.
But God knoweth,
And ye know not.

It is a call to fight in the cause of truth and there is nothing nobler than it; but the following verse (9:5) has a historical background, when the pagans from Mecca were plotting to kill Prophet Muhammed and his followers:

When the sacred months are over
Slay the idolaters, wherever you find them.
Arrest them. Besiege them. And lie in ambush
Everywhere for them.

But there is immediately the caution, in the same verse, which the petitioners have conveniently omitted:

If they repent and take to prayer and pay the alms-tax
Let them go their way.
For Allah is Forgiving and Merciful.

Likewise Ayat 28 in surah 8 is wrongly translated; it calls upon the believers "not to betray Allah and the Apostle" and to remember "how the unbelievers plotted against you and sought to take you captive or have you killed or banished."

In surah 22 Ayat 19 to 22, which the petitioners have distorted, the fight is between the two antagonists, who are called by Allama Abdullah Yusuf Ali as "Men of Faith, who confess their Lord and seek to carry out His Will and Men, who deny their Lord and defy His Will." Indeed, all through the Koran, the emphasis is on this fight: between believers in God and disbelievers—people of God and atheists. The punishment for the disbelievers is graphically described. Has Krishna not told Arjuna not to hesitate in killing his nearest kith and kin in the cause of truth, which is God?

The Ayats 4 to 15 in surah 47 are clearly directions to the believers on how they should conduct themselves when engaged in a war; these have a historical background and were revealed under certain circumstances. They have no universal application, much less against non-Muslims, who have no quarrels with the Muslims. In surah 98 Ayat 6, the reference is to "disbelievers among the People of the Book and the Polytheists"; not to the believers in God among them The disbelievers will, of course, dwell in hell; there is no compromise on that count. But believers are not only Muslims but all those who accept the unity of God and do good deeds. As Maulana Azad in his commentary on the Koran has explained, "The Koran states that the differences which exist between one religion and another are not differences in Din, the basic provision, but in the manner of giving effect to it, or in the Shara and Minhai, not in the spirit of religion, but in its outward form." In support of this, the Maulana quotes the following Koranic injunction to the Prophet, "To every people have we appointed ways of worship which they observe. Therefore, let them not dispute this matter with thee" (22:66). The test is clearly laid down: "For each of you We prescribed a clear spiritual Law and a manifest way in secular matters. And if Allah had willed, He would have you all one people, but He wishes to try you by that which He has given to each. Vie, then, with one another in good deed" (5:48). How to go about it is also prescribed: "With wisdom and reason and wholesome preaching" (16:125); and not by "defamation or insult of others." (49:11).

CYCLONE!

On the night of 24 May, a devastating cyclone lashed the coastal areas of Bangladesh, leaving 25,000 dead, 30,000 missing and countless orphaned, uprooted and desperate for food, water and medicines. Syed Kamaluddin reports on one of the country's worst tragedies. Photographs are by Aloke Mitra

Gruelling poverty an hardship along with famin floods, pestilence and di ease together conspire t torture the villager in Banglades with savage blows. One such was th devastating nocturnal cyclone tha hit the country's southern coast on 2 May, leaving 25,000 dead, 30,00 missing, the whole island of Sandwi nearly wiped out and a staggering 2 lakh severely affected. Authorities i Bangladesh fear that the 30,000 wh were reported missing might hav been washed away by the four-and-a half metre high tidal waves tha lashed the coastal areas in the wor disaster the country has known sinc the cyclone of 1970 which killed fiv lakh people And it was only on 2 May that the Bangladesh goverı ment started getting an idea of th extent of the tragedy. Hunger, confu sion and the fear of epidemics gri ped the country as estimates of th death toll went higher and higher

An inoculation programme wa chalked out Typhoid and tetanu were considered major threats. I Urirchar, health officials used a sing le needle to inoculate about 30 persons, while the bloated bodies o children lay in the background. Eve hygiene became a luxury: "You can not change the needle," a healtl official said. "We cannot afford it God will give them (the people) re sistance "

The cyclone spared no one alon its trail. The worst affected were th islands of Pirbaksh, where 10,00 died, Urirchar, where 7,000 to 8,00 died, the Noakhali district, where 3,000 lost their lives and the inhabi tants of the island of Sandwip which was almost blotted out of existence Over 1,000 fishermen are also pre sumed to have died. The mainlanc areas were however saved by a time ly warning of the depression tha built up off the coast around 2 pm or the fateful day. Later when the storm was spotted about 40 kms south o the coastline, a second warning wa issued. But people in the villages ir the coastal areas remained in the dark. In Urirchar, a new island where thousands of people had taken shel ter to flee from Sandwip, nearly every family was uprooted. Nobody seemed to have any idea of the island's population before the gale struck. After the cyclone, it was 500 and carcasses still floating in certain areas even seven days after the cyclone was over. Reports from the affected areas say that only few decomposed human bodies are now seen but a large number of stinking carcasses lay strewn in more than one place, causing a major health problem. Chemicals were needed to treat these carcasses.

President Ershad cancelled his weeklong state visit to China on 29 May to personally supervise the relief operation. Newsmen returning from Urir Char on the afternoon of 31 May told SUNDAY that they could see the electrifying impact the President's stay in the island had on the people. It galvanised the otherwise shocked and frustrated survivors into action.

As the weather cleared, ships began picking up survivors from the Bay of Bengal. But there were still hundreds in the sea who could not be rescued. According to the government, at least ten fishing boats with 80 people were reported missing, but a statement issued by a fisherman's association claimed that as many as 500 boats with over 2,000 crew members were at sea when the cyclone struck. Officials claimed to have rescued about 4,000 people from the sea.

Rescue workers who reached the island of Urir Char on 27 May found 1,500 survivors cowering in a building that had withstood the violent storm. The Air Force and the Navy had mounted a massive rescue and relief operation and begun dropping cans of drinking water for survivors in remote areas. Naval vessels and other boats picked up hundreds of people from the sea and took them to hospitals, and also ferried food and other emergency supplies to the victims. But relief measures and medicine supplies were far from adequate. The government machinery, both civil and military, was overworked. No one seemed prepared to handle an operation of such a scale. Helicopters engaged in relief work went also overburdened. The affected areas, including Urir Char, were still without drinking water. Survivors were asking for food (preferably cooked), match boxes, kerosene oil and fuel. The people are in need of building material, too. Relief agencies provided them with corrugated iron sheets but these were of little use without other materials like wires, nails, etc.

Thousands were crowded into relief camps, roughed it out in the open sea, used mangroves as temporary shelters. The opposition in Bangladesh accused the administration of not properly warning the people about the approaching cyclone. The facts, however, are different. Forty-eight hours before the storm lashed the coastal belt, Radio Bangladesh had broadcast special hourly bulletins on the danger. Diarrhoea and other diseases have broken out in a number of relief camps, already claiming nearly 100 lives. The places affected by the diseases include Urir Char, Sonagazi, Companygunj, Nabagram, Char Gangchil, Char Clarke and Sandwip

On 28 May, international aid began flowing into the shattered nation. Neighbouring India rushed medical and food supplies, as the USA made 65,000 dollars immediately available to the relief effort. The Indian Red Cross Society offered 1.2 million takas for the reconstruction of damaged houses, and the British government 50,000 pounds as emergency relief.

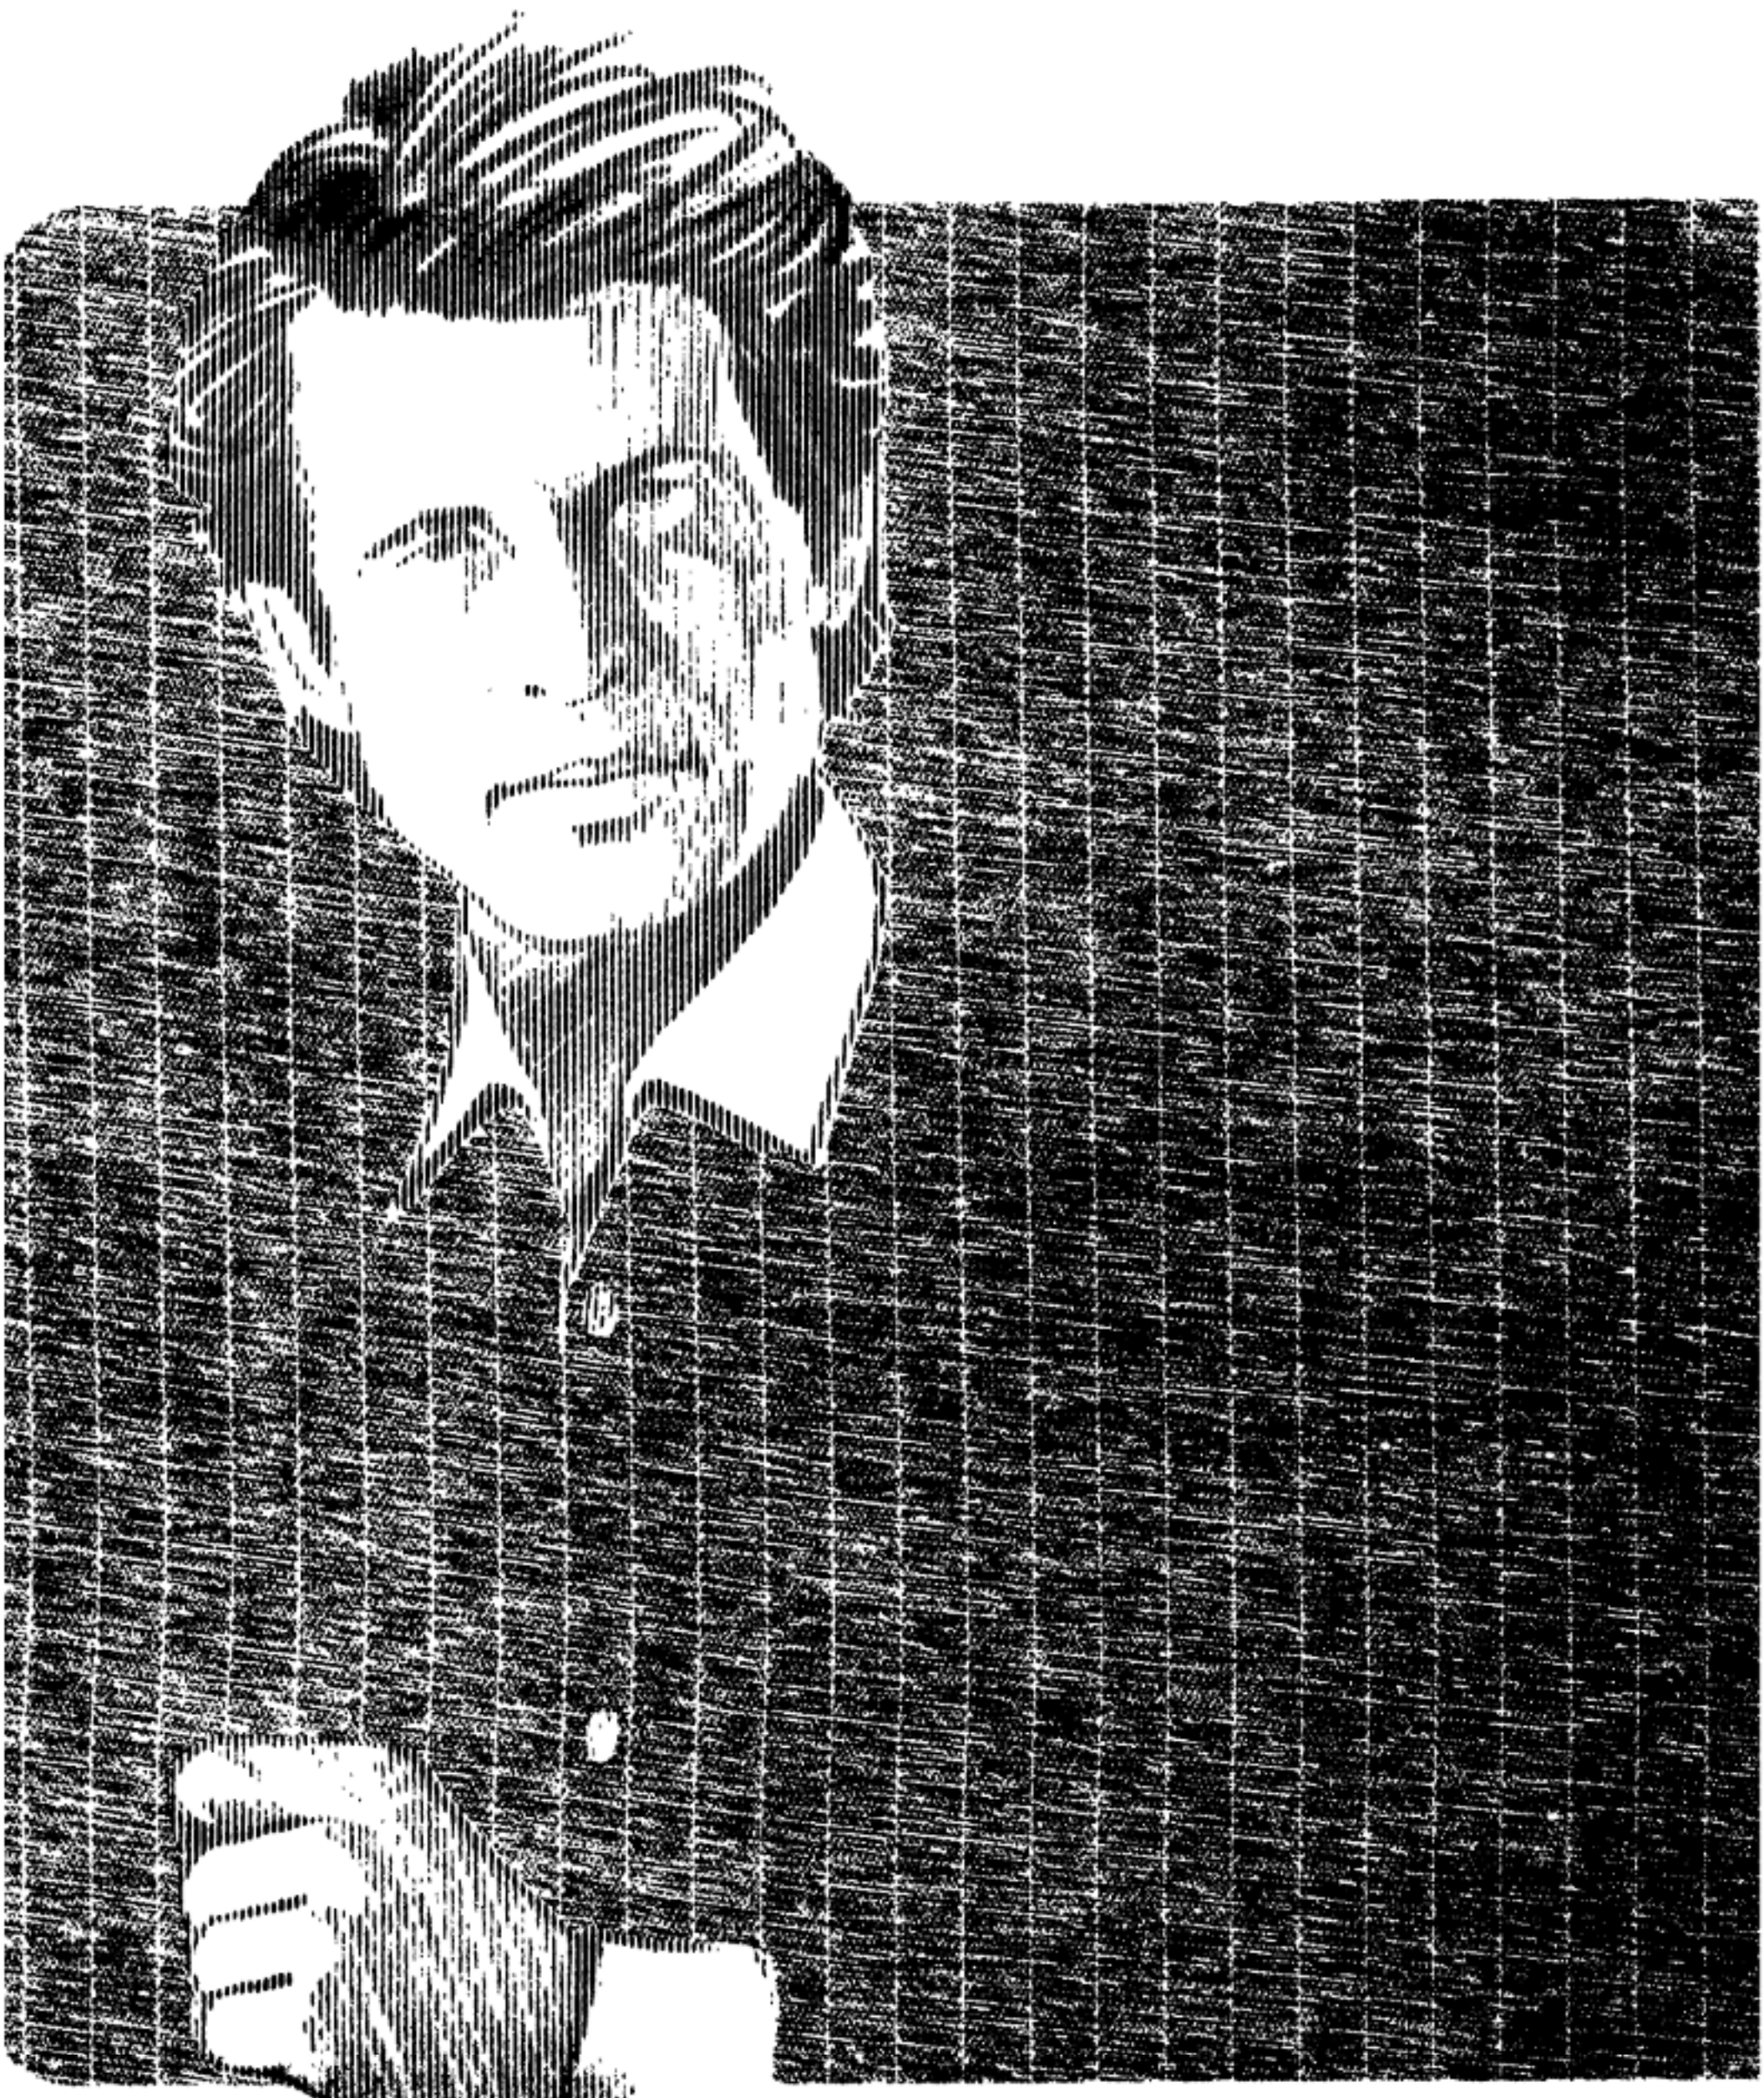
QUEST

Suzuki's quest for the ultimate has brought them to where they are today. They go to any length to get the right component to make the perfect product.

So now, when Suzuki are collaborating with Maruti, it cannot be just any battery for their car. It has to be specially designed to meet exacting performance standards in relation to weight, be failsafe, provide optimum starting performance and last the longest.

Exide is the only battery that comes through with flying colours. With their technical expertise backed by their experience of Indian conditions, Chloride, makers of Exide, have developed a special battery that not only matches exacting international standards, but also stands up to the tough operating conditions in India.

With the Maruti-Suzuki on the roads for over a year, Exide has justified the faith placed in it.



Soon others will follow suit. Such as DCM-Toyota, Swaraj-Mazda and Mahindra Peugeot, to name just a few. In every case they have specified Exide.

Ask them about Exide. They will tell you that Exide batteries are the best.

Kite-flying in Japan is more than a pastime. It symbolises man reaching out for the stars in his eternal quest for the ultimate.

Have Banks Lost Rs 10 Crores in 45 Days?

The RBI's innovative scheme to raise the interest rate on new deposits misfires

For seven glorious weeks, it was boom time for the domestic bank depositor. In a circular dated 6 April, the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) decided "in the public interest," to raise substantially the interest on deposits. In what was described as an "innovative experiment in competitive banking," the RBI stipulated a maximum ceiling of eight per cent as the interest rate on new deposits. Short term deposits ranging from 15 days to 364 days could now attract eight per cent interest, as against the previous three per cent (for 15 to 45 days), four per cent (for 46 to 90 days) and 6.5 per cent (for 91 days to 6 months). In a bid to mop up excessive liquidity, the RBI inaugurated this scheme in its golden jubilee year, in the hope that competitiveness among banks and cost efficiency would increase.

Surprisingly, however, the scheme was withdrawn 45 days later, leaving a large number of banks bewildered as to what the RBI was really up to. That banks were acutely worried about their profitability under the 6 April scheme, was evident. The Indian Banks Association (IBA), the apex body for the industry, indeed made it clear that the eight per cent ceiling on interest rates would certainly be detrimental to most banks, especially the public sector banks already operating on shoestring profits in India. In fact, since the RBI had only recommended an outer limit of 8 per cent, the IBA, at a meeting on 8 April of its 85 members, stipulated that a uniform interest rate should be followed—that is one per cent higher than the existing rate but lower than the outer limit of eight per cent as recommended by the RBI. This was done to "ensure that no deposit is lost to the bank for reasons like another scheduled bank giving a higher rate than what had been suggested by the IBA." The message was loud and clear—no infighting among the member banks which would lead to deposit grabbing.

But this was a message few banks did not want listen to. Some banks like the bank of Madurai Private Limited and Bank of America, while not contravening IBA's decision directly, began to advertise the new RBI rates. Advertisements announced the eight per cent rate applicable for any period, from 15 to 364 days. Since the IBA ruling on deposits over six months was also eight per cent, these advertisements 'conformed' through back-door methods to the IBA regulation. Said a foreign banker, "The IBA is not a statutory body. It's the RBI and the finance ministry which make the laws. We were playing by the rules and we wanted to attract new deposits. What's wrong with that?" Nothing, except that it left a lot of other member banks of the IBA discontented. Concurs J.S Varshneya, chairman, Punjab National Bank, "This strategy increased the nervousness among the other banks as it was thought that diversion of deposits would result." Concornered, the IBA ultimately decided towards the end of April that the rate of eight per cent would be equally applicable to all its members.

Unfortunately, what the RBI failed to see was that this new interest rate instead of attracting new deposits and mopping up the excessive liquidity in circulation, would merely result in the wholesale transfer of current and saving accounts into short term deposits. Effectively, this meant that a bank would be paying a higher rate of interest on the capital already available with it. A spokesman of the Punjab and Sind Bank admitted that over 80 per cent of the deposits under this innovative scheme were from old accounts. "We were forced to shift them to new deposits otherwise we would have lost a lot of valuable customers," he said.

A rough calculation made by Punjab National Bank, the leading bank of the IBA in Delhi, estimated that of the total Rs 75,000 crores deposited in banks, over 15 per cent, that is Rs 15,000 crores was in the form of current accounts, on which no interest is paid. Even if there was a conservative 10 per cent diversion, over Rs 120 crores would have to be paid as interest alone on eight per cent. Whereas, even if 20 per cent of the Rs 12,000 crores present in savings account was diverted to 15-day deposits, it would have amounted to a payment of Rs 45 crores as interest. Normally, a five per cent interest on savings account is calculated twice a year, on the minimum balance in an account, from the 10th to the 31st of any given month. It was also estimated that if deposits of maturities up to a year would be transferred into 15-day accounts at compound interest rates, it would mean another Rs 20 to 25 crores, as interest paymemt. Admits a representative of Banque Nationale de Paris, "It was a cruel joke to play on the banks." A spokesman from the RBI countered: "Reverting to lower interest rates on short term deposits at eight per cent from long term deposits accruing nine to 11 per cent would have meant a saving of over Rs 70 crores. Plus the banks would have a lot of funds at their disposal." But indications from most banks point out that they would have ultimately paid a whopping Rs 250 crores as interest alone. Even if a Rs 70 crore savings was made, the estimated loss of Rs 180 crores would have wiped out the profits of the industry, whch in 1983-84 stood at over Rs 110 crores. Given these statistics there was no option for the RBI except to revoke the scheme.

Explained Bimal Jalan, secretary, banking, and now chief economic adviser to the Prime Minister, "The scheme did not work and it was better that it was revised than not having been revised at all. I regard the recent decision of the RBI as a courageous act." But nevertheless, the RBI was perfectly aware of the limitations under which Indian banks operate. The earning capacity of banks is limited by the compulsory, statutory liquidity ratio (SLR) and the cash reserve ratio (CRR) and the rates of interest imposed by the RBI. In addition, public sector banks are forced to lend to socially preferred categories, further reducing their profitability. Moreover, the RBI is not ignorant of the fact that over a fifth of the resources of Indian banks, particularly public sector banks, is used for commercial lendings at commercial rates of interest.

In all fairness, it must be pointed out that the RBI proceeded on a sound principle. After all, abroad short term loans have proved to be immensely successful. Agrees Jalan, "It would only be natural that most people would favour liquidity rather than tying down their capital in fixed deposits for years. It is unfortunate that this scheme did not work in this way." The RBI in its 8 April statement had "hoped that individual banks would so fix the rates as to safeguard the current and savings account and simultaneously bring about a better portfolio management." Obviously, the RBI recognised the need to restructure interest rates, especially in the face of spiralling interest being offered by companies, secured debentures and other financial assets. Moreover, there has been an escalation of banking funds available in the call-money-market—a fact that the RBI well recognised. Banks like the State Bank of India and a few other banks, have enough funds to circulate in the inter-bank-money market, which they can lend out at 10 per cent interest. Thus, for banks which are chronic borrowers from the call money market, it made sound economic sense to utlise the RBI rules and pay a lower interest at eight per cent.

The Reserve Bank of India, Delhi

It was, therefore, not surprising that some banks splashed advertisements soliciting new deposits. Indeed, some foreign banks stipulated within the confines of their offices a minimum deposit of Rs 10,000 before opening new accounts. Says a highly placed official from PNB, "These foreign banks want to do as little as possible and earn profits as much as possible." Nevertheless, some banks realised that this scheme was not going to last and added a 'subject to change' in fine print, in case the regulations changed.

And change they did. Even as SBI and other banks prominently advertised the new rate across the pages of major dailies, the RBI, issued a press note slashing down the rates. Effective from 27 May, the RBI's new directive fixed the rate at three per cent for maturities of 15 to 45 days and four per cent for maturities of 46 to 90 days (thus making these rates lower even from the IBA's ruling). However, in the case of maturities of 91 days and above but lower than six months, the RBI has marginally hiked up the IBA rate to 6.5 per cent, while the eight per cent slab would continue on deposits over six months but less than a year. Most banks had no idea that rates had changed. As J.C. Mehta, public relations manager, SBI, said, "It was only through the newspaper reports that we realised that the rates had been changed." When the RBI had issued the press note on 25 May, SBI and PNB were still accepting deposits till 27 May at the old rate of interest. If the banks were confused, it was the depositor who really did not know what was happening to his money. With RBI's decision being revoked by the IBA and the subsequent alterations, one depositor even decided to send a letter to the finance minister, asking him to make one decision and stick by it.

While the governor of the RBI, R.N. Malhotra had stated that "these changes were being made as commercial banks had not taken to the scheme in its true perspective and that some of the banks were managing their 15-day deposits like current accounts, many insiders are of the opinion that he had been compelled to revoke the rates as many of the chairmen of the banks were going to take up the issue with the finance minister on 28 May. Though actual calculations are yet to be made on the amount of money to be given as interest, a finance ministry source ruefully adds that "it could result in a loss of about Rs 10 crores." Surely, if the RBI wants to attract more funds as new deposits, it would do better to reorganise this industry on an efficient service-oriented footing first and think about investment-oriented industry later.

Vasantdada Patil Quits

Before the high command asked him to resign

When the judgement against Abdul Rehman Antulay was announced in January 1982, Vasantdada Patil, then an AICC(I) general secretary, had made a sarcastic comment on the telephone to R.K. Dhawan, the then Prime Minister's special assistant. "I know there is a shortage of cement in Maharashtra, but is there a shortage of paper too? Why don't you send him (Antulay) some paper from Delhi, so that he can write down his resignation." On the night of 1 June, when Vasantdada Patil himself resigned from the chief ministership of Maharashtra (this was his fourth term), there was no shortage of either cement or paper in Bombay. The exit of the Maratha leader from Sangli had been a foregone conclusion ever since he returned from Delhi to Bombay without meeting the Prime Minister on 28 May. Vasantdada himself had made it known soon after his return from the capital that he was bowing out.

The appointment of Mrs Prabha Rau as the Maharashtra PCC(I) president has been opposed by the chief minister. But not only was a person disliked by him nominated to the top party post in the state, the high command's decision regarding the Bombay Regional Congress(I) Committee (BRCC-I) was a rebuff to Vasantrao Patil. Following the party's defeat in the Bombay civic elections, the BRCC(I) president, Murli Deora, had resigned. He had then made it known that the Shiv Sena had won the elections because of the laxity shown by the chief minister, some of whose statements in the state Assembly had helped the Shiv Sena cause. Soon after the appointment of Prabha Rau was announced, the high command asked Murli Deora not to resign and remain in office. Vasantdada Patil also felt that the Sharad Pawar led Congress(S) was being given more importance than the ruling party leaders.

There has been talk for sometime that in case Sharad Pawar and his followers in Maharashtra joined the Congress(I), Pawar would be made the CM. On 1 June, at the passing out parade of the National Defence Academy (NDA) at Khadakvasla near Pune, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi surprised everybody by suddenly taking the Congress(S) MP, Suresh Kalmadi, away from the gathering and having a quiet chat with him. The opportunity accorded to Kalmadi was denied to Vasantdada Patil, despite his flying between Pune and Bombay in the Prime Minister's aircraft. The events after 27 May had made it clear that Vasantdada Patil's days as chief minister were numbered. He chose the honourable way out and resigned before being asked to quit.

Vasantdada Patil had been called to Delhi by the high command, which wanted to know the meaning of some of the statements made by him recently. He had criticised the holding of two posts simultaneously by partymen. The high command wanted to know if Vasantdada's reference was to Rajiv Gandhi holding the dual posts of Congress president and the leader of the Congress(I) parliamentary party (by virtue of which he is the Prime Minister). The high command pointed out that in the recent meeting of the AICC(I), held in Delhi on 4 and 5 May and in the Congress Working Committee meetings held prior to it, Vasantdada had not made known his views on this subject.

Vasantdada Patil — Durgaprasad

In fact, the election of Rajiv Gandhi as the party chief by the CWC(I) on 13 November 1984 had been ratified by the Delhi session of the AICC(I). If anyone in the party had any objection to the holding of dual posts by Rajiv Gandhi, then he could have used the party forum in early May, the high command sources pointed out. On 28 May, Vasantdada Patil left for Bombay in a huff. Had he stayed back for a day, he may have been able to meet the Prime Minister. But the delay in getting the appointment with the PM and the nominations in the state by the high command had upset the veteran politician, and he left the capital by the evening flight at 5.30 pm. Before leaving for Bombay, Vasantdada Patil met a number of journalists. His answers showed that he was angry and humiliated because of his inability to meet Rajiv Gandhi. Among the questions asked were:

"Have you met Rajiv Gandhi? Are you satisfied with your visit to Delhi? Is your mission accomplished? Is the controversy over?" And his answer to most of them was: "I don't know."

In the spate of the "I don't know" answers, one thing which became clear was that Vasantdada Patil would not visit Delhi as the Maharashtra CM in the near future. His resignation on the night of 1 June was not unexpected. By resigning now, Vasantdada has ensured one thing: that the mantle would not pass from him to Sharad Pawar. For one, Pawar is yet to join the Congress(I). The Indian Congress (Socialist) is holding a camp at Nagpur on 27 and 28 June to decide on the question of a merger with the Congress(I). Sharad Pawar was in Europe when Vasantdada Patil resigned. The question of Pawar succeeding Patil, therefore, did not arise. Whether Pawar will be able to become the chief minister of Maharashtra in the near future is a million-dollar question. His intention of joining the ruling party is clear. He has met Rajiv Gandhi on a couple of occasions in the recent past. His close lieutenant, Suresh Kalmadi, an ex-air force pilot whose primary interests are in business these days, has met Arun Singh, the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary a number of times.

But there is confusion within the Congress(S). In the last days of May, while K.P. Unnikrishnan, a senior Congress(S) leader, told newsmen in Guwahati that the party will not merge with the Congress(I), the very next day there was a press statement by Kalmadi from Pune asserting that the merger would be decided at the Nagpur meeting. While the Maharashtra unit may go along with Sharad Pawar, the units in Assam and Kerala, where many veteran Congressmen are in the Congress(S), do not share Sharad Pawar's views regarding the merger with the Congress(I).

FOREIGN POLICY

Rajiv Gandhi's Diplomatic Coup

India improves relations with her immediate neighbours

On 1 June, Rajiv Gandhi completed seven months as the Prime Minister of India. The problems at home may not have been solved in these months, but in the field of diplomacy, the young Prime Minister has achieved something which has no parallel in the last two decades. The visit of the Sri Lanka President, Junius Jayewardene, to New Delhi on the eve of Rajiv Gandhi's western tour was in itself a major achievement for India's diplomacy. The joint flight undertaken by President Jayewardene and Rajiv Gandhi to Dhaka on 2 June, to express sympathy with the cyclone affected people of Bangladesh, was a diplomatic triumph. The joint aerial survey of the devastated areas by the Prime Minister of India and the Presidents of Sri Lanka and Bangladesh was an example of regional cooperation in South Asia which has set a precedent.

When Rajiv Gandhi reaches Washington in the second week of June, he would be going with the image of a person who has the goodwill of President Jayewardene and Bangladesh's President H M Ershad. So far, India has been portrayed in the west as a medium-power in South Asia who is disliked by her immediate neighbours. After 2 June, this image has been changed. Pakistan, which has many friends in Washington, had relied upon the cooperation of other South Asian nations to tarnish India's image in the past. But recently, things have been reversed. Pakistan stands isolated in the subcontinent today. While India, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh were setting an example in regional cooperation, Pakistan has intensified its belligerence from across India's western borders.

On 31 May the Indian foreign office had to summon the Pakistan ambassador in New Delhi and hand over a letter of protest against Pakistan Air Force's violation of Indian air space in the Jammu and Kashmir region. Reports of Pakistan army firings at Indian outposts in the Ladakh region (from across the line of actual control) came in while Rajiv Gandhi, Jayewardene and H M. Ershad went round the cyclone-affected areas of Bangladesh.

Rajiv Gandhi's return from the Soviet Union on 26 May saw him getting busy with preparations for the western trip. The trip which he is undertaking in June is significant. His first halt is Cairo. It will be after a lapse of over a decade that an Indian Prime Minister will visit Egypt. The relations between India and Egypt had soured in the Indira Gandhi and Sadat days. Now there has been a thaw and since Hosni Mobarak became the President of Egypt, there have been many ministerial level visits exchanged between the two countries. The visit of the Prime Minister will renew traditional ties between India and Egypt, the co-founders of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Paris, the second capital to be visited by the Prime Minister, holds promise of increased Indo-French cooperation both in defence and in industry. The involvement of French diplomats in the Coomar Narain spy scandal had dampened the spirit of Indo-French relations, but the ties seem to be getting back to normal again. Rajiv Gandhi has made known his opposition to the American proposal for 'Star Wars.' President Mitterand of France would find this to be a common ground for discussion.

India and France have a lot in common. While France is a western power, it has been differing with the USA on various issues in the past. France has a self-reliant defence industry, which is suitable for India's needs. (Most western countries have collaboration agreements with the USA, which becomes an impediment in bilateral cooperation. When Sweden wanted to sell Viggen aircraft to the Indian Air Force, the US tie up had come in the way). The visit to France comes at a time when Indo-British ties have taken a sudden nosedive. The British, irked over India's decision not to go in for the purchase of Westland helicopters, have recently imposed a cut in their aid to India and indefinitely put off the ministerial level meetings of the Indo British economic committee. France can offer India almost everything this country can look for in the UK. To begin with, the substitute for the Westland helicopters can be found in France. The inauguration of the Festival of India apart, the Prime Minister's French visit is likely to yield rich dividends.

Algeria, where the Prime Minister will go after his trip to France, too, has not received an Indian Prime Minister for over a decade. Algeria and India agree on many issues. Even on the question of the Polisario movement in Morocco, the two countries have a common perspective. Last year, a delegation of the Polisario visited India as guests of the Congress(I) foreign relations department. A representative of the Polisario has been stationed in New Delhi, though neither de facto nor de jure recognition has been accorded. There was strong lobbying by Morocco to get the Prime Minister to Rabat in place of Algiers. A Delhi businessman who represents Morocco's business interests in India, tried his level best either to get the Prime Minister to visit Rabat or to cancel the trip to Algiers. Morocco has not been kind to India in the past. The humiliation meted out to the Indian delegation at the Islamic summit at Rabat in the Seventies has not been forgotten. When Indira Gandhi died, Morocco did not send a high level delegation to her funeral. When despite these factors, the Delhi businessman tried to use his proximity with the Prime Minister to alter the plans regarding Algeria, he was rebuffed. These facts are know in Algiers. Even before meeting the Algerian President Rajiv Gandhi has made a major diplomatic achievement.

When the youngest-ever chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement reaches Washington with the image of being an Indian Prime Minister whose efforts at promoting regional cooperation are being taken seriously by the neighbours, better Indo-US ties can be looked forward to.

NEW DELHI

The Public Views a Martyr

Indira Gandhi's residence becomes a museum

Mrs Gandhi lives in the bloodstains on the concrete pathway between 1, Safdarjung Road and 1, Akbar Road. It has now turned grey and is encased, ironically, in bullet-proof glass. Around it are 30-odd circles in white paint, marked "BC" (bullet casing) and "SG" (sten gun)—silent signs of the bullets that killed Mrs Gandhi. A red bulb burns on the empty sentry-box where one of her assassins waited for her that morning. The approach to the spot is blocked by a rectangular platform in green mosaic, on which lie flowers and stand two guards of the Delhi Armed Police (DAP), specially liveried and coached on the sequence of events of 31 October 1984. As the steady queue of visitors files past, they go over the happenings again and again. "There stood Pradhanmantriji.. and from here and here (pointing in two directions) came the bullets and there she fell, you can see her blood under that glass box... that is where she died."

That is where Mrs Gandhi lives most, the spot on which she fell dead The rest of 1, Safdarjung Road, where she lived from 1964 to 1977 and again from 1980 to 1984, and which has now been converted into the Indira Gandhi Memorial, is more like a "good living" exhibition put up by the Trade Fair Authority of India (TFAI) in New Delhi's Pragati Maidan. In some ways, the memorial only adds to the enigma that was Mrs Gandhi. The memorial has not unravelled those mysteries. Indira Gandhi, the private person, remains impenetrable.

The journey begins with a metal detector check at the gates with a larger than life portrait of a beaming Mrs Gandhi, as if welcoming visitors. Then follows a glance at her life right from the time she was a baby to the time her ashes were deposited on the Himalayas by her son. There are picture panels (quite reminiscent of the one at the "Son of India" pavilion) where some rare photographs are displayed. There is, for example, a photograph of the young Indira in two-tone and another one on the beach with Feroze Gandhi, her husband.

Of the rooms that have been opened to public view, in 1, Safdarjung Road, her study, where only her immediate family members were allowed brings Mrs Gandhi most readily to life. Several paintings hang on the walls and the book shelves are stacked with books ranging from Ian Fleming's Moonraker to volumes on oriental art and spiritualism. There are a variety of chairs and a soft leather stretcher overlooking the green lawns at the back of her house On her table lie a pair of spectacles, a diary and some daintily arranged pens, pencils and rubberbands. "Move on, move on," say the guards on duty. A few steps away is Mrs Gandhi's drawing room where she received her guests. The tapestry is mainly green—a green carpet, green sofa sets, a couple of them in red and mauve. Fresh flowers are arranged on the low tables and on the walls, there are paintings from the Rajputana, Gandhara, and Oriental schools of art. Her dining room, in the midst of which is an oblong, ten-chair table, is well decorated. On the shelves all around stand pieces of sculpture. There are more paintings on the wall and beside the table, a huge elephant tusk standing against the wall. Next to the dining room is a tiny, L-shaped waiting room, with settees and low stools On the wooden shelves to the left are books, the only ones visible being the nine volumes of the Bachchan Rachnavali Right above it is a photograph of Nehru, without his cap. It is here that the very familiar last words of the late Prime Minister can be heard There are microphones hidden in the bushes that fall along that path from 1, Safdarjung to 1, Akbar Road. Just where the path begins, a small screen for showing the different aspects of Mrs Gandhi's life has been erected and beside it are two outhouses which the TFAI now occupies It was the TFAI which was entrusted with the job of converting the house into a memorial. According to some TFAI hands on duty, it was done in 15 days which is why it looks a hurriedly finished job, especially the photosection. The TFAI is still busy giving the final touches to the memorial. There will be, according to some TFAI sources, additions to the memorial. But the bedroom, the meditation room and other parts of the house will not be opened to the public in keeping with Mrs Gandhi's strong desire for privacy during her life.

Near the exit is the spot where the bullets felled her. Once, Akbar Road from there is only a breath away. It stands sealed, sparkling white and silent in the shade of huge trees, overlooking the small distance Mrs Gandhi could not cover.

COINAGE

Shortchanged

Large-scale imports to deal with the scarcity of coins

Where has all the change gone? The public, facing daily the shortage of coins does not know. The Reserve Bank of India (RBI), which distributes millions of pieces of change all over the country is unable to comprehend the reasons and calls it an "artificial shortage." Even the government, pointing out the increased production of coins over the years, has been wondering where the coins find their way from the 1,755 depots that the RBI runs. The answer lies in large scale hoarding and some amount of melting, a fact that was recently admitted by the government in Parliament.

After years of vacillation, the government has decided to import for the first time, minted coins, to augment the supply from the three mints in India. On 14 May, the minister of state for finance, Janardhan Poojary announced in the Lok Sabha that 2,000 million pieces of coins (worth Rs 143 crores) would be imported to meet the current shortage in the country. Though it was not announced, it is believed that all imports are to be completed within this year itself and the deal was being finalised with four countries, including Great Britain, South Korea and Canada.

Before allowing the import of coins, the existing legislation, the Coinage Act of 1906 which provides that only coins minted in India could be legal tender, had to be amended. During a debate on the Amendment Bill of the Coinage Act, the finance minister refuted criticism from opposition MP's that in such imports India's prestige would receive a setback. He said that coin imports would be a "short-term" and a "one-time-measure." The main objective, he added, was for the imports to act as a disincentive to unscrupulous elements hoarding coins for selling them at a premium. He announced that such hoarding of coins in unreasonable quantities was shortly going to be made a cognisable offence.

Said Wazir Khan, deputy secretary, ministry of finance: "The decision to import a substantial amount of coins into the country will not only support the production of coins at home, it will force hoarders of coins out of business." According to him, the target for indigenous production of coins in 1985-86 was likely to exceed 2,000 million pieces, a substantial increase from the previous year's production figures. In 1982-83, 660 million pieces were produced, in 1983-84, 1,063 million pieces and 1984-85, 1,356 million coins were produced at the three mints in Bombay, Calcutta and Hyderabad. It was in 1982 that the government first felt the pinch of coin scarcity and evolved a long-term strategy to face the crisis. The new plan envisaged the following: the blueprint for a

COMPUTERS

Late for CLASS

Was it necessary to import computers for schools? The government with its penchant for bringing computers to the classroom started the Computer Literacy and Studies in Schools (CLASS) in April last year. Altogether 250 schools were shortlisted for the pilot project and 42 resource centres were established (the number of schools having computers is likely to become 1,000 in 1985). However, the wheels of CLASS are at a standstill at the very threshold of the extensive computerisation plans.

The computers—the BBC micros—were supplied by a bankrupt British firm, Acorn Computers Ltd., at a higher price than available in the international market. A significant question that has been overlooked is why we have to go in for foreign machines at all? There are many Indian firms which manufacture equally good equipment. A positive answer appears a closely guarded secret of the authorities at the Department of Electronics (DoE), the National Council of Educational Research and Training (NCERT), the British Overseas Department Administration (BODA) and Acorn Computers Ltd., who have maintained silence.

The reasons for the failure of the Rs 300-crore CLASS project are numerous. The official reply for the delay is that the computers arrived only in late December when the students were preparing for the examinations. Also, it has been revealed that there were no systematic implementation plans. There was an absolute lack of coordination and no concrete procedures and schemes were laid down before CLASS was opened. The truth is that NCERT is still trying to evolve a well-integrated strategy to pursue the pilot project. The CLASS project will now envelop the 1985-86 academic year also and the DoE will review the progress in June 1985. However, some logistical problems, that are likely to create trouble have been foreseen but nothing has been done to remove them.

The BBC Micros have been doing fairly well in England. A variety of software are available for the British schools in a special language known as "Logo." A team of teachers was sent to Britain in April for a three months' tour to see how the computers function in the English schools. This team will report back in June.

A refresher course was conducted to re train the teachers because they had "forgotten" everything they learnt in the summer of 1984. An important question in the minds of the people is: will the students find a smart computer terminal on their desks after the vacations are over? Will the children receive better education with the help of computers? The answer being advocated is that in the next 10 or 15 years, computers may change our schools radically and it is time we invested in computers, say the authorities. The NCERT has been offered by 20 indigenous firms to produce software suited to our environment and culture. Standard software packages are already available in subjects like English, physics, chemistry, biology and history. Therefore, CLASS has fairly good prospects in the future to take off smoothly but first the wheels are to be oiled and geared properly.

In India, the computer revolution has just begun but efforts to bring them into classrooms have not been successful. It is high time the bureaucracy broke the silence about the still-born CLASS project which has been bogged down by delays and red tape.

Namita Rastogi, New Delhi

20-crore new mint to be constructed at NOIDA, New Delhi would be approved, 22 sophisticated coin presses would replace older presses at mints, production would be stepped up to the maximum and mints changed from a 48-hour week to a 54-hour week. In spite of these steps, the coin shortage continued. The queues outside the RBI of people wanting to exchange currency notes for small change became longer. So serious became the shortage and persistent the demand, that transport corporations, private enterprises and hotels evolved their own systems to deal with the situation. In Bombay, New Delhi and Calcutta, the transport corporations began to issue money coupons instead of coins and grocery shops would return anything from a chewing gum to a postage stamp instead of the elusive 20-paisa or 50-paisa bit.

While thousands wring their hands over the shortage of change, others have capitalised on the coin crisis and proliferated in clandestine selling of large quantities of small change. According to officials at the RBI, the coin shortage has given rise to a new source of employment for hundreds of unscrupulous persons. Every morning coin collectors line up outside the RBI office to collect pouches of change of Rs 20 each. Though officials at the RBI have instructions not to issue change to one customer more than once a day, it was learnt that the RBI officials sometimes connive with hoarders and issue more change than the stipulated amount.

The coins are sold at a 25 per cent commission. At Chandni Chowk market or the Sadar Bazar for instance, dealers openly sell pouches of coins at a profit. A 100-rupee note changes hands for 85 one-rupee coins. Said Hira Nand, a dealer in coins and damaged currency notes since 1960: "There is no acute shortage of coins as is being projected by the government. The shortage is only at the surface and exists because the RBI has restricted the issue of change to only Rs 20. Let the RBI announce that there will be open exchange of currency notes to coins, then the shortage will disappear." Will it not run coin dealers like him out of business? He replied: "Why should it? There will still be those people who do not want to stand in long queues at the RBI counters and will come to us. At least it will end the blackmarketing that shopkeepers and traders indulge in."

Already, according to officials at the finance ministry, the announcement of the government to import large quantities of coins has resulted in hoarders releasing their stocks into the market. At one meeting of the special committee which has been set up to study the coin shortage this year, it was disclosed that 25-paisa coins are back in circulation in Bombay and Madras. The committee is presently examining reports of melting done by persons of the earlier copper-nickel coins. To restrict the melting of coins for the manufacture of fountain pen nibs or motor spare parts, as has been alleged, the committee will be studying the possibility of further reducing the metal content of coins, so that the value of metal content is less than their face value. The committee is hoping that increased production from Indian mints and imports of coins from abroad will change the scene shortly. Said M. Venugopal, manager of Bank of India, "We welcome the decision to import coins. It will be a step towards ending large scale blackmarketeering and hoarding of coins. At least, we will not have to send back our customers without change."

BIHAR

Big, Bad Wolves of Hazaribagh

Eighty children killed by wolves

The Indian wolf is described as a "timid animal, little bigger than the village dog." Less than a thousand of them survive in India and are, therefore, protected animals. In Bihar, however, their attacks on young children are forcing the forest authorities to take desperate measures.

Wolves have been playing havoc near Hazaribagh, a small town in Bihar. Altogether 82 children have been killed and eaten by wolves during the last five years. About 60 others have been seriously injured. The situation has driven the Bihar Forest Department (BFD) to take action against the maneaters. Even the Border Security Force was called in to kill the wolves. Major Sukhvir Singh, a crack shot, of the Punjab Regiment, was also employed for a week. Finally, the BFD sought the government's permission to requisition army helicopters and snipers to shoot the wolves. In between, hakkas were tried, in which villagers beat drums in the forest while closing in on the hideouts and thus led the animals to the waiting hunters.

Though 12 wolves have been shot dead recently; the killings of children continue. In the past five months, 13 children were killed and many injured. Wolves on several occasions have entered houses and lifted children from the courtyard. On one occasion, a wolf seized a one-and-a-half-year-old boy when he was being breast-fed. Recently, a wolf snatched away a child from her mother's lap in broad daylight. What has turned the wolves into maneaters? After all, wolves abound in Palamau, in Bihar, in the Rann of Kutch and in Uttar Pradesh, but there are no reports of wolves killing children there. Only in Karnataka for a brief period have children been killed by wolves.

An Indian wolf

Forest department officials and wildlife experts suggest that the wolves in Hazaribagh have turned maneaters since their natural prey is in short supply, because of the large scale deforestation in the area. The theory, however, suffers from a major weakness. The Hazaribagh District Gazetteer published in 1917 and edited by E. Lister, discusses the menace of the maneating wolves in the area. In fact, the Gazetteer records that in 1911, 44 persons were killed by the wolves and the government awarded Rs 50 to hunters for each wolf they killed. Seventy-four years later in 1985, the reward has gone up to Rs 5,000.

There could have been no shortage of natural prey because of deforestation 75 years ago. No scientific study has been made till date and thus, there is still no rational explanation available. As a result, forest officials have been caught in a web of their own making. Intitially, they blamed the Hazaribagh burial ground, where, they alleged, wolves dug out bodies and acquired a taste of human flesh. They, however, have pointed out that wolves eat their ownkills and do not touch carcasses killed by other animals. Working on the premise that it is the shortage of natural prey that is driving wolves into human habitats, forest officials are trying to wean the wolves away from human flesh. Goats are tied up as bait at different places and every time a goat is killed, a fresh goat replaces it. Not surprisingly, some of goats offered to the wolves, are actually being taken away by the villagers.

Some of the villagers, however, are clearly taking advantage of the situation. On one occasion, a villager has been caught while falsely claiming that his daughter had been killed by the wolves. He wanted the compensation of Rs 10,000 offered by the government for each person killed by wild animals. In most cases, the forest department carrries out an independent investigation and reports to the police. Very often, the reports mention that no trace of the remains was found. Even in these cases, compensation is duly paid. Over Rs five lakhs have been disbursed so far, while three more lakhs will be given as compensation soon. Mr S.A.H.A.A. 'Tutu' Imam, a noted hunter and wildlife expert, has filed a case in the Supreme Court maintaining that the killer is actually a leopard. He quotes extensively from books on wildlife to point out that unlike leopards or other animals of the cat family, wolves do not have eyes to see in the dark; that they do not weigh more than 20 kg and they hunt in packs. All these tell-tale signs, he claims, are missing in Hazaribagh.

Forest officials, however, point out that eyewitness accounts, spoor marks and post-mortem reports of the wolves killed indicate that the man-eaters are indeed wolves. There are between five to ten in the area, said forest officials who believe that the menace will continue till at least next year. Very soon, the monsoons will begin, when action against the maneaters will be almost impossible to take.

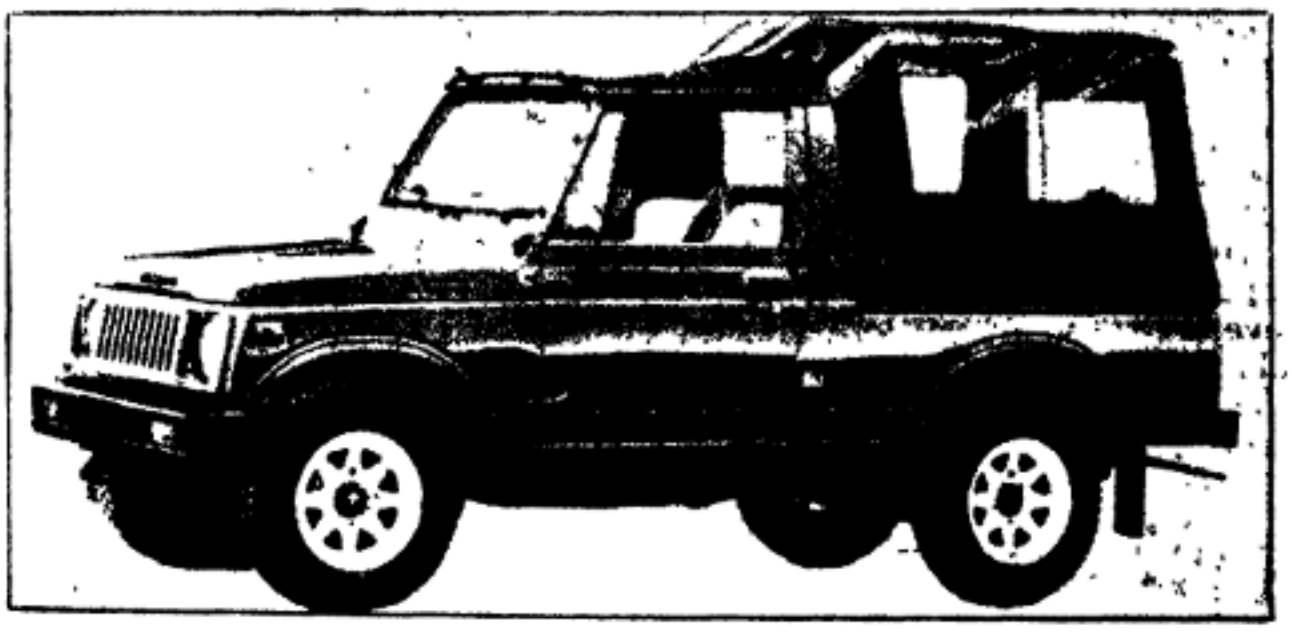
MARUTI UDYOG

Now, the "People's Jeep"



Scarcely had Maruti Udyog announced the launch of its new four-wheeled drive vehicle, "Gypsy," when it was flooded with enquiries and letters warning against its possible blackmarketing. One such letter published in the Times of India, dated 16 May warning against this states "...it is therefore suggested that Maruti Udyog should allow only one application from one family and also should ban its free transfer right from the beginning...." The fears are not unwarranted, keeping in mind that the firm intends to produce just 2,000 vehicles in the first year of production, 1985-86.

As was the case with the Maruti-800, the company officials expect to "revolutionise the market" with the introduction of the "Gypsy" which is coming into a market dominated mainly by the Jeep manufactured by the Mahindras and the Jonga. The Maruti vehicle is expected to be priced at around Rs 60,000 which is a little below the price of the competitors.

The four cylinder engine with a four-stroke cycle has a fuel efficiency of 14 km to the litre under test conditions. Under normal driving conditions it is expected to give a little less at about 10-11 km per litre. The Gypsy has a maximum speed of 110 km per hour. The production is expected to begin around November and bookings will begin in early July. Just as in the case of its earlier vehicles, the Maruti Gypsy will initally be totally foreign-made. It has been proposed that by the end of the first year it should be at least 20 per cent indigenous. The Maruti-800 is still plagued by problems about indigenisation. "All three factors—quality, quantity and time—are posing problems," said a company official.

The Gypsy was first tested in India last year in the trans-Himalayan expedition from Khardungla near Leh to the Pangsu pass at the Burma border. "If it impressed the army, we have no doubts that it will impress the market," claimed a Maruti executive. The firm has already received enquiries from para-military forces like the Border Security Force (BSF) and the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF). The firm is also trying to promote it as a pick-up vehicle for agricultural produce. Enquires from the "young-in-crowd" are also pouring in every day, they claim. The four colours being offered intially have been finalised keeping the targeted clientele in mind. The colours are: red, white, "jungle green," and "racing blue."

The production of the eight-seater Gypsy will be raised to 8,000 in 1986-87, but even then its production would comprise just ten per cent of the total production. The firm has already reached a capacity of 4,500 vehicles per month, which consists mainly of the Maruti-800, with the production of vans and deluxe cars being varied as per the demand. At this rate, the company is expected to complete the year with a total volume of 50,000 cars as against the figure of 40,000 promised to the government for 1985 86.

GUJARAT

Assault on Excise Officials

While the policemen looked the other way

It was one of the biggest anti-tax evasion operations planned by the Central Excise Department, involving 435 officers and men brought in from Kanpur, Hyderabad, Chandigarh, Delhi and Bombay. So strict was the secrecy that members of the raiding party had no inkling even when they left Bombay. Their destination was Surat, the textile centre in Gujarat. Newspaper reports had spoken of excise duty evasion running into more than Rs 100 crores, of money being poured into construction and of piles of black money. For the tax sleuths it was a nightmare. Over 60 officials were beaten up by goondas hired by shopkeepers and manufacturing units while the Surat police turned a deaf ear to the distress calls for hours.

After the assault by the goondas on 24 May, V.P. Singh, union finance minister, telephoned the Gujarat chief minister, Madhavsinh Solanki on 28 May, and reportedly told him to spare no one involved in the attack. Singh had reason to be angry. A day earlier, the Solanki government tried to explain why policemen had not rushed to the taxmen's aid. Despite the fact that the police commissioner of Surat, Man Mohan Mehta, called the raids ill-timed, the Central Excise Department's revenue intelligence wing, acting on the finance minister's orders conducted further checks. At the time of writing, five persons, including three owners of mills and one manager, have been arrested and unaccounted fabrics worth Rs five crores seized.

The 24 May raid was planned meticulously. On reaching Surat, the raiding squad set up a temporary control room and raided the textile market and the nearby areas where about 1,000 shops are located. Some went to Pandesara, on the outskirts of the city. In the beginning, nothing seemed amiss and the taxmen began their work. At 2.30 pm however, the control room received the first SOS message. The taxmen were being attacked by gangs of hired toughs with sticks, rods and acid.

The 435 strong party led by two deputy directors, R. Bhattacharya and T.P. Singhal, which had broken up into smaller units for detailed checks were first attacked near the Ring Road area where most of the textile shops are located. The goondas attacking the men raised slogan like "Excise department hai hai, Rajiv Gandhi murdabad, Rajiv Gandhi yeh nahin chalega." The hoodlums, who seemed to be in the pay of the traders, assaulted the taxmen, and snatched away documents, search warrants and incriminating materials they had found. Some excise officials lost their personal belongings too. The documents were destroyed on the spot by the toughs. The attacks were clearly organised. In each case, some 25 to 30 people armed with rods and sticks entered shops being searched by the taxmen who would be identified and beaten up.

What came as a shock was the unhelpful attitude of the local police. As the goondas attacked taxmen, an alarm was raised and the police station at Salabatpura was informed. But the police did nothing. The excise team leaders at the control room then rang up their seniors in New Delhi to tell them of their plight. According to reports from Surat, the director of revenue intelligence in Delhi, M.S. Bindra, in turn, informed other top brass in the capital. Finally the Gujarat chief secretary, M. Sivagnanam in Gandhinagar was told to order the Surat police to help the excise men. It was only around ten pm, about eight hours after the first complaints, that the police moved in, journalists from Surat said.

Far from feeling embarrassed by the Surat policemen's behaviour, the Gujarat government stoutly defended it, and blamed the sleuths for not informing the police in advance. A top civil servant told SUNDAY in Ahmedabad on 27 May that the excise men should have taken the Surat police commissioner into confidence before launching their raids. There was tension in Surat because of the anti-reservation stir and the police were under strain. However, the areas where the searches were conducted were all trouble-free and outside the curfew-bound areas. The police commissioner, Mr Mehta, said that the raids were ill-timed in view of the prevalent situation in the city. Most of the police force was already deployed and the required help could not be provided. He said that the raiding party officials did not tell the police of their operation until it was already under way.

In Ahmedabad on 27 May, the chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki, almost repeated what the police commissioner had said. When asked to explain why the police took so long to send help, the chief minister said that an inquiry would be made. The Surat journalists present claimed that police help was not made available till officials in New Delhi got going. No one in Ahmedabad would say how much time had elapsed between the first alarm about the assault and the moment when the police arrived. Nonetheless, a Gujarat government press communique on 27 May described the Surat reports about the incident as "a totally distorted version." It also made much of the police being kept in the dark, adding that necessary help had since been given. Twelve people had been arrested

The explanations by the government raised even more questions. The police complained that they had not been told beforehand. But secrecy is essential for such operations without which the raids would have become purposeless. The police insisted that they should have been told about the raids beforehand. But excise officials argue that this would have led to a 'leak.' The incident has added an extra dimension to the controversy about police behaviour in Gujarat in recent months.

Although 64 employees were hurt in the assaults, the union finance ministry refused to call off the raids. Searches were resumed, with the police now providing protection. The pressure was kept on. On 29 May, the local police arrested nine more persons in connection with the attacks on excise men. Altogether 37 owners of ten mills in Surat have moved the Gujarat High Court in Ahmedabad to get anticipatory bail. They have taken the step in view of the complaints lodged by excise officials.

While the tax-men were being assaulted by toughs hired by traders and industrialists, the Gujarat government was busy promulgating an ordinance which would give it draconian powers. The Anti-social Activities Preventive Ordinance passed on 26 May is like the National Security Act, but only more convenient to use. The ordinance empowers the state government to order the detention of any anti-social element on the basis of his past record for up to one year. A goonda or dangerous person as defined by the provisions under Sections 16, 17 and 22 and also under Section five of the Arms Act can be arrested under the new ordinance. It can also be applied to embezzlers, bootleggers, drug-pushers and pimps. According to Amarsinh Choudhary, the state home minister, the ordinance will not be used for political purposes. In fact, the draft of the ordinance had been in the past discussed with the opposition parties. The minister said that the ordinance would help the authorities to curb the menace of goondas in the state effectively and quickly.

There have been allegations, even by the government, that goondas were behind the violence in the state during the past 100 days of the anti-reservation stir. The new legislation would come in handy because the police would not be required to produce witnesses or do the paper work needed for justifying the detention of a person under the National Security Act, officials explained. It was also stated that similar legislation existed in Maharashtra and Tamil Nadu where it has proved to be very effective. The government will be setting up a three member-board of judges from the Gujarat High Court to supervise the enforcement of the ordinance and ensure that it was not misused.

NEW DELHI

The Demand for Justice

Leprosy victims ask for better treatment

While the renowned Gandhian, Baba Amte was chosen for this year's Indira Gandhi award for his work towards the eradication of leprosy, the lepers in Delhi began an agitation demanding rehabilitation and social equality. A small group of lepers are staging a month-long dharna outside the Delhi administration's social welfare department in Timarpur. In view of the prohibitory orders imposed in the capital due to the threatened agitation on the anniversary of "Operation Bluestar," four lepers are on strike at a time, to highlight their demands which have gone largely unnoticed.

There are four million lepers in the country, mainly, in Orissa, Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka and Tamil Nadu. In Delhi alone, there are over 7,000 lepers including many migrants from the south. Though lepers travel thousands of miles in search of rehabilitation, many of them are jailed for long periods of time. By law, lepers are prohibited from either seeking employment or using public transport. The only alternative, thus, is to beg. And begging only sees them behind bars. Said Govindram, an 80-year-old leper. "I earn a few rupees by begging in the streets. But the police come and lock us up. They demand money before we can be released again." Most lepers are taken to a remand home situated in Shahdara called Seva Kutir, which they refer to as "Danda Kutir" because of the severe beatings they get at the home. While the maximum penalty can be two years' imprisonment, lepers are usually freed after a few days, apparently after the jailers' palms are greased.

The lepers are subjected to antiquated and extremely discriminatory laws. On 15 March 1984, the then union health minister, R. Shankaranand in reply to a question on the eradication of leprosy told the Lok Sabha. "We have repealed the Leprosy Act itself. That should be enough." It was in 1982 that the Leprosy Act of 1898 was repealed by some states and union territories. Besides, insurance companies demand higher premium rates from them and under the election laws, there have to be separate election booths for leprosy patients in their own settlements manned by lepers themselves. Laws debar lepers from inheriting property and land. The agitating lepers in Delhi want these laws to be changed.

The leprosy eradication programme is part of the government's 20-point programme, but no concerted effort has been made to take up the cause of lepers. The Swaminathan Committee set up in 1982 to study the problem of leprosy eradication had set a target of treating 4.5 lakh leprosy patients during 1983-84 and to cure 3.25 lakh leprosy patients. The target fell short of expectations. Now, according to workers of the Jagat Mata Kusht Ashram, a recent survey has shown that if rehabilitation at this rate continues it would be 250 years more before leprosy is eradicated in India

Leprosy patients of the Jagat Mata Kusht Ashram placed their demands for proper rehabilitation and free rations at the doorstep of Chief Justice designate, P. N. Bhagwati a few days ago. In the petition they have complained that since they are not allowed to work most of them have no option but to beg, which gets them imprisoned. They have filed several complaints at the social welfare department. "We do not want to improve the facilities of beggars in the capital alone for fear of thousands of lepers converging to Delhi. We have to treat this as a national problem and plans are underway to evolve a scheme to rehabilitate lepers in the country," said an official of the social welfare department. A good explanation, perhaps. But the fact remains that in the guise of restricting the entry of lepers into Delhi, the capital's lepers are being neglected.

SRI LANKA

Island of Terror

Attacks on both Tamil and Sinhala civilians on the rise

The killing of 150 Sinhalese civilians by Tamil guerillas in Anuradhapura in May is another grisly chapter in Sri Lanka's ethnic conflict. It was the first time that Tamil terrorists broke their self-imposed rule of not attacking Sinhalese civilians whatever the provocation. They had identified the armed forces as their enemy and had not retaliated against the Sinhalese civilians unlike the Sri Lankan security forces, which when unable to apprehend the Tamil terrorists attack Tamil civilians.

On 15 May, about two dozen Tamil militants, disguised in army uniforms reached Anuradhapura. Using machine guns, they sprayed the area with bullets killing 150 persons. As a Sri Lankan official said, "The ferocity of the attack was unparallel in the history of terrorism in Sri Lanka." The Liberation Tigers of Tamil Elam (LTTE) is believed to be responsible for the massacre, though it has not claimed responsibility as yet.

A senior LTTE member told SUNDAY that the whole group had masterminded the attack. Asked how the LTTE could justify this action particularly when they had consistently maintained that "their war was not against the Sinhalese people," he replied that the attack was intended, to drive home a few points to the Jayewardene government. "This is a desperate attempt by the Tamil guerillas to protect their people. The killing of Sinhalese civilians is a preventive warning to the Sinhalese armed forces that they can no longer kill Tamil civilians with impunity. If they kill our civilians, we will kill theirs," he said.

If the Tamil guerillas continue to attack Sinhala civilians, the Jayewardene government will not be able to protect them. The Sinhalese have been living in peace but now, the guerillas wish to give the Sinhalese masses a taste of the fear and insecurity that the Tamils face.

The Anuradhapura incident is a setback for Jayewardene. The Sinhala opposition parties and the Buddhist clergy are now up against Jayewardene. The mass killings of Sinhalese civilians have outraged opposition Sinhala leaders and exposed the inefficacy of the administration. Security help arrived hours after the guerillas left. One way Jayewardene can cling onto power is by declaring martial law but it may at best delay his political exit.

Meanwhile, the Sri Lanka government is going ahead with its plan of colonisation. Over 200,000 Sinhalese armed civilians will be settled in the Tamil-dominated areas in the north in the next one and a half year. Tamil militants told SUNDAY that they would attack these armed, well-trained, and predominantly male settlers because they considered them to be a para-military force.

The Sri Lanka government has started a propaganda war before a military solution to the Tamil problem. Recently, the department of information released brochures which had grisly photographs of the victims of Tamil terrorists, violence and brutality by Tamils. But there is nothing to prove that these victims are of guerilla violence and not army "excesses." Some photographs however are definitely suspect. One photograph for instance, is of men killed in the Kent and Dollar farms raid by the LTTE.

In November 1984, the LTTE raided the farms and killed about 100 inmates. The photograph showing the dead "farmers" placed in a row is considered fake because the hands of the victims are tied at the back. The LTTE commandos had swooped down on the farms and fired indiscriminately It is impossible to believe that they had the time to tie the hands of the victims before killing them as such an action would have served no purpose. It is believed that the dead are actually Tamils. The photograph, a coloured one, reveals that the victims are wearing clean shirts, with no bloodstains. There are no other marks of injury on the body. It would appear that the victims have all been shot through the head while the dead bodies of the Kent and Dollars farms were mangled and charred by the grenades and bazookas Moreover, all the men seem to be young, judging by the colour of their hair

It is the Sri Lanka government's intention to prove that Tamil terrorism is the handiwork of a Soviet plot to topple the Jayewardene government. The Sri Lankan government has come down heavily on Amnesty International (AI) which, it believes, is controlled by "leftists." The arguments put forward by the government against AI and other "high sounding" human rights organisations of the world are revealing. The Sri Lankan government wonders at the 'dead silence' of AI and other groups, even about the "lamp post killings" indulged in by the terrorists (to punish who they believe to be police informers and anti socials) when they castigate the army excesses

The pamphlet talks about the army's capture of the LTTE's armoury in Atchuvely in Jaffna. The seizure, estimated to be worth Rs 40 million (Sri Lankan rupees) was the biggest setback suffered by the LTTE. The pamphlet states, "Apart from the cyanide said to be of Indian make, a number of items recovered from the Tiger arsenal by the army had Indian markings. Among those which bore Indian markings were twelve bore shot gun cartridges, explosive primers and ammunition ranging from nine mm hand gun bullets to 7.26 mm rifle bullets. All the ammunition were packed in PVC canisters with screw tops and were at the time of the raid, still in their paper jackets. This army raid was a significant breakthrough in that the soldiers were able to recover a large cache of arms and ammunition brought over to Sri Lanka mainly from India, with a view to creating murder, mayhem and chaos in this country."

The cache of propaganda literature also includes a book, The Ethnic Problem in Sri Lanka which seeks to dispel the "myth of discrimination" against the Tamils. The book says discrimination can take many forms and points out that there is no discrimination in these spheres in Sri Lanka. To quote a passage "Legal discrimination can take various forms ranging from the enshrinement of race discrimination in the statute book (as in south Africa) to such restrictions as the legal disabilities of the Fijian Indian (50 per cent of the nation) with regard to the purchase of land or the bhumiputra (sons of the soil) legislation of Malaysia. Sri Lanka makes no such discrimination." The crucial point here is that the two above mentioned statutes are directed against foreigners. Does the Sri Lankan government unconsciously think that its Tamils are foreigners?

The book states that the percentage of the Tamils in the legal and judicial departments of the government is higher than the percentage of Tamils in Sri Lanka. The same situation prevails in the professional and semi-professional spheres. The figures are from the census of public servants conducted in 1980. The figures, however, do not tally with the statistics collected by the Tamils

One of the most interesting aspects of the book is that for the first time the government of Sri Lanka actually discusses the concept of Eelam, which had been dismissed as a pipe dream conceived by madmen. In the passages discussing Eelam, it is pointed out that the "mythical state" includes Trincomalle and Amparai districts where Tamils are in a minority (34 and 20 per cent of the population respectively). No mention is made of the colonisation plans of the Sinhala governments since independence in the eastern province which has altered radically the demographic pattern there. Before independence, both the districts were dominated by Tamils. No mention is also made of the Seruwilla electorate which was carved out of the Trincomalle district in 1978-79 wherein the neighbouring Sinhalese dominated areas were included to bring down the aggregate Tamil percentage.

There is a section devoted to proving that the Tamil militants are 'murderers.' The LTTE is described as a group led by Pirabhakaran who is "known to have killed several of his own comrades because he felt they would be a danger to his leadership." The PLOT led by Uma Maheswaran was "always Marxist in outlook" and the TELO "consisted of youths who had strong links with smugglers." The major emphasis of the book seems to be to discredit TULF and its leader A. Amirthalingam, probably because he continues to be regarded internationally as the leader of the oppressed Tamils of Sri Lanka. The book reproduces a photostat copy of an incriminating letter written by Amirthalingam's son Ravi which came into the hands of the Sri Lankan security forces. Among other things the letter claims responsibility for the murder of Pulendran, an organiser of the Ruling United National Party. The letter refers to land being 'bought in south India for the purpose of training' would be terrorists. There is also a mention of Amirthalingam attending to the 'Libyan connection.' The motive behind the publication of the letter is to point out to the world that Amirthalingam is not the self styled Gandhian he claims he is.

Ever since the four militant groups got together, there has been an increase in violent activities in Sri Lanka. The militants are determined to "break the backbone of the Jayewardene government." After having scored a military triumph, the militants claim they will be willing to negotiate with the Sinhala government but on their terms and conditions only. That they are now mentally prepared to negotiate is in itself a step forward.

The Small Screen

That controversial, much-talked-about programme, It's a Woman's World, will no longer start off with an evening-gown clad, impeccably coiffured Simi Garewal greeting viewers in her unmistakably stylish voice. Simi, director and programme hostess of It's a Woman's World, is opting out of the programme from July.

Rumours are flying thick and fast—some say she is very upset over criticism of her glossy, lavishly produced programme by female journalists and women's organisations who claim that the programme is too high-brow for the average Indian woman. Others say Simi has withdrawn because of other pressing commitments like her feature film, Rukhsat. As for the lady herself, in keeping with her dignified and stately image, she is maintaining a silence that speaks louder than words

The roly-poly Raja of Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi wed his soul-mate, painter Aradhana Oberoi (nicknamed Winkly), at a well-attended but quiet wedding ceremony on 5 May at New Delhi. Star guests included Rajeev Kapoor, Kunal Kapoor and Jackie Shroff. The bride is an ardent Rakesh fan. She says she has been an avid Rakesh watcher since their engagement in December 1984. "Although it was an arranged marriage I was a fan of his," she confesses. Why did Rakesh choose Delhi as the wedding venue? He has a snappy comeback to that one: "Because I had to have my shaadi at the rajdhani."

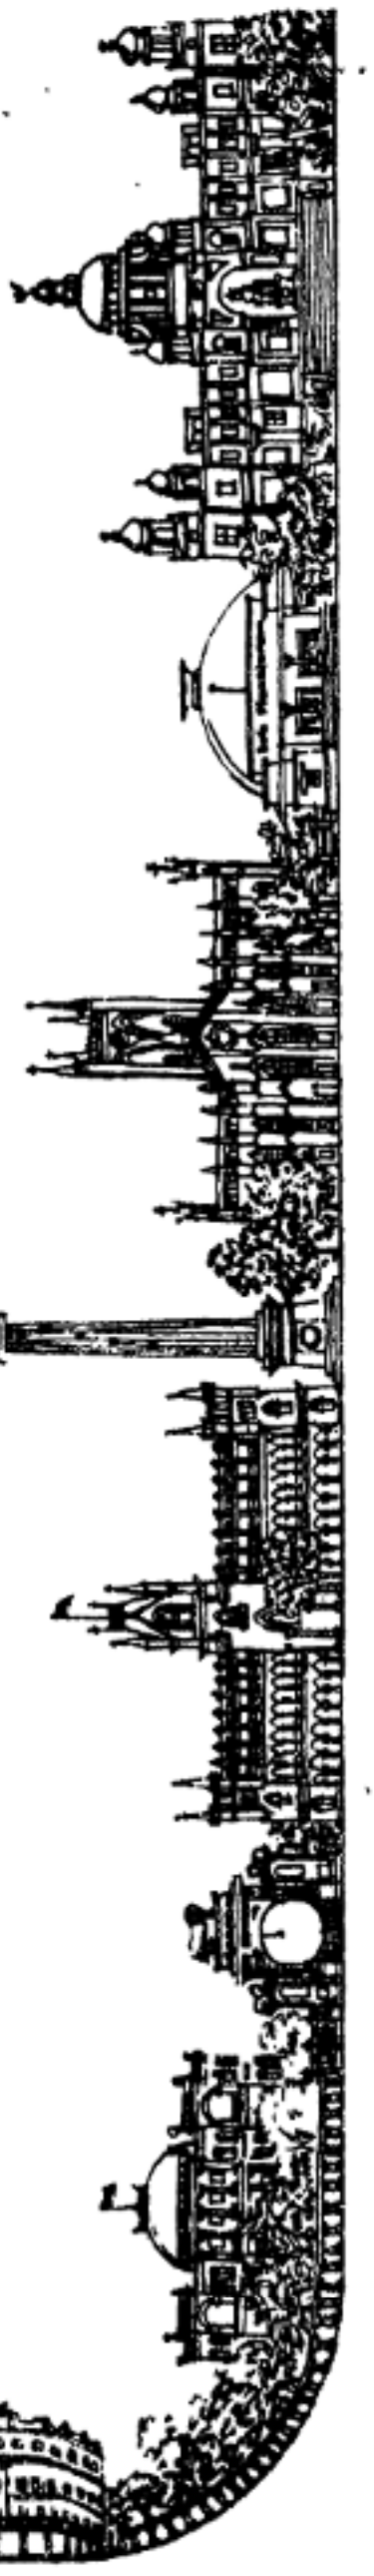
Popular series Rajani is Mudra Videotec's sop to the middle class woman. In sharp contrast to Simi's sophisticated woman, Priya Tendulkar, as the angry young woman, depicts a militant middle class housewife who tackles every situation from tricky admissions in a snooty school to an imposter godman, with admirable aplomb.

The series, directed by Basu Chatterjee, promises to make a star of the talented Priya Tendulkar, who has already bagged many feature film roles (Kaalchabra, Sasti Dulhan Mehenga Dulha, etc). Priya is emerging as a brilliant new star on the horizon.



Mr Ya Mrs? The Jalal Agha directed, Trikaya-produced, hilarious TV sitcom, left for Goa last week to do a couple of location scenes there. The series, with its deft comic reversal of traditional male-female roles (the wife plays the go-getter bread winner, while the husband plays the stay-at-home housewife—or is it house husband?) promises to fill the gap left behind by Idhar Udhar.

Hollywood feature films, whose release in India was banned either on political grounds (Raid On Entebbe, Midnight Express), or because of an excess of sex and violence (Death Wish I and II, Muscle-bound Silent Rage), can now be viewed by movie buffs on video. Muscle-bound superstars, Charles Bronson and Chuck Norris, batter their brawny way through these flicks. There's enough gore and gruesome death to satisfy the most blood-thirsty.

"India is number one in tea"

R. L. Rikhye, chairman of the Indian Tea Association (ITA) spoke on the major issues presently confronting the tea scenario, both domestic and international.

 On ITA

The ITA is 102 years old and is based at Calcutta It has 27 member companies collectively owning 234 gardens in north India which grew in 1984 the sum total of 230 million kg of tea. This represents close to half of the north Indian crop and well over one-third of the national crop. The pre-eminence of the ITA as a representative organisation is borne out by the fact that its chairman also presides over the apex level Consultative Committee of Plantation Associations (CCPA).

 On the national importance of the tea industry

On all counts, India is number one in tea-worldwide Thus, we are number one in production, in quality and in yield per hectare. We are also the world's largest single exporter. Besides the tea industry is the country's single largest employer, providing direct employment to over a million persons India also has the largest available bank of managerial expertise in tea. By any reckoning, therefore, the standing of this agro-industry in the national context is quite extraordinary

 On the current market boom

This will not last. Already, the market is on its way down. Take the London auction, for instance, which is a good barometer of the international scenario Six months ago, the price fetched per kg was 348 pence By 1st January, it had come down to 291 pence. In April, it was down to only 160 pence. A similar downward trend holds true for the domestic market I do not visualise any improvement in prices because all our projections point very clearly towards an excess of production over demand In other words, there will be a surplus

 On the export ceiling of 220 million kg

We might have a tough time in meeting the target of 220 million kg at reasonable prices With production buoyant in all tea producing countries, buyers will not be in a rush to buy

 On the minimum export price

The fixing of the minimum export price prevents irresponsible talk of under-invoicing and other malpractices. The only minor irritant is the extra bit of paperwork involved. I must say that the policies followed by the ministry of commerce in the last two years have been pragmatic and in the overall interests of the trade One certainly can't find fault with it.

 On the industry's major problems

Domestic consumption is rising at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, while the international growth rate is 2 per cent. Therefore, there exists the need to produce more tea both to satisfy domestic demand and to retain our 24% share of the world market. This can be done only if funds are available with the growers for ploughing back into new planting, irrigation and drainage, herbicides and pesticides factory modernisation, labour housing and so on at the gardens It is important therefore that fiscal levies should not be increased Indeed, despite the recent lowering of corporate tax rates and the introduction of a development fund for tea, this industry still remains the highest taxed industry in the country.

 On crop prospects in 1985

There has been a good early season crop in the north India gardens this year. Also, the south India gardens are keeping pace with last year's record crop there. We estimate this year's crop at about 655 million kg which would be 10 million kg more than the aggregate crop last year.

Tea and tea machinery

Dinesh Bagaria describes how the fortunes of the tea and tea machinery industries are interwined.

The one industry whose fortunes are directly linked to the prosperity of the tea industry is the tea machinery industry

Owing to the stagnation in tea prices over the years, demand for the machinery has been minimal and so also the capacity. the major manufacturers' combined annual turnover has hovered around Rs. 8 crores including exports.

With the recent boom in tea prices, there is a renewed demand for equipment but the makers have all been caught unawares. Added to this is the uncertainty for the future. Even the tea trade shirks from making any predictions and therefore machinery makers shy off from making fresh investments to enhance capacity

Tea machinery prices over the years have remained unremunerative and only in the present boom have the tea machinery makers been expecting a better deal. This however has been belied by increase in costs. Thus in less than a year steel prices alone have gone up by over 40%. And unfortunately, when tea machinery manufacturers approach tea companies now, the former are charged with trying to take advantage of the shortage of equipment to extort high prices!

Research on tea machinery is carried out by the Tea Research Association Centre at Toklai (near Jorhat). The machines so far commercialized are the Rotorvane, Continuous Tray Dryer, Barbora Leaf Conditioner and Baruah Continuous Roller while work on the newly developed Continuous Withering Machine has just been started.

Indeed, it might well be said that the one industry which is a sincere well-wisher of the tea industry is the tea machinery industry.

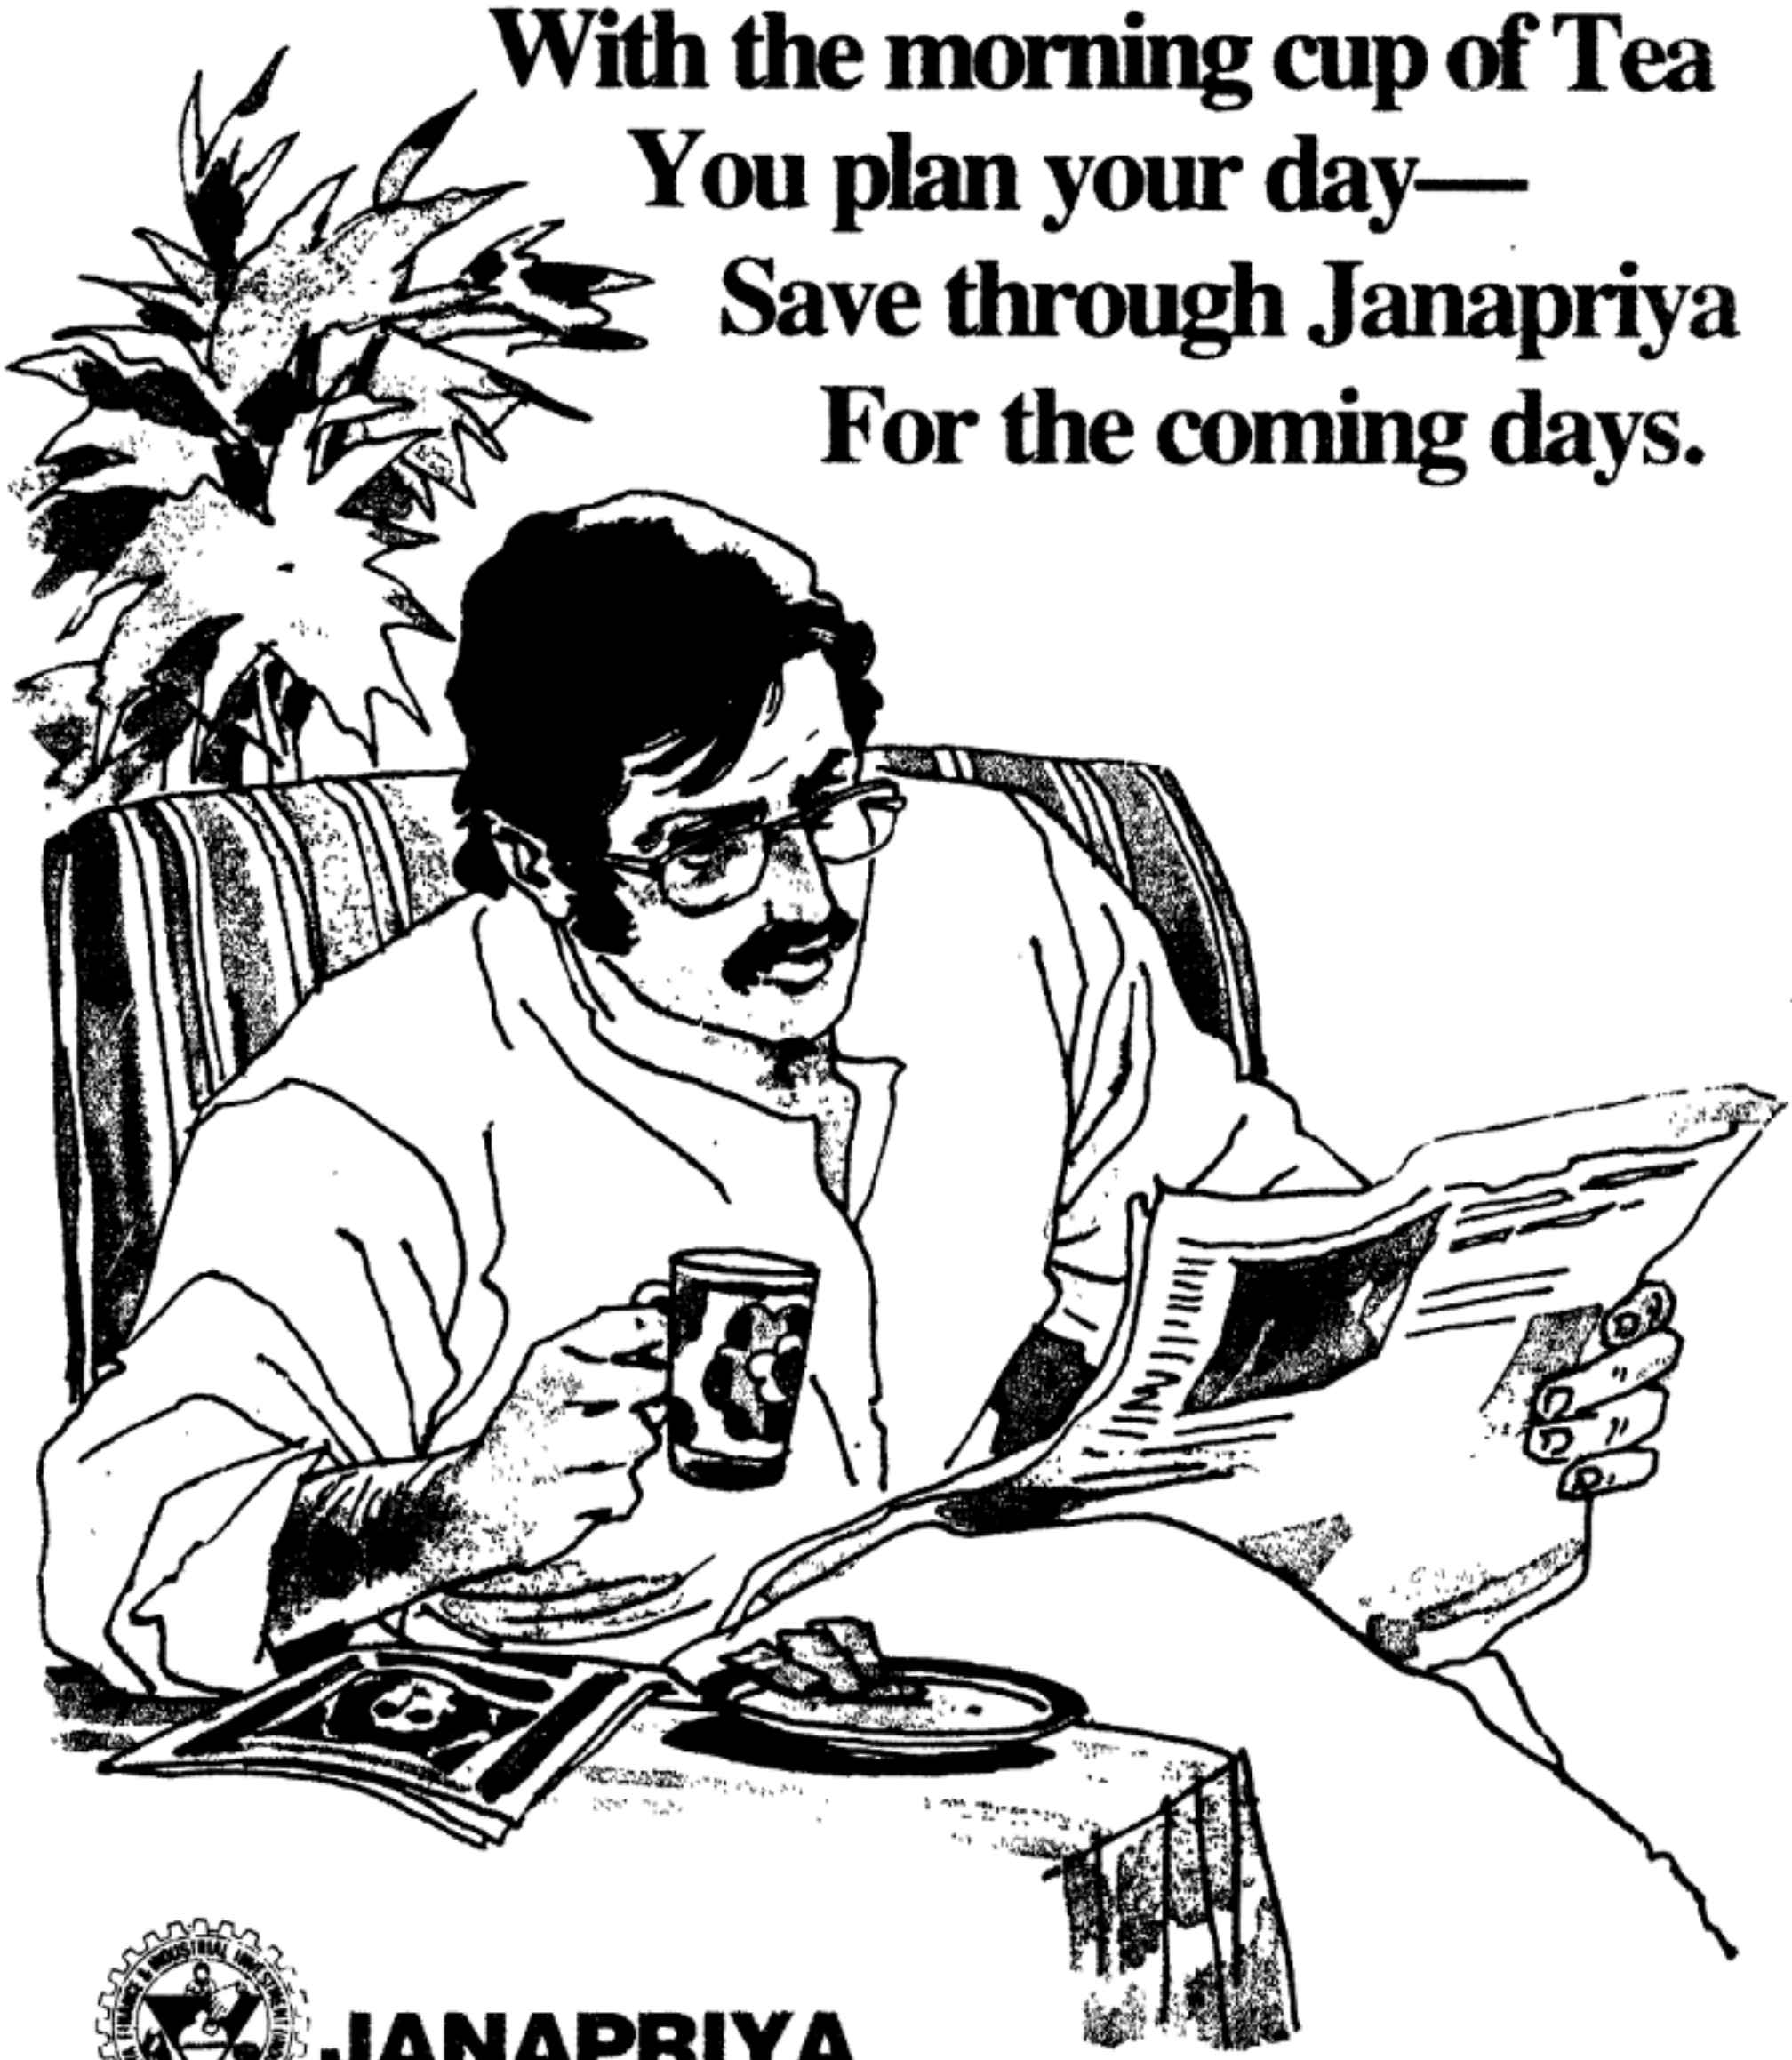
Snippets from the world press

The return of afternoon tea

Afternoon tea is staging one of its comebacks, according to The Times of London. It notes that tourists can be overheard talking about high tea under the misapprehension that high means posh in the high and mighty sense. In any case, they will have to get away from the metropolis to resort towns like Torquay and Perth where dainty afternoon teas have never been out of fashion. Small sandwiches, fresh scones and fancy cakes are served with tea at these places

What is new is that London's big luxury hotels are now making a selling point of their teas. The usual accompaniment is an item or two good baking which has always been the essence of a good afternoon tea, the paper points out.

Across the Atlantic, in New York, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel offers "the best tea value in the world", according to The Guardian. The exact spot: famous Peacock Alley Lounge where a pianist plays Cole Porter. The approximate cost: about £10 for two at current rates.



Good tea moving away from India?

In India, the world's top tea producing and drinking country, it appears, however, that a good cup of tea is getting increasingly difficult to find outside the private home.

At one end of scale, the fivestar-plus hotels serve an indifferent cup of tea more often than not. This is particularly unfortunate as tourists staying in such hotels associate India with good tea and look forward to enjoying a good cup. Surely, the hotels could order special quality blends for their own use—no tea bags please—and take particular care with the brewing.

At another end of the scale, the celebrated "Irani" tea shops in Bombay are doing a vanishing trick, according to a columnist in Indian Express. Firdaus, where Narayan Surve, the Marathi poet, wrote most of his poems over cups of hot and steaming tea, is still holding its own. And there still is

London auction prices fall as tea supplies improve

The sharp fall in London tea prices during the month of February brought the all-tea average to 237 77 pence—its lowest level since early September, 1984 Dealers attribute the decline to abundant supplies in the wake of last year's good crops According to Commodity Bulletin, stocks in the U K are reported to be very high at around 51 million kgs., almost 50 per cent more than what is generally considered necessary to keep the market running smoothly

Declining trend for coffee and cocoa as well

Prices of plantation crops such as coffee and cocoa are also on the retreat, notes Robin Stainer in The Guardian. Supplies are now more freely available than they were just a few months ago and the picture is unlikely to change much

Brazil's coffee crop has turned out bigger than first forecast and recent good weather has boosted prospects for the second harvest, which begins in a couple of months. Total 1984-85 production in Brazil could easily reach a record Most analysts now think that this season's output will be more than adequate to meet world demand.

West African cocoa production is up sharply this season, after the poor 1983-84 showing when severe drought resulted in serious crop losses. Ivory Coast, the main producer, is expected to bring in a record 1984-85 crop, with Ghana, Nigeria and Cameroon also likely to show gains The better weather that has helped West African cocoa production has also boosted the region's coffee crops

The five golden rules for preparing tea

1. The tea pot should never be cleaned with any detergent. It is sufficient to rinse the pot before use with hot water. Before use fill the pot with hot water and prewarm it in that way.
2. Only fresh cold water should be used and not pre-boiled water. Put it on the stove and bring it to near boiling point. The water should simmer for 2-3 minutes, so that the chlorine and other gases disappear. The tea water should always be heated in one and the same container, in which nothing else other than water is boiled.
3. One calculates per cup ½ to 1 teaspoon tea plus ½ to 1 teaspoon per tea pot, depending on the type of tea and the desired strength. (½ litre of water—4 cups of tea=7 to 12 grams of tea).

4. The required amount of heated water should be poured immediately and at one time onto the tea. The tea should soak in a closed tea pot and if possible be kept under a tea cosy. In general 5 minutes. (Broken tea: 4 minutes, leaf tea: 6 to 7 minutes).
5. Stir the tea. Pour the tea into the cup. Milk should now be trickled into the tea. Stir.

Tea Irrigation

Applying the right quantum of water at the right time is the essence of tea irrigation as R.N. Chatterjee explains.

Successful irrigation is more than just applying water. It is a complex interaction of soil, water, agronomy and economies, all of which are continuously evolving with new knowledge and technology.

Irrigation is not only a necessity in areas traditionally regarded as drought prone but is also an important concomitant to counteract climatic changes which might be diminishing rainfall in many other areas as well. Thus, irrigation is now being implemented where it had never previously been considered either necessary or economic. And it also makes sense to have an irrigation system as an insurance to project expensive investments in replanting and inputs to avail of good prices when they are available.

New land for planting is in short supply. Therefore, the major part of increased production will have to come from increased yields. If targets in tea production are to be met, irrigation will necessarily have to be one of the important enabling factors in the achievement of these targets.

It is a common present-day practice to apply 2 inches of rainfall a month either at one time or as split doses, i.e., 1 inch in 15 days. This practice has generated some controversy and it is said that the amount irrigation should be considered according to.

—Soil status
—Land slope
—Severity of prune
—Root development
— Soil moisture status
—Economic factors i.e.,: Cost of irrigating
Crop value
Cost of production

An authority on the subject has specifically recommended consideration of the above factors. His views are: "To say that tea bush requires two inches or four inches of rainfall is incorrect. A detailed analysis according to the above factors can be the only guiding principle".

Indeed, various trials have shown that 3 inches and more per month does give very good results. The amount can be split into more than one dose at a time depending on the soil type and bush and climatic conditions.

The following are some gardens that follow an application of between 3" and 4" per month:

Baintbarrie Divn. of Sylee Tea Estate	—	4"
Mornai Tea Estate	—	4"
Choibari Tea Estate	—	3"
Chaper Tea Estate	—	3"

The increase in yield at these estates has been found to be around 27 to 30 per cent. Tensiometers can be helpful in determining the frequency and quantum of water to apply.

Experts at the Tea Research Association have been stressing "irrigation at the right time with the right quantum of water" implying that it is meaningless to irrigate otherwise. Their other priority is drainage. It is important to associate drainage in tandem with irrigation. Planning either irrigation or drainage in isolation is ill-advised.

To conclude, a rule of thumb is better than nothing but in dealing with a complex subject like tea production each garden should endeavour to analyse the benefits and economics of different irrigation applications. In any case refinement in irrigation techniques and monitoring of soil moisture levels will always pay dividends.

The Season that was and future projections

Records were shattered and new heights established during 1984, describes the directors of J. Thomas & Co. Pvt. Ltd . in an authoritative review.

1984 has been a phenomenal year of growth for the Indian tea industry where all previous records have been shattered and new heights established Emerging from the inertia of stagnating tea prices through the seventies, the industry has broken free of its shackles Having taken a good lead ahead in 1983 it has in a remarkable effort broken several records during 1984

- a record crop of 645 3 million kg showing an increase of 9 6% over last year,
- record all India auction price-average of Rs. 28 59,
- highest quantity (420 6 million kg) sold through the public auctions,
- largest ever export earnings of Rs 744 92 crores.

Tea prices during 1984 have remained buoyant and stable, both in India and the world The year has reflected a realistic value of tea, tempered globally by what could now be recognised as a true balance of the supply-demand equation.

The total crop harvested in 1984 amounted to 645 3 million kg. A year of fairly good weather and rainfall coupled with adequate field inputs contributed to an increase of 45 3 m kg. in the first half of the year and 11 m kg. during the second half, bringing the total increase in crop to 56.3 m. kg. by the year-end, compared to 1983.

Tea producers have, after years of low returns, reacted positively to the stimulus provided by the remunerative price levels of 1983 and 1984 The majority of the surplus, wherever possible, has been ploughed back into the estates and the results have been reflected visibly in the year's crop.

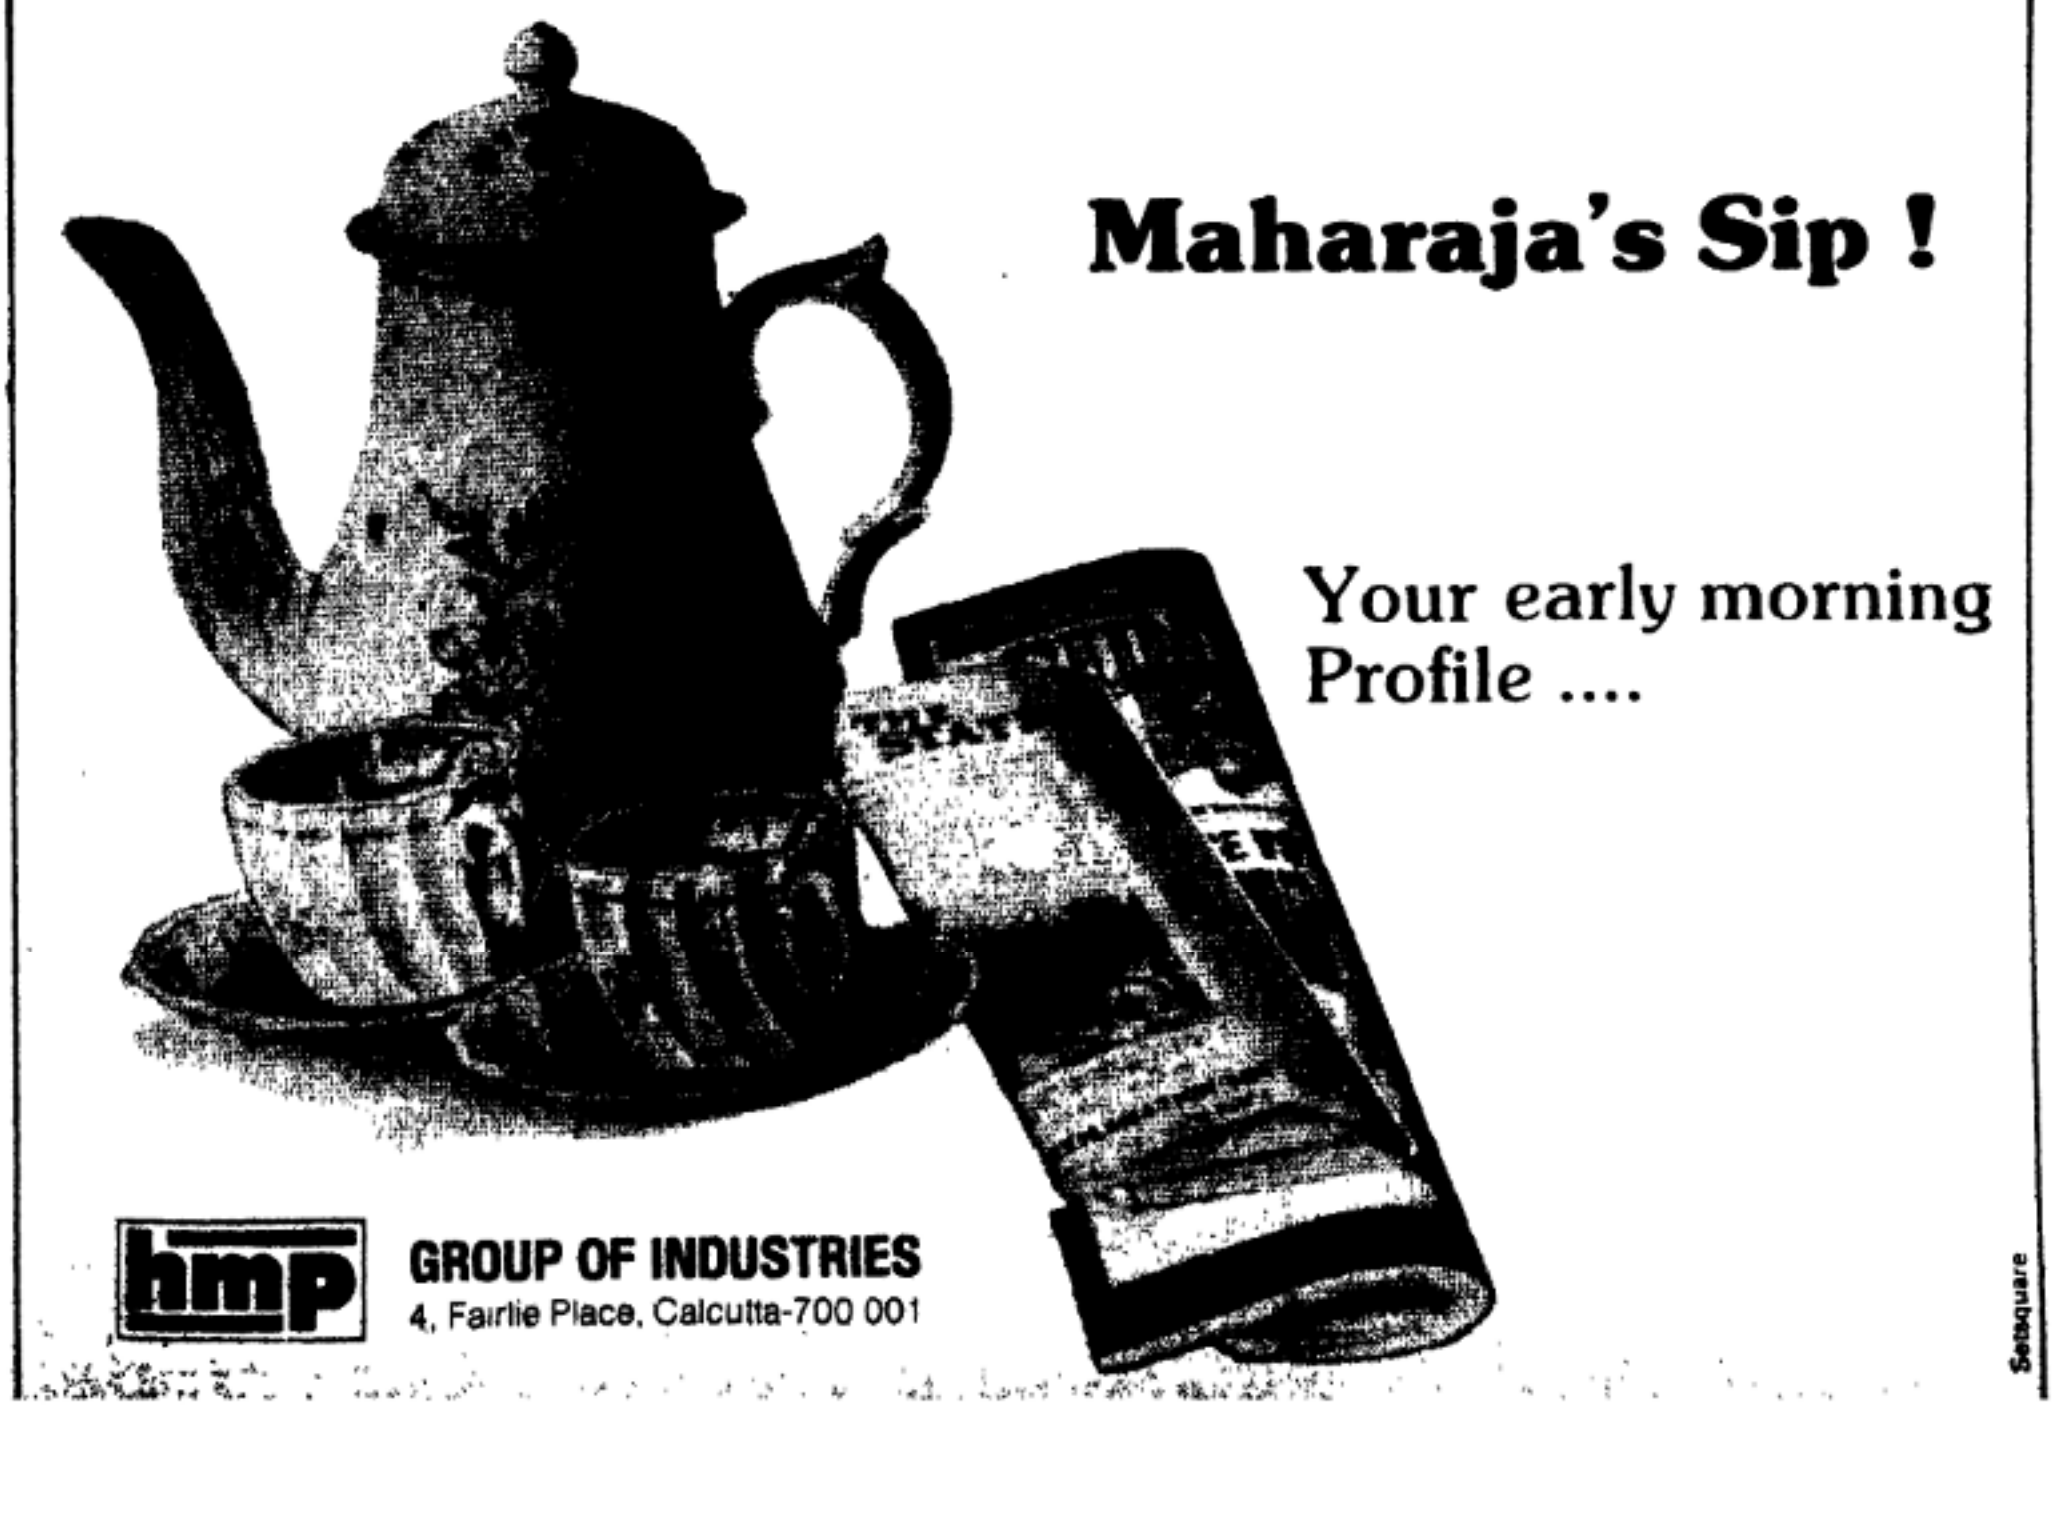
Improved cultivation practices, liberal doses of fertilisers, adequate pest control measures and extension of planted areas together with scientifically-aided propagation of high yielding stock, each contributed in adequate measure to achieve this record production; almost a third of the total world tea production. To this, north India contributed 496.7 m. kg and south India 148.6 m. kg. showing respective increases of 23 m. kg and 33 3 m. kg



The total production of major producing countries during 1984 has recorded an increase of 85.6 m. kg. over 1983. It is significant that India alone has contributed 56.7 m. kg. to this increase.

A record 420.6 m. kg. was sold through the public auctions in India in 1984 compared to 338.5 m. kg. in 1983 and one may record with a measure of pride and satisfaction that the time-tested system of auction-sale handled this efficiently, smoothly and expeditiously. A substantial weight of the additional quantity was channelised through this stream by a government order requiring producers to sell 70% of their total production through the auction network and the West Bengal state government's decision for further enhancement in the Rural Employment and Production cess which made it unremunerative for producers to sell teas directly The objective of this was to ensure a stable and enduring price structure and to establish a sound basis of supply to the home markets Restrictions on the export of CTC teas announced on 24th December, 1983 remained in force up to 12th May, 1984 and were reimposed from 3rd September, 1984, as a protective measure to contain domestic tea prices The Government wisely did not think it expedient to impose any other harsh measures to check the price rise by levying further duties and imports on the industry

Earlier, there was industrywide concern over the marginal increase registerd in the Darjeeling price averages last year, which, relative to the high cost of production in the district had continued to be inadequate for any significant development work. During the year under review, however, this district's average registered a healthy increase to allow it to share in the fortunes of the industry.

Historically, tea has been a major foreign exchange earner for the country and 1984 proved to be a milestone. Although the total volume of exports amounted to 214 7 m. kg. against the 1983 figure of 208.5 m. kg and high of 241 2 m. kg. achieved in 1981, total earnings from exports of tea surged to an impressive Rs. 744 92 crores in 1981 This was achieved by a substantially higher unit value realisation of Rs. 34.69 per kg. A new emphasis was also projected by way of value-added exports which were exempted from export controls and to which both the producers and merchant-exporters lent their unstinted effort.

The focal points of India's tea exports during the year were the increased off-take by the trade-pact countries, the considerably larger volume of Orthodox exports and the resulting lower CTC exports brought about by official policy. This, doubtless, highlights the crucially changing scenario of increased consumption of tea in the developing countries, particularly in the Middle East, off-set dramatically by the lower Indian CTC exports and demand for CTC tea from the countries of the Western hemisphere. The USSR, Iran, Iraq and Egypt emergerd as burgeoning markets for Indian teas and but for the restriction on CTC exports, some of these countries would have accounted for even larger off-takes.

The merchant-exporters have, from the very beginning of the organised tea trade in India, contributed greatly to the country's export effort In 1984, however, their operations were increasingly shackled by controls, and while the object may have been to maximise export earnings and yet leave enough tea for the internal markets at a reasonable price, very often these acted as a major disincentive to exports

It would be appropriate to mention that the prevalence of high taxes continues to erode profitablity in the industry. While most official policy aims at protecting the interests of the domestic consumer, very little has been done to ensure that the tax structure is suitably rationalised to allow sufficient ploughbacks. Surplus funds must be made available to the industry for devlopment, further extension and rejuvenation of areas under tea and investment in new machineries. Funds are also necessary for the continued improvement of labour welfare schemes in which the industry has already achieved a fair measure of success.

India has earned, once again, the distinction of being the largest producer, consumer and exporter of tea in the world The limelight of this effort must fall on the producers who have consistently sought to fulfil the aspirations of the industry and the nation. Historically, the cyclical pattern of tea prices has witnessed more frequent and prolonged stretches of depression than prosperity and the improving returns of the last two years cannot but be well-deserved by the resilient breed of producers and planters who have provided the world, through their gigantic but oft-unrecognised and silent effort, the wonderful 'cuppa'—the cup that cheers.

We've much of the world's best tea all wrapped up

From the hills of Darjeeling and the plains of the Assam Valley in North Eastern India, the estates of Macneill and Magor and their associates provide the world with the finest quality tea.

Tea that is sought after by all the world's most important auction centres and private buyers.

Which means the likelihood is that our tea is in the best packs throughout the world.

We've been around since the earliest days of tea in India, and our predecessors were growing and auctioning tea as early as the the 1960's.

So next time you drink a really good cup of tea, think about Macneill and Magor.

Trends for 1985

Will the last two seasons' boom continue? Perhaps the price levels may not be as good, says Vijay Dudeja in discussing trends for 1985.

 No takers for poor teas

The 1983 and 1984 seasons have both seen boom conditions because demand was greater than supply. In 1985, once again, supply is likely to be somewhat short of demand. However, the gap is being narrowed. It had become clear in 1984 that poor teas have no takers. Neither the internal buyers nor the international buyers want them. A largest weight of poor varieties remain unsold at all auction centres of India. The weight of poor teas remaining unsold is so large at present that it has largely contributed to the change in market sentiment. This trend will continue in 1985. Quality will pay in 1985.

 Poor orthodox: no home

In particular, poor orthodox teas will find no home.

 Prices: non-issue for common man

Despite government's concern at rising tea prices, the common man in India has shown any great concern, because the cost of actual tea in a tea cup is still meagre. A kilogram of crush-tear-curl or CTC tea (Indians drink CTC variety) produces 500 large cups, or 1,000 small cups (bhand); the common man generally drinks the latter. The small cups are sold at 40p. per cup. Even if the vendor pays Rs 40.00 a kg for tea, the actual cost of tea leaf is 4p. per cup. Approximately 6p. is vendor's profit per cup. The cost of sugar, milk and fuel is 30p. or 75% in a cup of tea. Thus in reality it is the other ingredients—sugar, milk, fuel, etc.—which are the main contributors to the cost of a cup of tea.

 Tea is not essential commodity

In my opinion, tea is not an essential commodity. Wheat, rice, edible oils and clothing are the real essentials. For consider the fact that per capita consumption of tea in India is a little over 0.5 kg. per person per year. With such a low consumption, it is debatable whether tea is at all an essential commodity. Taking the retail price of tea at Rs. 40 per kg., the expenditure on tea per person is only Rs. 20 per annum.

The tradition of century, Tosh serves you the finest Indian tea.

WALT DISNEY

King of the Magic Kingdom

Derek Wilson profiles one of the geniuses of our times, in an extract from his book Extraordinary People (published by Pan Books, London, and distributed in India by Rupa & Company, 15 Bankim Chatterjee Street, Calcutta 700 073; price £ 5.95)

In 1966, the year that Walter Elias Disney died:

240,000,000 people saw a Disney film;
100,000,000 people every week saw a Disney TV show;
800,000,000 people read a Disney book or magazine;
50,000,000 people listened to a Disney record;
80,000,000 people bought Disney licensed merchandise;
150,000,000 people read a Disney comic strip;
80,000,000 people saw a Disney educational film;
6,700,000 people visited Disneyland.

That, in crude statistical terms, is a measure of the achievement of the man who arrived in Hollywood in 1923 with 40 dollars in his pocket.

Walt Disney took a primitive and undeveloped technique—animated film cartoon—and turned it into a multi-billion-dollar growth industry. He turned his basic creations to economic advantage in every possible way by licensing the production of comic strips, tee-shirts, alarm clocks, plastic mugs and a host of other manufactured goods for children. He started with nothing: he died a millionaire. But there is much more to the Disney saga than a rags-to-riches story. He was not just a very successful business tycoon. Disney had a motto which he applied to himself and which he used to drive on his employees and colleagues—'Dream, diversify, and never miss an angle.' And for Walt Disney the dreaming always came first.

Dreams were essential to a child born into a large, poor family; there was little else to amuse the young mind. Elias Disney, the head of the household, was a man who had tried his hand at many things and failed, slipping progressively down the economic scale. Walt spent the first eight years of his life on a small Missouri farm. Then his father was forced to sell up and move to Kansas City where he organised a news round. Elias expected his sons to help him without payment. Walt was regularly hauled from bed at 3.30 am and sent out delivering the heavy journals in all weathers. Elias was a hard man, mean as well as poor. His children were never given toys and the slightest transgression was punished with the strap

His obvious talent for drawing received no encouragement from his father but his meagre earnings enabled him to attend a Saturday morning art class.

By the time he left home he had had enough of working for someone else. He was determined to be his own boss. For years this meant eking out a living on the fringes of the newspaper and commercial art worlds as a freelance cartoonist. During this period he made a few experiments with animated film cartoons. The 'short,' a crudely simple piece of entertainment based on a sequence of jerky, moving drawings, had become an established part of the programme in many movie theatres. They had no sound, of course, and, like all silent films, animated cartoons might have remained museum pieces, bypassed by changing fashion and improved technology. The man who prevented this was Walt Disney. In 1923 he moved to Hollywood, determined to make his name in the film industry.

He was joined by Roy, who took care of the finances and attempted, not always successfully, to anchor Walt's soaring enthusiasm. They produced shorts and just about managed to make ends meet. They also learned the hard way about the savage competition in the movie industry: in 1927 their New York distributor poached some of the Disney artists and set up his own studio in opposition. Walt travelled to the East Coast and tried, unsuccessfully, to resolve the crisis. Refusing to be downcast, he cabled Roy before his return, 'Everthing OK. Coming home.' And on the long train ride back to California he created a new cartoon character. It was Mortimer—soon to be re-christened Mickey Mouse.

'The Mouse,' as he was referred to in the studio, was an instant success, particularly when Disney, pioneering in this as in so many other fields, used sound in Steamboat Willy, the third Mickey Mouse adventure. Within a decade Mickey and his 'gang'—Donald Duck, Goofy, Pluto, Minnie, et al—were known and loved throughout the world.

One dream that Disney cherished for years was the 'magic kingdom.' He wanted to extend his world of illusion beyond the two-dimensional limitations of the cinema screen. He wanted to create it somewhere where people could fully experience the Disney vision, could escape into the pure, happy, clean, innocent realm of idealised childhood. Even in the 1930s he played with the idea of an amusement park to end all amusement parks. No one, not even Roy, shared his enthusiasm. In 1952, using partly his own money, because his brother refused to back 'Walt's screwy idea,' Disney hired technicians (immediately dubbed 'imagineers') to turn his dream into reality. He found a site. He defined the character of his kingdom. He canvassed support from financiers and fairground experts. They all told him he was crazy. The creation of Disneyland and its Florida counterpart, Disneyworld, has shown that it was not Disney who was crazy. Millions of people every year visit these incredible pleasure grounds which are now among the biggest tourist attractions in the world.

Sum Trouble

After being showered with accolades from international agencies for her genius, Shakuntala Devi, the Indian mathematical wizard had a 'bitter' taste of success. A widely-publicised public show she had given in Kanpur recently had to be called off as a group of unruly demonstrators barred her from coming on stage Following a threat from the hostile demonstrators who called themselves "rationalists," the show had to be cancelled. A large contingent of policemen also had to be called to the hotel where Ms Devi was staying to prevent any violence there The allegations against Ms Devi were that she was "misusing her genius" for pecuniary gain and was using her skills to prepare horoscopes at exorbitant rates. After the incident, Shakuntala Devi admitted that she was indeed selling talismans and charging people for horoscopes But she said she was making money for a noble purpose—to build a mathematics institute in India that would be the first of its kind. Not to be taken in by her sweet words, the protestors demanded that in future geniuses like Shakuntala Devi should not be allowed to indulge in such objectionable activites under the pretext of fostering progress in mathematics

The Asian Sensation

Not too many Indians in India can claim to have heard her golden voice yet. But lovely Sheila Chandra, whom we had the pleasure of putting on our cover (29 January 1984), is doing well as London's latest Asian pop star. And she is proud of her origins in Kerala: "I'm proud to be an Asian, an Asian woman and an Asian woman in the music business." Following the success of her albums Out on my Own and Quiet! which sold more than 20,000 copies in the UK and the Scandinavian countries, she has come out with an even better solo called The Struggle." The album," she says, "differs considerably from Quiet! The title has a very positive connotation for me. It's a struggle for something—a challenge." Winning acclaim as a singer amid tough competition is no mean task, but Ms Chandra is sure her Struggle will succeed. And she is strong enough for it "On the album sleeve I hold a spanner to represent strength. It's not destructive as, say a hammer would be...I'm feminine—yet very determined."

The 'Proper' Biographer

It takes more than literary skill to recreate the life of a dazzling personality who presided over the transfer of power from British to Indian hands And Philip Ziegler, author of Mountbatten: The Official Biography appears to have done a commendable job on his subject, judging by the reviews it has got so far. Accuracy, of course, was a major concern Ziegler claims that the authors of Freedom at Midnight, the other bestseller based on the events of independence and partition had made Mountbatten out to be just the hero he would have liked to be known as Apparently, Collins and Lapierre, the famous duo who wrote the book, got most of their information from Mountbatten himself. Ziegler, despite being the 'official biographer,' claims to have been more objective—to cater to his conservative British readers

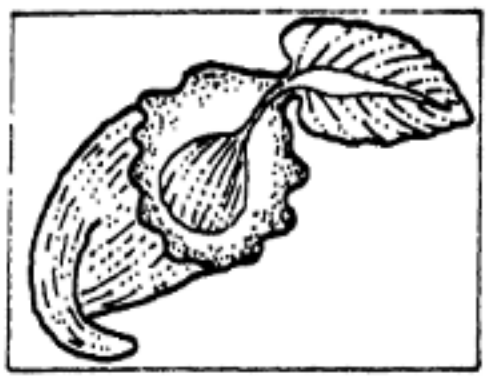
A Fine Account

Popular as the father of cost and management accountancy in India, N.K. Bose has devoted almost his whole life to the development of this laborious yet crucial science His greatest achievement was his success in getting the Companies Act amended to provide for cost audit, which opened up a new vista for cost accountancy and gave a new dimension to the profession. Recognition came Mr Bose's way as the executive committee of the Confederation of Asian and Pacific Accountants (CAPA), consisting of members from Australia, Canada, Hong Kong, India, Japan, Korea, New Zealand and the Philippines at its meeting in November 1983, unanimously elected him president of the body.

The Human Connection

Immunologists in West Germany, working with biologists and psychiatrists at the University of Pennsylvania, have discovered that certain psychiatric disorders might be related to a rare virus disease of sheep and horses. The ailment, Brona disease, causes spasms, paralysis and either excitability or apathy in such animals in Germany and Switzerland. The brain tissue taken from infected animals and injected into healthy chickens and chimpanzees among other creatures had been known to cause behavioural abnormalities and reduction in cognitive ability. Now according to a report in the journal Science, researchers suspect a human link. The scientists took serum samples from 979 psychiatric patients in West Germany and the United States and tested them for the kind of antibodies that would indicate they had been exposed at some time to the Brona virus. The screening turned up 16 patients with positive Brona antibody reactions, all of whom also had depression, mostly of a cyclic nature.

A Double-action Drug

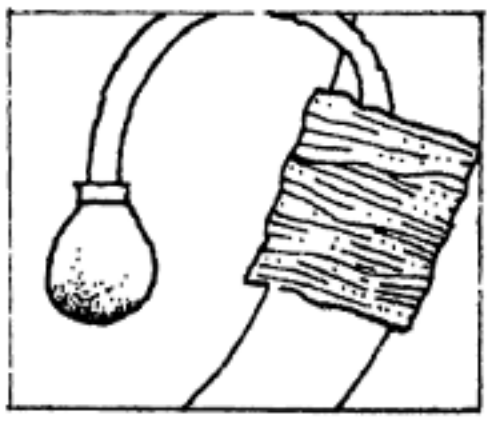


A drug that prevents thrombosis has also proved effective in checking the spread of melanoma, a dangerous skin cancer. The treatment has been devised by a team working with Dr Ellen Rhodes at the St Helier and Kingston Hospital group in Surrey. 39 patients with deeply invasive melanomas were treated by a combination of surgery and administrations of the anti-thrombotic drug dipyridamole. 30 of the patients (77 per cent) have survived five years or more, compared with 32 per cent for those treated by surgery alone. Melanomas are black or dark brown tumours often less than one centimetre in diameter, and to the untrained eye many look like ordinary moles. The tumours themselves are easily removed but any remaining melanoma cells can be rapidly dispersed in the bloodstream and even a small growth on the skin may have "seeded" secondary deposits in the lymph nodes or main organs of the body before excision.

Repairing Bones

Scientists at a research company in California have produced two protein-like substances from pulverised cow-leg bone which could bolster the ability of human bones to repair themselves. Dr Saied M. Seyedin and other researchers at Collagen Corp. in Palo Alto have isolated and purified two similar protein-like substances called cartilage inducing factors A and B. In a lab these factors stimulated formation of cartilage precursors in cells that otherwise did not produce that kind of tissue.

Exporting Carnivorous Plants



Marston Exotics in Somerset, England, is the only horticultural nursery in Britain that is entirely devoted to growing and selling carnivorous plants. Here many species—like Venus flytrap, waterwheel plants, rainbow plants, sundews, pitcher plants, butterworts and bladderworts—are grown and exported back to countries where they have almost become extinct or near their natural habitat. Mr Adrian Slack, who founded the company, says, "Conservation is most important. We are hoping to clone some of the rarer species such as the climbing pitcher plants or monkey cups (nepenthes) from the mountains of South-East Asia. One of them, nepenthes raja, has a huge pouch or cup, capable of catching rodents and small reptiles."

Detecting Disease

Doctors in the United States have developed a new device which can find out in just a few minutes whether a patient has herpes or any of ten other viral and bacterial infections. The instrument's name is a jawbreaker: the multi-parameter light-scattering spectrometer. It uses a computer and a cell-counting machine called a flow cytometer. The latter illuminates cells in a sample from the patient with polarised laser light. It's theoretically possible to do this with any cell—including those affected with herps or any other virus—because each one scatters the light in a distinctive pattern that can be used to identify it. The device can shorten hospital stays and check indiscriminate use of antibiotics.

The Silent Attacker

In Wiltshire, England, the failure to diagnose high blood pressure in a patient who frequently complained of head and neckache has cost two doctors £139,500 in damages. The diagnosis of severe hypertension was made after the patient had suffered a crippling stroke. Most patients are under the wrong impression that if they have no symptoms their blood pressure must be normal. Hypertension attacks silently. Headaches, nosebleeds, breathlessness, changes in vision, chest pain or even a loss of intellectual ability are the results of hypertension and are not directly related to blood pressure. Although headaches are difficult to evaluate, pain at the back of the head or in the neck is usually prominent; the most common cause is probably an arthritic neck. One small clue to the presence of hypertension has been recently reported in the Lancet. It seems that stentorious breathing and heavy snoring may be a sign of high blood pressure.

For those born between 15 May and 14 June:

Most of you are meditative by nature and you always like to be away from the madding crowd of towns and cities. You spend most of your time reading books in solitude. You will do well if you take up teaching. People respect you and value your comments. You are guided by some principles in life and you refuse to compromise with them in order to make temporary gains. However, some of you are very sentimental and at times your heart rules over head. Women born during this period are extremely hard-working.

NEW DELHI: The next time you go to a hospital for treatment and have to go into the operation theatre for some minor operation do not forget to take an attendant to look after your clothes which have to be left behind. For, the clothes could be stolen and you may have to face the prospect of returning home in just undergarments. Mr O.P. Gupta of Sitaram Bazar went to LNJP hospital on the morning of 6th May. As the practice is, he discarded his clothes when he was summoned into the operation theatre and wore the gown supplied by the hospital. However on coming out, much to his dismay and embarrassment, the bag which contained his clothes and purse was missing. Efforts to trace the missing bag proved futile and the hospital authorities pleaded helplessness. The patient finally rang up his son who arrived with another set of clothes—Indian Express (B.R. DARJEELING: Strange as it may sound, six young Nepalese boys of Aloobari area, on the outskirts of Darjeeling town, are facing the wrath of the local panchayat. They had been charged with 'roasting' a sweet-looking dog for a feast in a nearby forest. The matter came to light when a resident of the locality started making frantic enquiries about his missing dog a few days ago. Later the truth came out when, one after another, six young boys of the area were charged with stealing the dog and gobbling up the same. The charge proved correct when the senior members of the area conducted their own panchayat. It was stated that these boys were very friendly with a youth from Mizoram and got the "clue" of a tasty dog meat. Better late than never the boys prepared the recipe in good faith and had a good meal of the roasted dog only to face the wrath of elders. The panchayat elders are now toying with the idea whether to "outcast" the youths from the community—Amrita Bazar Patrika (B.K. Salwan, 99 APO).

BOMBAY: A scribe, specialising in crime stories for a Hindi magazine, staged a real life drama by looting the Oriental Bank of Commerce of Rs 4.17 lakhs in the northern suburb of Borivili on 3 May. The writer and his nine-member gang looted the bank at the point of knives and pistols. They escaped in a taxi but were subsequently traced by the police. The writer and four members of the gang had been arrested, the police said. The police said the writer prepared the plan with the help of an employee of the bank, whose services were terminated last month. The police have seized Rs 65,000 from the arrested persons. They are on the lookout for other members of the gang—The Statesman (Miss Janiya Ukhade, Hooghly)

GUDALUR: The primary health centre at Pandalur, near here, which was upgraded and declared open on 10 May, was closed the very next day. Dr H.V. Hande, health minister, on 10 May declared open the health centre with a bed strength of 24 and constructed at a cost of Rs 5.89 lakhs. The residents of Pandalur felt happy that long-pending demand to upgrade the health centre had been fulfilled at last. But to their utter dismay they found that the centre was not functioning on the next day and the reason given for the same was that there was no adequate water supply. The beds brought from Udhagamandalam to Pandalur for the inaugural function, were also taken back—Northern India Patrika (B. Meenakshi Sundaram, Trichy)

CALCUTTA: There was excitement in the Badurbagan area in north Calcutta, when a briefcase was spotted at the pedestal of a bust of Indira Gandhi. Wiser after the recent transistor-bomb blasts in north India, nobody dared touch it fearing that a bomb might have been planted inside it. Soon a large crowd gathered there and the police were informed. The police took the briefcase to the Brigade Parade Ground where the experts of the explosives department of the union government joined them. Passersby were asked to move away and the briefcase was opened with the aid of detonators. Nothing was found inside except some "papers." The police are trying to trace the person, who left the briefcase there—The Statesman (P.A. Kuria, Kharagpur)

In winning the international tournament in Reggio Emilia, Hungarian grandmaster Lajos Portisch displayed some of the best form of his long and distinguished career. Though never a world championship challenger, he has been a more or less permanent fixture in the Candidates' series and remains one of the foremost tournament players of modern times. The following game from Reggio is, like most major tournament games, rather long, but nonetheless an enthralling contest. We also see that, despite his success in Tilburg, poor Tony Miles has never really come to terms with Portisch.

Double dummy problems are something of an acquired taste, and I don't find them interesting when the play is complicated and artificial. But I like this one because it is 'pretty' and illustrates a theme not too far removed from practical play.

Dealer West Game all

There is no bidding in a double dummy problem, but one may imagine that South opens One Spade and becomes declarer in Four Spades doubled. West leads the king of hearts. How can South make ten tricks?

Having some experience of the mentality of problem-setters, I didn't find it too difficult, but if you have led a sheltered life you could spend several hours without coming close to the solution.

If you have done your best, here is the answer:

Ruff the opening lead and dispose of the ace of hearts (obviously!) Pick up the trumps, cash ♣ A, and exit with ♥ 3. Discard diamonds from North, clubs from South, arriving at this position:

North ruffs the next heart, and South discards a club. Whichever suit East discards allows South to establish a winner

There is nothing new about this problem but it might serve to tease your brains a bit. Three men travelling in America decided to economise and share a room in a hotel. The desk clerk told them that it would cost them $30 so each of them paid $10 and went to their room. However, shortly afterwards, the clerk realised that he had made a mistake and had overcharged the three men. The tariff for the room was only $25, so calling a bell boy he gave him $5 and told him to return it to the men. Ever ready to make a quick buck, the bell boy decided that it would make matters much easier if he kept $2 and returned $1 to each of the men. This meant that each of the three men paid $9, or a total or $27. With the $2 that the bell boy kept, the total came to $29. Can you say what happened to the missing dollar?

Cure for the Kidneys

Japanese scientists have transformed an abandoned Italian technique for removing poisonous wastes from human blood into what might be a money-spinner. They have come up with a drug that promises relief to the 50,000 Japanese at risk from kidney disease.

The kidney is a filter, removing from the blood poisonous body wastes such as urea and ammonia The average person produces more than 50 grams of urea every day and, unless most is removed, it will kill. Dialysis machines do the same filtering with chemical "adsorbents," usually activated carbons, but their capacity to extract urea is poor. Patients must spend tiresomely long periods connected to expensive kidney machines at least two to three times a week.

In 1968, Dr Carmelo Giordano, president of the Italian Nephrology Society, developed a drug called dialdehyde starch (DAS), with a high urea-adsorbing capacity, by chemically treating starch extracted from potatoes and maize It was most effective when eaten, since it removed toxic urea and ammonia from blood circulating to the intestine. The result of his trials was remarkable. The need for dialysis dropped to almost nothing. However, there was a nasty side-effect: severe diarrhoea within two or three hours of the first dose. Why this happened is not known, but it led to a premature end to all research work on the project

Until now. Tinkering with DAS, scientists at the Research Institute for Polymers and Textiles in Tsukuba Science City, Japan, have improved the adsorbent's performance considerably. According to Dr Toshimi Shimizu, whose research into DAS has been part of an artificial-organ project, Dr Giordano's DAS worked by combining its surface "aldehyde" groups with "amino" groups in urea and ammonia molecules. But this process was not selective and DAS combined indiscriminately with any amino groups—including those on the body's precious proteins.

Dr Shimizu's group came up with a new version of the substance by chemically reacting the DAS with a protein such as gelatin. The gelatin inactivates the aldehyde groups on the surface of DAS, but not those tucked away inside the molecule. Because urea and ammonia molecules are small, they can penetrate the coated DAS particle and reach the active aldehydes.

Not only does this modified DAS appear to be twice as effective as Dr Giordano's, but it is also selective and no side-effects have emerged in clinical trials so far. Dr Shozo Koshikawa of the Showa University's affiliated hospital in Fujigaoka, Tokyo, believes the potential of DAS is huge. Nearly 80 per cent of the patients with deteriorating kidneys who entered his two-year clinical trial were about to prolong the period before starting dialysis, simply by consuming 20 grams of DAS a day. And once dialysis became necessary, treatment was required less often and for shorter periods than usual.

One note of caution. In some patients the normal frequency and duration of dialysis were still required to remove the build-up of the water that is normally expelled from the body by a healthy kidney. Moreover, the patients had to take 30-40 tablets a day.

Nothing seems to be going right for Dimple Kapadia ever since she walked out of Ashirwaad with her two daughters. She pinned all her hopes on a career in films and the industry in Bombay welcomed her with open arms. But what followed frustrated Dimple. The producers wanted her to work wonders and when most of the movies released did not do too well at the box office, they started neglecting her. Dimple is also facing troubled times on the home front: she has fallen out with her parents and has moved to her own apartment. The tinsel city is agog with rumours that Dimple is seeking a compromise with Rajesh Khanna who is having a grand time with Tina Munim. But Rajesh's response to his former wife's overtures has so far been cold.

Gossip columnists are still in the dark about the Rakhee-Gulzar divorce. On 18 April the film industry was agog with rumours that the divorce case was to be heard. People rushed from court to court but in vain. Some of the journalists even went to Gulzar for his comments. The poet-director snubbed them: "I have always said that my private life is my own and I don't know why people should be so curious about what I am doing about my life." But gossip-mongers are made of sterner stuff and next morning they were out with a scoop. They wrote that a new man in the life of Rakhee has necessitated the divorce.

These days Mandakini and Ashish Chanana spend most of their time together. Moreover, his car is always parked outside her apartment. Ashish, the son of former union minister Dr Charanjit Chanana, has been teamed up with her in Jeetendra's Aag aur Shola. One song together in the rain and they are madly in love.

All seems to be over for Bindiya Goswami. Vinod Mehra has made it public that he has nothing to do with her and producers too are keeping her at a distance. That's a sad end to a promising career.

Fate has played havoc with Suresh Oberoi. Just when he was thinking of giving up modelling, fortune smiled on him and overnight he started receiving offers from well-known film producers. But soon he lost his brother and injured himself seriously in a car accident Scores of actors are waiting on the sidelines to fill the vacancy while Suresh languishes in hospital.

Every time Pramod Chakraborty completes a film he comes up with a mournful statement in which he says he has had enough of the mad, mad ways of the industry and that he is not going to make any more films. It happened again after he completed Jagir (the Bengali version was entitled Teen Murti). "I have had enough of the stars and their whimsical ways. They have lost all interest for even an established filmmaker like me. I shudder to think of the new men who have come in. Anyway, I am sick of the whole thing. I am not going to make any more films. I am going to retire. I have had enough," he said. And just two months later Pramod started his new film based on Shatru (an all-time hit in Bengali) with Rajesh Khanna and many other stars from Bombay.

Lack of Protocol

The chairman of the external affairs ministry's policy planning committee, G. Parthasarathy, is looking cheerful these days. Ever since the war between him and the foreign secretary, Romesh Bhandari began, Mr Parthasarathy looked crestfallen because the younger diplomat outsmarted him on some occasions. On 2 May, however, the tables were turned. Bhandari had convened a meeting of former Indian envoys to the United States of America, for a meeting on the eve of the Prime Minister's visit to the USA. L.K. Jha, Kewal Singh, K.R. Narayanan (now minister of state for planning), B.K. Nehru (Gujarat Governor), K.B. Lall, N.A. Palkhivala, T.N Kaul, P N. Haksar and some other prominent former diplomats were invited But none turned up. Reason: The invitation had been extended not by the foreign secretary (after all Bhandari had served under all these gentlemen at one time or the other) but by a deputy secretary in the foreign office. The next day, some leading journalists, including Girilal Jain, chief editor of The Times of India and Nikhil Chakravartty, were invited for a session because they were considered to be "opinion makers." But in their opinion too, the invitation, coming from a deputy secretary, was not appropriate Ultimately, only L.K. Jha, the former Indian ambassador to the USA, agreed to meet Romesh Bhandari along with a couple of retired officers of the America desk. If the foreign secretary fails in protocol while dealing with dignitaries at home, things can be worse abroad.

Appointment or Disappointment?

P. Shiv Shanker, the former union cabinet minister, has been given a post in the AICC(I) headquarters. No, he is not among the general secretaries. He has been given a vague designation and put in charge of centre-state relations, a subject which is under the consideration of the Sarkaria Commission. When the defeated Andhra politician was brought to Parliament from Gujarat, speculation was rife that he would be inducted into the cabinet again. Even a post was mentioned for him: that of the finance minister. Earlier, when he had not been elected to Parliament, ambassadorial assignments were mooted for him. However, the party post given to him was a big comedown. When A.B.A. Ghani Khan Choudhuri has been made an AICC(I) general secretary and Pranab Kumar Mukherjee the president of the West Bengal PCC(I), one would have expected Shiv Shanker to get a better deal. Gujarat, incidentally, has now become the dumping ground for defeated Congressmen. In total disregard of the anti-reservation sentiments in the state, Gujarat has been burdened with the parliamentary seats of Pranab Mukherjee of West Bengal and Shiv Shanker of Andhra Pradesh. Chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki has to pay the price for remaining in power. When his popularity in the state is at a low ebb, keeping the central leadership happy by accommodating politicians who cannot otherwise come to Parliament is a safe way to remain in power.

P. Shiv Shanker

Importance of Allahabad

Amitabh Bachchan's constituency, Allahabad, has been rewarded for having returned him to Parliament. Though the benefit accruing to Allahabad will not percolate down to the common man, the city can now boast of having a Maruti agency before Kanpur. In the original scheme of things, Kanpur was designated as one of the Phase-II centres for Maruti distributorship. All of a sudden, the city has been shifted to a later phase and Allahabad pitchforked into a prominent place in the plans of Maruti Udyog Ltd. While Lucknow is the state capital, Kanpur is considered the economic capital. The Reserve Bank of India's branch office in UP is located in Kanpur. But this time in Parliament it has not been able to return a celebrity. The sitting MP, Naresh Chandra Chaturvedi, is a political lightweight compared to Amitabh Bachchan, though Chaturvedi has put in many more years in politics than the filmstar. Amitabh Bachchan, though not in the limelight in party sessions and in Parliament, has now started sitting at 2A Motilal Nehru Marg, the private office of Rajiv Gandhi, which he used till he became the Prime Minister.

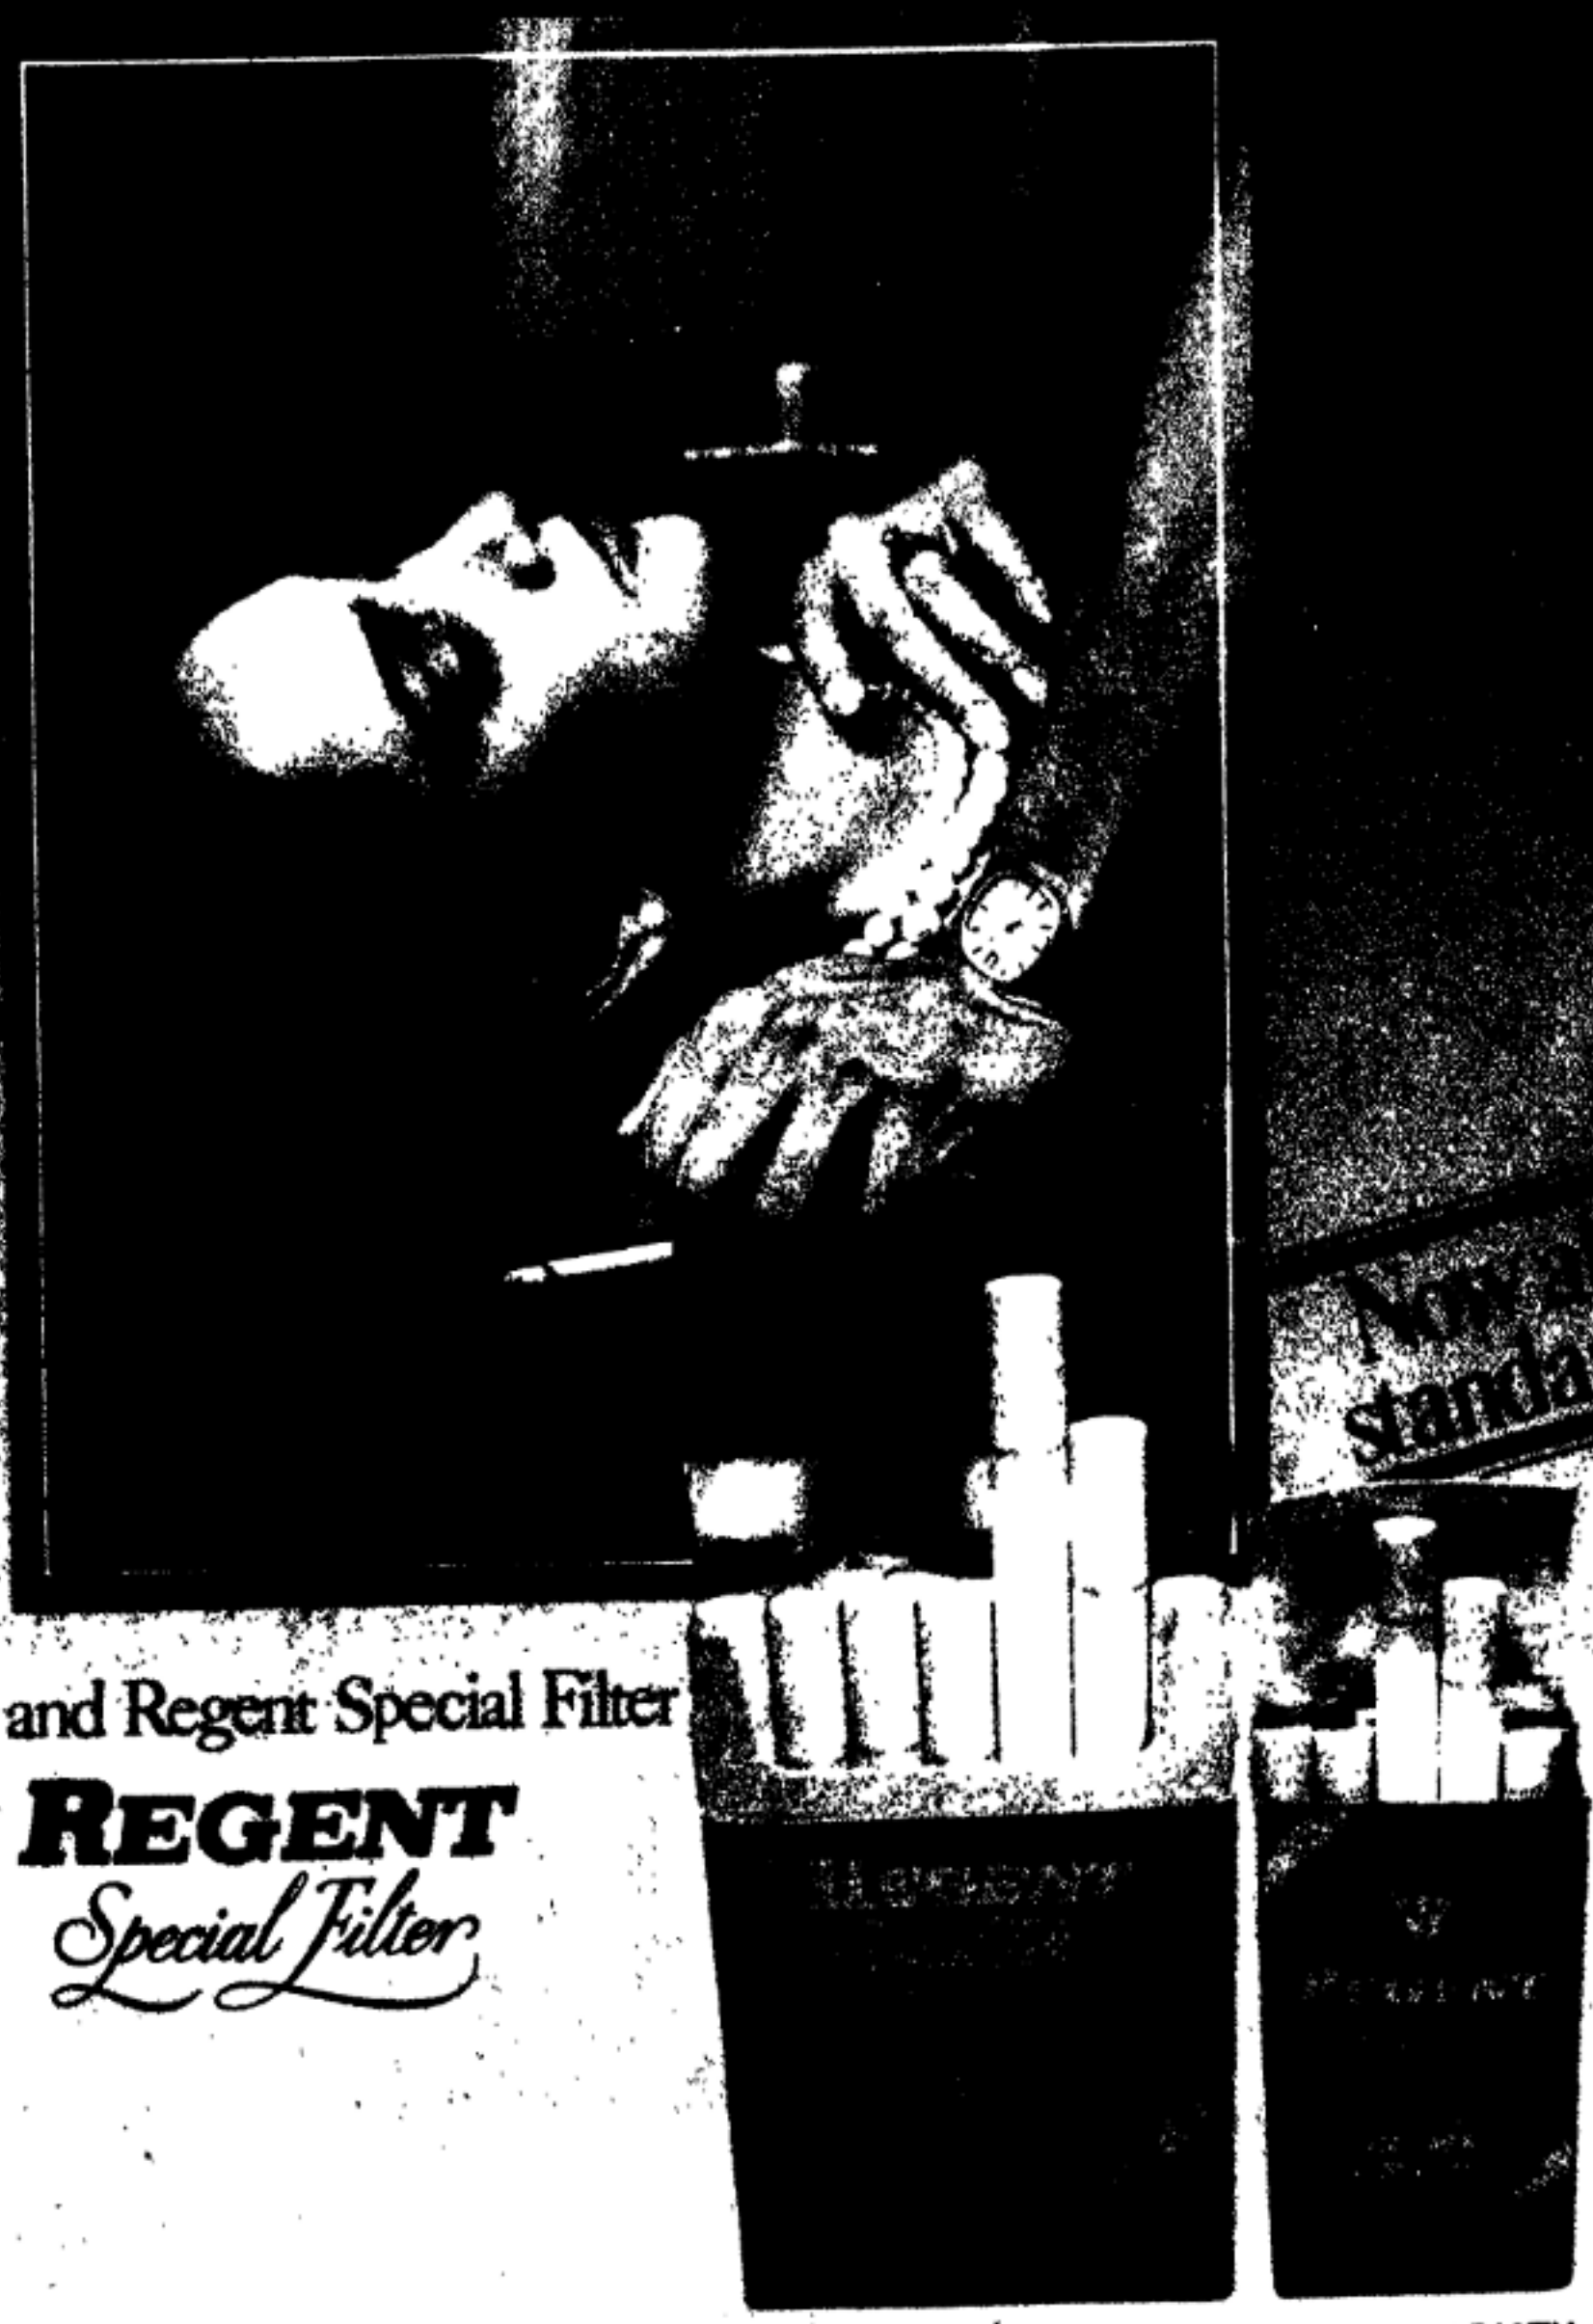
Bajaj Automation

The reason why Bajaj Auto is the largest scooter maker is fairly simple.

Automation: The technology that helps produce India's finest scooters and three-wheelers. The system which transfers much of the responsibility for production and quality control from the operator to the machine.

That's how Bajaj Auto made over 300,000 vehicles last year. That is how we will be making over 700,000 vehicles a year by 1987-88.



It takes years to gear up for such vast production; but the experience gained over 25 years will enable us to achieve this target. And add even more rapidly to the almost 2 million Bajaj vehicles already on the road.

A Disaster Called G.M. Shah

On 2 July the defector government of G.M. Shah will complete one year in office. The record, so far, is enough to put any government to shame. A report from Sankarshan Thakur and Yusuf Jameel.

Summer of Discontent

At a time when India is trying to present its best face to the world outside, it is doing precious little to cure the festering sores on its body. The Assam and Punjab problems remain unresolved while Gujarat is in the grip of a fierce caste war. In Kashmir a government of defectors continues to loot the state. Kuldip Nayar, Romesh Thapar, K.F. Rustomji along with SUNDAY correspondents take a look at the turmoil in the country today.

Amaar Jonmo Bhoomee

For three days and nights dust hung in the air like a pestilent cloud. Not a whiff of air, not a leaf stirred, not a bird sang. The once green lawn in front of my apartment had turned a sere yellow, flowers had withered in their beds. I said to myself: Only cacti thrive in my cactus land! When the days were at their hottest, the fan stopped churning hot air leaving me to sweat it out and nurse prickly heat that had erupted round my neck. In the evening when I stood under the shower to wash away the day's dust and sweat off my body, the turn of the tap only produced a few gaseous farts but not a drop of water. One night, the air-conditioner died on me converting my cool bedroom into the Black Hole of Calcutta. What did Andre Gide mean when he talked of the "sensual ecstasy that comes with persistent heat?" Bullshit! Why do I have to live in this God-forsaken land?

The next afternoon a dust storm swept across the city with demoniac fury. An ancient banyan on Parliament Street which I had regarded as the emblem of eternity was pulled out by its roots and hurled across the road bringing traffic to a halt for several hours. Its limbs had to be hacked off before the stream of traffic could resume its flow. At another place a cat nestling in the shade of a neem was broken into two as the tree crashed down its middle. The storm blew for almost an hour till the shades of twilight gathered the metropolis in their fold. Suddenly I heard sounds of thunder and saw flashes of lightning pierce the dust-laden sky. Then came the rain. It lasted only 15 minutes but in that short spell it filled the gutters to overflowing, flooded the roads, knocked out the electric supply and slew all of Delhi's telephones stone dead. Why do I suffer these humiliations? Why not live somewhere where things are better managed?

Early next morning I set out for my game of tennis. Every leaf of every tree had been washed clean. The soft fragrance of siris floated in the air. Carpets of golden yellow were laid about the boles of laburnums that line the avenue. Golden orioles called from the foliage of shisham trees. The gulmohar along the tennis court was ablaze with scarlet and yellow. A magpie robin (shama) alighted on its topmost branch and burst into song :"Amon deshti kothao khunjay paabey na ko toomee, Shokol desher rani shejey, Amaar jonmo bhoomee" (Search wherever you may, but you will not find a land (as beautiful) as this; she is the queen, this land of my birth)."

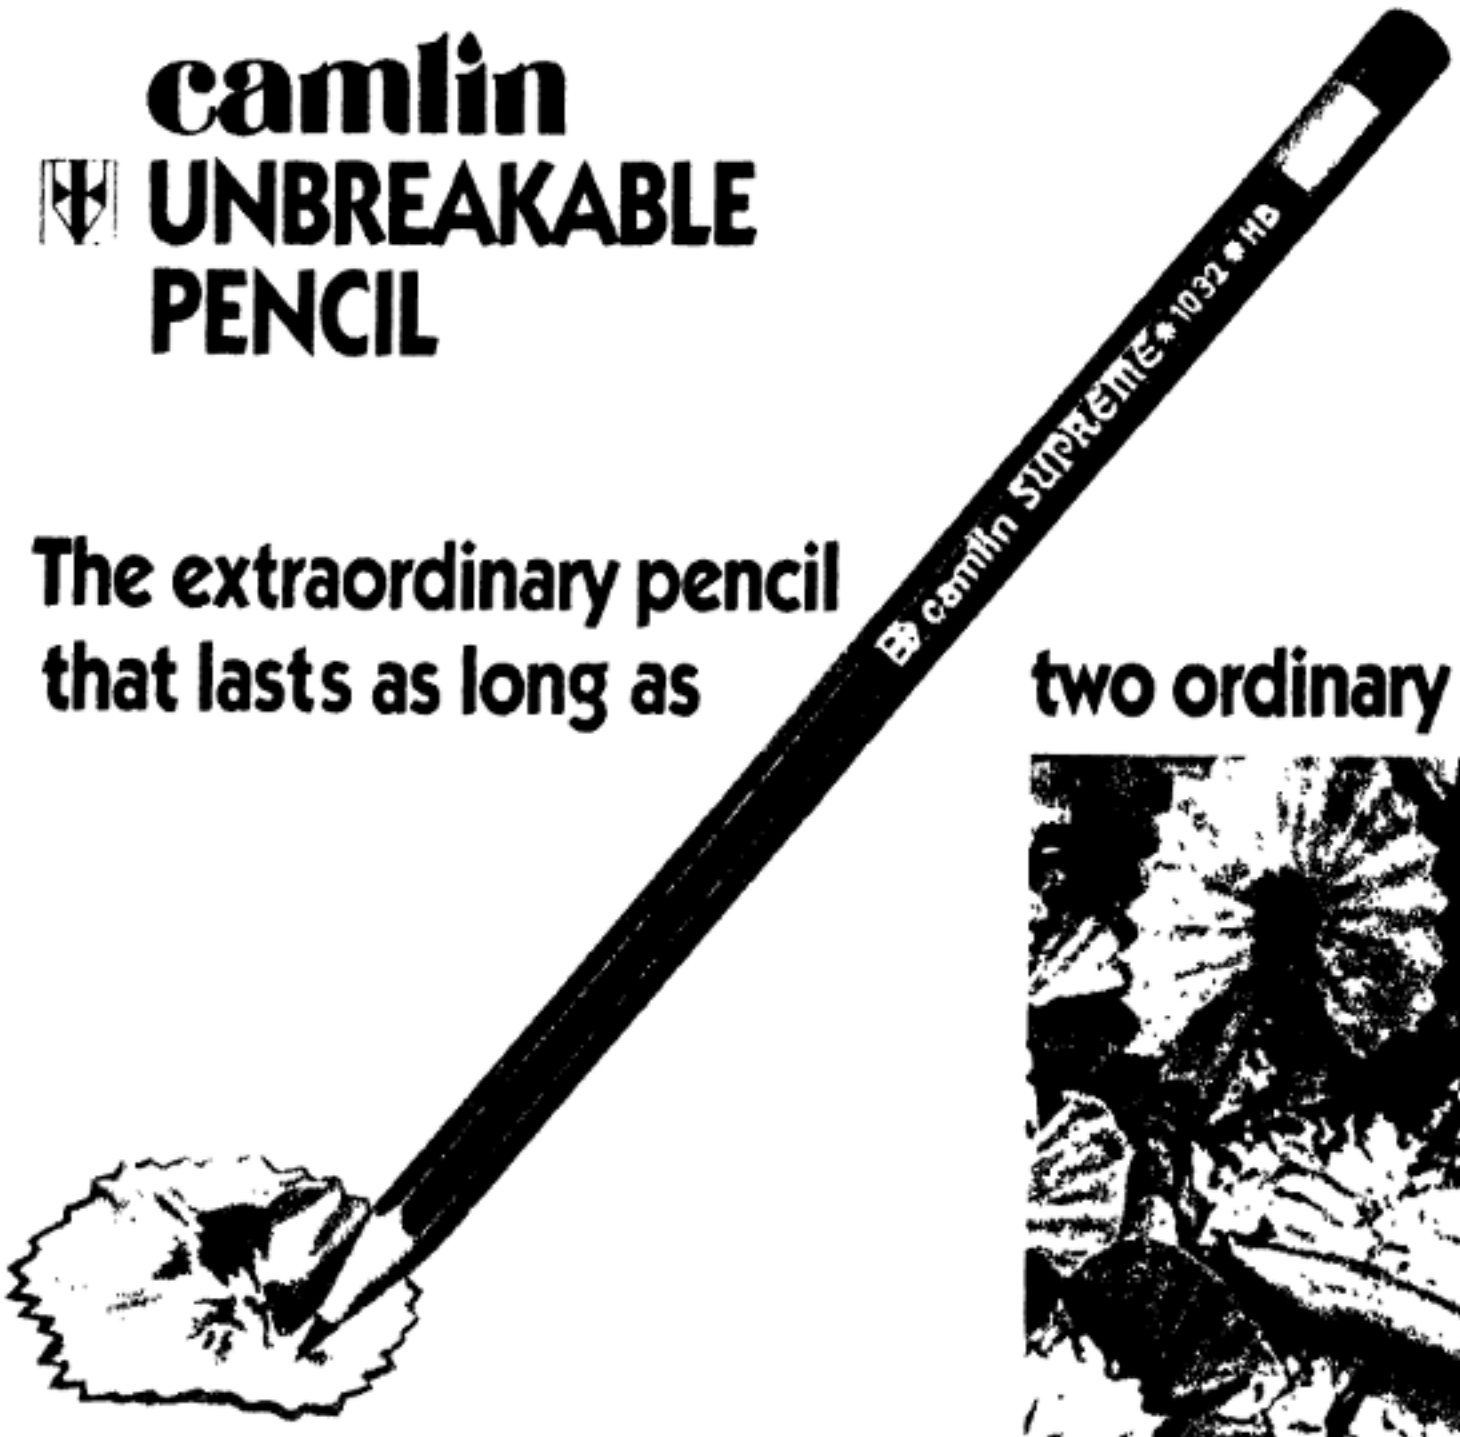
How could I have ever thought of living elsewhere except my jonmo bhoomee?

Of Cats, Dogs and Humans

As both a dog and a cat lover I am somewhat perplexed by differences in their attitude towards humans and their behaviour towards each other. There is little doubt that the human-dog equation is much closer than the human-cat relationship. Dogs attach themselves to their masters, preferably those who feed and exercise them. They are miserable when their masters are away and start looking unhappy as soon as they see suit-cases being packed. Cats are indifferent towards their masters and are more attached to the homes they live in. Dogs can sense people who do not like them; cats don't give a damn. They'll purr for anyone who places a saucer of milk before them. Dogs are dirty and have to be bathed and house-trained. Cats keep themselves clean and their toilet practices are lessons in decorum. They dig a pit, defecate in it and cover it up with earth. Dogs, unless they are brought up together as pups, find it difficult to adjust to each other. Cats will cuddle up with their own kind without much fuss. Dogs get into brawls with other dogs, cats, except at mating time, seldom fight with other cats. Dogs refuse to share their food and snarl at the approach of another dog when eating. Cats observe a code of eating propriety.



Early every morning, between six to ten cats assemble outside my front door. I can hear them mewing impatiently beside the bundle of newspapers which are delivered to me by 4.30. Since the number of cats has multiplied I put the milk in a large enamel saucer, so they can lap it up together. As I open the door they get very excited, my favourites even leap up to snatch it from my hands. But no sooner I place the saucer on the ground, only those that can get their heads together around it get to drink it. Invariably two or three are crowded out. They never try to muscle their way into the ring, but sit aside despondently hoping I will bring them another bowlful. However their behaviour in the evening is quite different. Whenever I go out for dinner, I ask my hostess or the waiter to put all the left-over bones in a plastic bag. No sooner I step out of the car, cats come running from all directions. However much I try to scatter the bones, they fight over every piece. The one which succeeds in grabbing a bone runs away with it lest it be clawed out of its mouth. Why this belligerency when it comes to meat and not over milk?

It has been established that most animals and birds have sixth or seventh senses unknown to humans. A case on record is from a small town, Concepcion, in Chile in 1835. One morning at 10.30 am suddenly and for no reason whatsoever birds took to the air screaming wildly. An hour later dogs began to bark and horses tried to break loose from their tethers. Ten minutes later at 11.40 am came an earthquake which destroyed most of the township.

Birds are better equipped by nature than animals. Birds of prey like hawks and scavengers like kites and vultures can spot tiny lizards and mice from several miles. They have sharper eyes, but animals have sharper noses. Dogs can spot people who have smoked heroin two days earlier. Even humans can develop uncanny powers when the situation demands. Convicts in jail are known to smell the approach of prison officials before they can see them. If you know of other instances of extra-sensory perception please write.

Can Colombo Help Tamils?

Sri Lanka believes that a marked change has come over India's attitude towards her. After his talks with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, President Jayewardene has come to feel that New Delhi is honest and serious about its intention to check the infiltration of terrorists into Sri Lanka from India. This is what President Jayewardene told his ministers at the conclusion of his talks with the Indian Prime Minister.

In the past, the two countries had made very little progress in finding a solution to the ethnic problem because, while India insisted on initiating talks—which it believed would eliminate violence and retaliatory action—Sri Lanka argued that only cessation of violence could create an atmosphere conducive to talks. Sri Lanka is happy that India was now more appreciative of their point of view. But Sri Lanka also sees the need to check the atrocities of her armed forces. President Jayewardene has promised to recall most of his troops to the barracks. A couple of months ago, when I met him, he had offered to withdraw the troops but he first wanted India to agree to a joint surveillance of the troubled areas by the two countries. It appears that Jayewardene had not agreed to withdraw troops before the talks. He wanted the gesture to be reciprocal. India should not give refuge to terrorists operating in Sri Lanka and Colombo should see to it that its often trigger-happy army is not assigned civilian duties.

Officials accompanying President Jayewardene on his New Delhi visit reportedly proposed that New Delhi should bring the Eelam terrorists under the purview of the recently enacted Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act. Whether India complies with this or not will depend on how the two countries sort out the ethnic problem between themselves. However, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has suggested a global approach to the task of combating terrorism. He reportedly told Jayewardene that the two countries should draw up a blueprint for global action to check terrorism. Mr Gandhi said that the problem should be tackled in all its ramifications, involving other countries as well. At Mr Gandhi's instance, the Indian defence minster P.V. Narasimha Rao met the Sri Lanka security minister Lalith Athulathmudali, who had accompanied Jayewardene to India. All the steps they decided on were not made public but some joint steps are undoubtedly in the offing. And before long the two countries may come up with a proposal for global consideration.

One thing noticeable about the efforts for a reconciliation is that G. Parthasarathy, chairman of the policy planning body, is now out of the picture. Sri Lanka [illegible] kind of aversion to him [illegible] declared that he is not [illegible] Romesh Bhandari, the former [illegible] taken his place.

President Jayewardene [illegible] regard for Rajiv Gandhi. [illegible] Gandhi had the making [illegible] and whatever he had read about [illegible] confirmed this impression. [illegible] reluctant to come to Delhi [illegible] because he was worried that [illegible] would get the impression that [illegible] towing to a new and young [illegible] But once he had agreed to [illegible] he insisted on having this [illegible] drum so that it did not [illegible] travel all the way to [illegible] Indian Prime Minister [illegible] that Rajiv Gandhi [illegible] country's internal problems [illegible] fly to Delhi. The joint [illegible] Jayewardene and Rajiv [illegible] Indo-Sri Lankan [illegible] the cyclone in Bangladesh [illegible] altogether new dimension.

There is no doubt that [illegible] getting along quite well. [illegible] dene bring sanity to [illegible] fanatical Buddhist [illegible] which appears to be [illegible] In Delhi he agreed to hold [illegible] Sri Lanka, but he did not [illegible] for what. This is an oft repeated [illegible] When it comes to giving some power [illegible] Lankans, Jayewardene has been [illegible] will be overcome this hesitation now.

The problem is difficult. The [illegible] seem a redoubtable force. For example, according to Le Monde, a French daily, the [illegible] have 6,000 guerillas [illegible] raise 4,000 more [illegible] with the Sri Lankan [illegible] troops. Moreover, [illegible] thousands of [illegible] east of Sri Lanka, [illegible] Hindu Tamils are [illegible]

Asked what would be [illegible] to the Tamils, who are in a majority in the north and north-eastern [illegible] Amirthalingam, the TULF chief, said they would be content with [illegible] in India. It is difficult to [illegible] can ever be given [illegible] Sri Lanka. G. Parthasarathy has [illegible] a formula in which the Tamil-dominated areas would be given the status of an Indian union territory. But Jayewardene could not even get that through. Till now, this formula, suggested by both sides, seems the most practical one. But can Jayewardene get it endorsed by his Parliament? He is thinking of holding a referendum on the subject. What if he fails?

Jayewardene was reluctant to come to Delhi for the summit because he was worried that his people would get the impression that he was kowtowing to a new and young Prime Minister.

Let All Have a Stake

A middle class intellectual is, in one respect, much like Arjuna of Mahabharata; he can wield both hands: right and left. Now he scoffs at businessmen for unsavoury practices; now he admonishes workers for indolence He abhors black money, profiteering and all such shady deals; he sniffs at absenteeism, lethargy and indifference The intellectual would do a yeoman's service to the nation if he could rather trace the roots of all these evils, and suggest remedies, short of pipe-dreams.

Businessmen would, no doubt, pursue the road to profit at any cost But how do you elicit the commitment of workers to production? In these days of cynicism, a work ethos is a much devalued currency; it is frowned upon as a manifestation of petty bourgeois reactionary mentality But if millions of workers are not positively stirred by an emotion for productive endeavour, the future of the country would become a prisoner to the present.

At times revolution was thought of as a once-for-all event complete by itself upon a certain date. Mao instilled a new concept into it by bringing within its fold even the routine functions of a farmer, a teacher, or an artist at his post. China went on making revolution day by day, every day. No such ideological fervour rents the air in India today. Yet we have to carry on production, expand the economic base, and prepare for the years to come; we owe it to our children and grandchildren, as much as to ourselves.

But who has the time and inclination to ponder over the distant horizon, or on the wider circle beyond one's own? It is, indeed, a bit too abstract for the man on the street, in a farm, or in a factory, to contemplate the national economy and mark his own place in it. He needs something more tangible, more concrete and immediate, as a yardstick for his activities. It would be much easier for him if his self-interest could somehow be made concomitant with the well-being of the nation, the economy, the society. Even then his perception of self-interest as such has to be broad in scope.

A worker enters into a contract with the employer to supply his capacity to labour for a stipulated length of time per day in exchange of a certain amount of wages. But how much he actually exerts himself, how much he really puts in, during that period, is contingent upon a host of other things like the extent of his sense of belonging to the enterprise, his own physical and mental nourishment, the state of his family, his surrounding, and so on. Rampant corruption that he sees all around diminishes his energy, soaring inflation saps his attentiveness, his anonymity in the vast machinery of a giant company heightens his feeling of alienation The full potentiality of an hour of his work under such circumstances may, in fact, never get translated into actual practice, even though he is at his desk with full sincerity To realise the complete potentiality that is ingrained in an agreed amount of supplied labour time is one of the greatest challenges to modern management, after the age of slavery. Herein also lies a hidden treasure waiting to be tapped

Our society is riddled with many conflicts. Workers are at odds with industrialists; landlords are sore at tenants; on some points capitalists are in disagreement with the landed aristocracy; big capitalists are always on the prowl to look for smaller species The society is like a molecule full of internal tensions, held in a precarious balance by a criss-cross of group alignments. The potential energy stored in it is immense; but the equilibrium is possibly unstable and volatile Once disturbed, the adjustment process of the system could be pretty bad unless progressive forces come to lead it. In the midst of the current stalemate, relatively affluent people somehow get their things done It is those who are at the lower and middle parts of the spectrum, who are called upon to bear the brunt of the low-level equilibrium Big landlords and monopoly capitalists can bribe, cajole, and pamper some workers, and make money out of it. The tussle is most acute when it is between workers on the one hand, and the ordinary capitalists, on the other, who are not big enough to afford the goodies that monopoly capitalists can offer to their employees. For example, when a wage agreement covering a particular industry is signed, quite often we find that relatively small enterprises are forced to close down; the bigs thrive

Our society is riddled with many conflicts. Workers are at odds with industrialists; landlords are sore at tenants; on some points capitalists are in disagreement with the landed aristocracy. The society is like a molecule full of internal tensions, held in a precarious balance by a criss-cross of group alignments. The potential energy stored in it is immense; but the equilibrium is possibly unstable and volatile

The problem is, therefore, twofold: one, to achieve in reality all that the worker is optimally capable of delivering; and, to reduce the tension, as far as possible, that prevails singularly between workers, and non-big ordinary capitalists. Killing two birds with one stone is always a complex operation. Perhaps there is a way in the present case. Let the workers have a share and a stake in the company's profits and losses. As a beginning, part of the employees' provident fund can be turned into the company's equity capital. If so, workers will then have the pleasure and responsibility of tasting the fruits of their collective labour—fruits which may be sweet or sour depending largely (not entirely) on their own efforts.

In due course, the scheme may be extended so that the two parts, the fixed wage and the variable profit-share, become more or less of equal magnitude in a worker's total earning Return on investment will not suffer under this arrangement, for the volume of output will now be larger as workers put their hearts and minds into their assigned jobs. This could also act as a partial answer to the problem of price-wage spiral that we have seen so long. Above all, the social harmony flowing from it would be a precious by-product in whose shadow the economy can gather fresh momentum.

OPINION

Murder Mystery

In her investigative cover story Ritu Sarin rightly pointed a finger at another assassin of Mrs Gandhi whose identity is still undisclosed (A Missing Assassin?, 26 May—1 June.) I can still recall very clearly that the news broadcast on 31 October declared that three people were involved in the assassination. It is indeed a mystery that since then investigative agencies failed to trace the third man. Satwant Singh's confession reproduced in SUNDAY is worth considering. At times I get the feeling that the murder of Indira Gandhi is deliberately not being investigated properly.
Prabal Guha, Calcutta

• I did not understand the symbolism inherent in M.F. Husain's rendering of Indira Gandhi's assassination. Why was she depicted as having four fingers on the right hand? Does the watch symbolise anything?
Debu Paul, Calcutta

Suprakash Roy, Patna

Forgotten Nehru

Today, sadly, Jawaharlal Nehru has become irrelevant (The Post Nehru Generation, 26 May—1 June). He does not hold much significance for the present generation who seem to have little notion about Panditji The only occasion when we care to remember him is on his birthday. Not only the youth, there seems to be little effort on the part of our leaders to follow and propagate the teachings of Nehru. The press too has failed to give adequate publicity to the dreams and ideals of one of the founders of our nation.
Arvinder Singh Walia, Calcutta

• I was shocked and pained to learn that our younger generation knew so little about Jawaharlal Nehru, the man who shaped our destiny. In fact our education system is largely responsible for such a sorry state of affairs. Moreover, parents rarely narrate stories of the freedom movement to their children.
Khuku Mazumdar, Ranchi

• Nehru has never been a hero of all times to me. Yes, he was a sincere leader who aligned himself with all things western to prove that the east and the west were equal. Nehru gave us a sense of purpose and confidence to face the world. But I always felt that his message was hackneyed.

Rashmee Roshan Lall, Meerut

• I think that India could have been a much stronger nation had we not adhered to the Utopian ideologies and impractical foreign policy of Jawaharlal Nehru. Our country has become the playground of the superpowers only because we do not possess nuclear technology. If we want to settle our problems with Pakistan and China, the 'atom' is absolutely necessary.
Subir Lahiri, Calcutta

Koran in Court

The special report on The Koran Controversy (19—25 May) was in bad taste. An act of two religious fanatics should not have been publicised. The report hurt the sentiments of all the Muslims. I was surprised that Justice Khastagir admitted such a biased and provocative writ petition.
Khalid Jamal, Patna

• At a time when our country is passing through a crisis, the petition filed by two persons to ban the holy Koran is bound to spread communal hatred. Such incidents should not be publicised as the petitioners were clearly upto some mischief.
Syed Asif Noor, Rourkela

• I appreciate the timely action of both the union and the West Bengal government to foil the despicable conspiracy by vested interests to ban the holy Koran.
Abida Samiuddin, Aligarh

Lawless Lawmen

The atrocities perpetrated by the Gujarat police in Ahmedabad is not novel to this country (Police Vs People, 5—11 May). Murders and rapes in police custody and the harassment of innocent citizens in the name of enforcing law and order have become routine. Gujarat CM Solanki is one of those politicians without a mass base and hence he has to depend on the police force to remain in power. The police in our country are no longer protectors of the people.
Pramod Sahoo, Chirimiri (MP)

• Sankarshan Thakur gave a vivid portrayal of the police excesses in Gujarat. Not only did the common man suffer the wrath of the policemen, the press too was not spared. This shameful act by the Gujarat lawmen will go down in history as an attack on democracy.
N. Ellango, Tirunelveli

• Reservation is a very sensitive issue which requires a great deal of consideration before implementation. But Gujarat CM Solanki wanted to make political capital by hastily implementing his own brand of the reservation policy. The government alone is responsible for the events following the anti-reservation stir in the state. Moreover, the Congress(I)'s image has suffered a lot due to the CM's refusal to resign even after admitting the police excesses.
S. Jayaraj, Coimbatore

• I was ashamed to learn that the police force perpetrated such brutality in the land of Mahatma Gandhi.
A.N. Veeraraghavan, Bombay

• The anti-reservation stir by the students in Gujarat is ruining education in the state. Most of the examinations have been postponed and no one knows when schools and colleges will reopen. Many a talent has been wasted as a result of the meaningless agitation.
G.V. Phanirajkishore, Hyderabad

No Following

The interview with the Sindhudesh leader, G.M. Sayed, made amusing reading (Pakistan is a Creation of Hatred, 26 May—1 June). G.M. Sayed was known as an eccentric in the Forties and after partition he sank into oblivion. He never had any following then, nor does he have any today. M.J. Akbar should have exposed the hypocrite.
K.A. Makkar, Calcutta

Congress (Real)

The special report on the AICC(I) centenary session (The Mood After 100 Years, 19—25 May) was interesting. As I feel that the ruling party is the real "Akhil Bharatiya Congress," it is regrettable that the present opposition leaders and former Congressmen did not attend the centenary meeting.
Arabinda Kumar Padhee, Sambalpur

• The Congress session did not do justice to a party with such glorious traditions. The party which formed the mainstream of the national movement, seems to have become the personal property of a single family. Blatant sycophancy has erased the names of several prominent Congress leaders—even Mahatma Gandhi was largely ignored. It was a shame to have had such a pathetic show telecast.
M.H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

• The ruling party does not in any way relate to the organisation formed 100 years ago by Sir Allan Octavian Hume and others. The par ty celebrated its centenary in a hurried manner. Slogans in praise of Rajiv Gandhi and his mother suppressed the voice of old freedom fighters and genuine Congressmen. It was a political mela for the district and state Congress(I) secretaries who spent two happy days gazing at their leader from close quarters. The young generation, still in the 'honeymoon mood,' made no attempt to observe the occasion historically.
N. Ellango, Tirunelveli

• Rajiv Gandhi and his aides repeatedly advocated socialism of the variety followed by Jawaharlal Nehru and Mrs Gandhi. Does Mr Gandhi know what Nehru's socialism meant? On 20 February 1955 Nehru had said in New Delhi that the Avadi Resolution was "meant to confuse people and to catch votes."
S.S. Raju, Bombay

• Great Indian leaders were remembered at the Congress centenary celebrations. But the names of Sardar Patel, the architect of modern India and Lal Bahadur Shastri, the former Prime Minister of India who was responsible for our victory in the 1965 war, were almost forgotten. Pandit Nehru was a great man who ruled India for 17 years but nobody can deny that had he acted diplomatically, the China and Kashmir problems on which billions are being spent annually and which will haunt the generations to come for ages, would not have existed. Similarly, Mrs Gandhi has left Punjab in turmoil while Assam is burning simply because of her indecision. We have foreign debts of over Rs 40,000 crores and a yearly trade deficit of Rs 5,000 crores. The country has progressed during the last 37 years but the fact remains that economically we are still backward.
B.R. Nanda, Lucknow

Idols are Symbols

This is with reference to Ranita Ray's letter, Sex and Morality (Opinion, 19 May) I strongly object to her suggestion that Hinduism should follow the Islamic approach to idolism. People like her who are immature, spiritually and mentally, cannot go beyond the physical aspect of these pictures as they do not understand the symbolism behind them. For instance, the Shivalinga, apparently a sex symbol, stands for the power of creation. All sects that have attempted to worship God without any form or ceremony have mercilessly crushed everything that is beautiful and sublime in religion. The pictures do not defame Hinduism but in their own way highlight the versatility of this great religion which allows full freedom of thought and expression.
Akkiraju Natarajan, Hyderabad

Punish Miscreants

The detailed information and the analysis of the terrorist activities in The Sant's Revenge (19—25 May) made absorbing reading. M.J. Akbar is absolutely correct when he concludes that the reasons behind this death-game are the domination of Sant Longowal and the resurrection of fear and hatred in Hindu-Sikh relations. Fortunately, the terrorists' plans were aborted by the harmony between Hindus and Sikhs.
Prakash Paliwal, Akaltara, Madhya Pradesh

• When the majority of the Sikhs stand for peaceful coexistence, it is deplorable to see a handful indulging in arson and genocide. Let not magnanimity be mistaken for cowardice. The men behind the bomb blasts should be brought to book.
S. Jayaraj, Coimbatore

Cheating Students

While agreeing with Nirmal Mitra that all sections of the society have contributed to the collapse of the educational system in Bihar, I hold the teachers guilty more than anyone else (How Education Ruins Merit in Bihar, 19—25 May). The teachers have relegated education to the levels of any other trade with the result that money can work wonders. Question papers are sold openly and one need not sit for an examination to obtain a degree.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• Leakage of question papers, mass copying, tampering of answer scripts and manipulation of the marksheets are all an inalienable part of education in Bihar. Though education in India as a whole suffers from the same malady, the situation in Bihar has surpassed all limits.
Subal Chandra Saha, Malda (West Bengal)

• The formation of the intermediate council and the examinations conducted by the respective universities have doubled the hardship of the students. In the recently conducted ISC exams three papers were cancelled by the intermediate council, because questions leaked out in and around Patna. Students in south Bihar,like me,had to be subjected to a re-examination although we did not have a glimpse of a single question beforehand. And as results are usually declared late, we are immobilised; we cannot leave Bihar and take admission elsewhere without losing a whole year at least.
Ranju, Ranchi

• SUNDAY has done a good job by publishing Nirmal Mitra's special report on education in Bihar. The article will not only open the eyes of the Bihar government but also those of the other states. The purchasers and sellers of degrees should know that the mere holding of a certificate is not the aim of education.
Kshirodendu Jagatdeb, Cuttack

• SUNDAY deserves praise for exposing the state of education in Bihar. Hardly 15 classes of each paper are conducted in half a session and this is the reason why even meritorious students take the help of teachers privately, for which they pay them large amounts of money. But everybody is not rich enough to pay for tuition. Using the police against students cannot solve this problem.
Raj Kumar, Nawada Arrah,

A Disaster Called G.M. Shah

Another anniversary is coming up; on 2 July the defector government of G.M. Shah will complete one year in office and the record of this one year would put any government to shame. Sankarshan Thakur and Yusuf Jameel report.

"Look at the mountains of Kashmir," said Dr Farooq Abdullah, driving down the shaded slopes towards the huge lakes of Srinagar bathed in summer sunshine "Look at those lakes, look at these trees, feel this weather. Isn't it heavenly? Kashmir is paradise; there is no problem here. How can there be? After all, isn't Farooq the villain of this Valley?" The sarcasm is not lost. It is almost a year since his government was toppled and a government of defectors headed by Ghulam Mohammed Shah installed—a government which has done everything other than what it had promised to do when it came to power. It is up on maladministration, mismanagement, inefficiency and corruption and nil on popularity.

Public sentiment against Gulshah (as G.M. Shah is popularly known) and his ministerial colleagues is so strong that to date, they have not been able to hold a single public meeting without being outnumbered by plainclothes securitymen. Today, the chief minister cannot travel half a mile in Srinagar without flanking himself with gun-toting guards. Insecurity and popular denial best characterise the government led by him. And if the manner of operations during the first three or four months of his regime had brought him the nicknames of "Curfew Shah," and "Gul-e-Curfew" (the curfew blossom), the chief minister has now earned a new name: "Scandal Shah." In the last couple of months the Shah government has been buried under a heap of allegations that have come from all including some senior leaders of the Congress(I), on whose shoulders is balanced Shah's seat. What has the Congress(I) gained from this alliance with Gulshah, they are asking. Said one Congress(I) member quite matter-of-factly, "We should have been the beneficiaries of this agreement. Shah is there because of us. But we are losers on every side. While the party is losing whatever following it has by supporting a government that has no face to show in public, our members are not even getting the benefits that they thought they would These ministers just treat us with disdain." The benefits, of course, have more or less remained a preserve of the 18 Jammu and Kashmir ministers and their near and dear ones. And so intent are the ministers on pocketing them that they have come down to even appointing daily wage labourers themselves. The cow has been milked for what it was worth, now they are tickling the udders to squeeze out the last drops.

Chief minister G.M. Shah

Sudeshna

Corruption has been a by-word in the politics of Jammu and Kashmir, not something that came in with Ghulam Mohammed Shah. It was legendary even during the rule of Maharaja Ranjit Singh. It is said that after he had conquered Kashmir in the first half of the nineteenth century, he appointed his most honest man as the governor of the province. But the moment he reached Kashmir, he was a changed man—he gave in to malpractices. The same thing happened with the Maharaja's "hand-picked" men on successive occasions—Kashmir cast a strange spell upon them. But the Shah government is taking corruption in the Valley to new heights. And it all begins in his own house

Gulshah's son, Muzaffar Shah, has recently emerged at the centre of what is perhaps the biggest financial scandal in the state in recent times. A non-entity till not so long ago, Muzaffar Shah has suddenly begun calling the shots from behind the political shield of his chief minister-father Apart from the assumption of key positions like the presidentship of the state labour union without having had anything to do with labour all his life, Muzaffar Shah is also said to be browbeating state government departments, banks, state-owned corporations and other public sector units into giving him business concessions at the cost of twisting and tearing all norms laid down. Shah, in partnership with Din Mohammed Wani and Altaf Ahmed, runs the Tycoons group of industries which, ironically, has its office in the Nawa-i-Subh building, the city headquarters of the National Conference (Farooq). According to a memorandum that was sent to the high offices in Delhi recently, the Tycoons group has been sold 3,000 tonnes of coal dug at the government-run Kalakote mines at heavily slashed prices.

While the rate of the Kalakote coal is normally around Rs 514 per tonne, it was sold to Tycoons at a rate of Rs 375 per tonne And this without inviting any tenders or placing any advertisements. The Jammu and Kashmir Bank too has been generous in its dealings with the Tycoons group which has nine accounts in the bank. A memorandum presented by the Jammu and Kashmir bank employees union says that while the loan arrears of the groups with the bank has jumped to Rs 23 lakhs, the group had been extended the facility of a trust account with an overdraft allowance of over Rs 10 lakhs. And all this, insist some employees of the bank, is just the tip of the iceberg. "But we cannot do anything about it he is after all the chief minister's son.

G.M. Shah addressing a gathering shortly after he became the CM

Anyone who tries to raise questions will have to pay," said one of them. This is precisely what happened. Some officials of the bank who were attempting to inspect the Tycoons account sometime back were asked to leave.

On another front, however, Muzaffar Shah is facing competition from one Mr Iqbal who is the agent of a multinational pharmaceutical company and who is said to be a very influential man in political circles The Jammu and Kashmir government spends about Rs four crores on buying chemicals for treating apple-scab every year. Till sometime back Iqbal held the monopoly of the product as pesticides worth nearly three-fourths of this sum were being spent on buying chemicals from the multinational firm that he represents One of the reasons for this was also that the product he sold — diethene M-45 — was found to be very effective. Recently, Muzaffar Shah also entered the agrochemicals market with the agency of another firm, threatening Mr Iqbal's hegemony on agrochemicals contracts But since Iqbal too has his own spheres of influence, he began mounting pressure on the government through some senior Congress(I) leaders of the state A behind-the-scene tug-of-war is already on with the chief minister's son balanced against Iqbal who wields power through money.

Deputy CM D.D. Thakur

There are others who seem to have moved political levers to their advantage. Maulvi Iftikhar Hussain Ansari, leader of the Congress(I) legislature party in the Jammu and Kashmir Assembly is one such person. While it is still a mystery why Maruti Udyog Limited had to give an agency to Ansari Motors — the second one in a small city like Srinagar — the land on which Ansari Motors, run by Iftikhar Hussain Ansari's cousin Zaffar Hussain and his brother Abid Ansari, proposes to build its show-

[illegible] under a cloud of [illegible]. The piece of land in Ko[illegible] measuring one [illegible] and 35 sq yards on which Ansari Motors has begun the con[illegible] of its showroom has been [illegible] by the Durganag Trust as its own. Since the State government [illegible] by the October 1984, [illegible] moved to court and [illegible] 1985 obtained an order [illegible] the civil judge of Srinagar which [illegible] Hussain is hereby [illegible] from creating any further [illegible] on the suit land or [illegible] Adverse to the position [illegible] exists on spot till further [illegible]. The status quo was vacated by the additional district judge on 5 January and the Durganag trust went [illegible]. Justice M A Shah of the High Court of Jammu and Kashmir gave an order [illegible] saying that [illegible] as it exists today on the [illegible] be maintained." But," says [illegible] Trust's lawyer Deepak Bhan, "old Dur[illegible] who has been pur[illegible] the matter, "nobody would [illegible] Ansari out because he is [illegible] of the great Congress [illegible] and threats, and we have to [illegible] helplessly. The construction of the Ansari Motors showroom, despite the court order is still going on. And Farooq Dole fearlessly [illegible] from office to office, from one court to another with original [illegible] of the deed that sanctions the land to the Durganag trust.

Petitions against malpractices in the government and the administration are aplenty. In fact most people seem occupied filing them. Three employees of the Jammu and Kashmir State Finance Corporation (J and K SFC) Mohammed Ashraf Shah, Abdul Rashid Bhat and Ghulam Hassan Pala have between themselves filed five petitions in the Jammu and Kashmir High Court on 8 April 1985. The petitions filed against the J and K SFC, its managing director Sheikh Mohi ud Din and its general manager, R K Sadhu allege a number of irregularities which include the appointments and promotions of "some relatives and friends" of the members of the Kashmir cabinet. Among those whose appointments in the J and K SFC have been challenged by the petitioners are:

Manzoor Ahmed Dar, appointed as loans officer vide letter number PA 26/564 dated 19 March 1985. Manzoor Ahmed Dar is the son of the industries minister Sadaullah Dar and before he was appointed loans officer in the J and K SFC was a teacher in the Rainawari high school.

Farooq Abdullah

N.H Naik, appointed as loans officer vide letter number PA/26/577 79 on 19 March 1985. N.H. Naik is the son of the education minister Ali Mohammed Naik and according to the petitioners he does not have the necessary qualifications for the post.

The list goes on. Naresh Kumar, the son of Mangat Ram Sharma, Speaker of the Jammu and Kashmir Assembly, Amar Singh, allegedly a relative of deputy chief minister Devi Dass Thakur, Miss Hamida Khan, one of whose relatives is said to be in the anti-corruption department where several charges of misutilisation of funds by the J and K SFC managing director, Sheikh Mohi-ud-Din are pending for investigation.

In a separate memorandum, employees of the J and K SFC have raised doubts about the motives of their managing director, Sheikh Mohi ud Din himself. "In July 1984," says a section in the memorandum, "Sheikh appointed such persons in the class 'A' group who were either with no experience or were clerks in the J and K Bank Limited, his parental department. This was done by him to keep the ministers and other high level officials happy so that he could be appointed as chairman of the J and K Bank Limited." It is interesting here to note that Mohi-ud Din is the man who, as general manager of the J and K Bank Limited, had advanced loans to several influential National Conference (K) and Congress(I) politicians among whom were Gulshah's son, Muzaffar Shah and the J and K CLP(I) leader, Iftikhar Hussain Ansari. He is now trying for the post of chairman, J and K Bank Limited and perhaps wants to upgrade his position in the corridors of power. The government and the board of directors of the bank have already fought the first round of the battle over Mohi-ud-Din's appointment as chairman of the J and K Bank Limited. The nine-member board of directors of the bank had refused to accept Din as the chairman on the ground that several complaints were pending against him. The government hit back with an order removing all the non official members of the bank in March and inducting some of its own nominees as directors. But the ousted directors, among whom was Sheikh Nazir, general secretary of the National Conference (Farooq), went to court and obtained a stay. But while the matter hangs in suspension the government seems determined to bring in Mohi-ud-Din who has recently been given an extension after his retirement in May.

The goings-on in the J and K SFC are not an isolated case. Such things are happening almost everywhere in the state today. Admissions to premier educational institutions are bungled en masse; tenders are invited for projects, while the person who gets the contract is someone who had not even applied; hundreds are appointed to government institutions without proper notices or interviews; people grab land and stick to it, simply because they have political clout; loans are given out to people who have the right recommendations; the farmer, the small industrialist, the artisan and the craftsman languish while Gulshah's flock is busy adding to its comforts as if in a great rush.

It is not very difficult to explain why. The psyche of the Gulshah ministry is shaped by the circumstances under which it came to power: a government solely of defectors that enjoyed no popular backing and walked into office clinging on to the thread that the Congress(I) held out to it It still hangs precariously by the same thread, insecurity dogs the ministry day and night, for who knows when that support will snap? Besides, Gulshah's ministers hardly have a face to save or protect. Instead of working for the betterment of the masses, they have gone their own merry ways, making hay while the sun shines. Shah,even if he wants to arrest the malpractices to inject some respectability into his government, cannot do so because of the internal pressures of his cabinet. Ministers do what they want,the way they want to do it. A popular joke in Srinagar these days is that the state has 18 chief ministers—each one in the Gulshah ministry for everyone can dictate terms—if one of them goes, Shah goes too. So much so that Gulshah cannot even reshuffle his cabinet. The government's second priority has been to keep itself intact, an exercise that has taken more of Gulshah's time than anything else He is more often busy trying to elicit fresh assurances of support from New Delhi than administering his state. The result: the administration, already sluggish in Farooq Abdullah's time, has slumped further, its sense of direction lost. A recent instance would show how things have gone haywire in Jammu and Kashmir. The state irrigation minister had inaugurated a two-crore project in Badgam but the chief minister was completely ignorant of It. "What project?" he asked, nonplussed, when a newsman questioned him about it.

Its congenital handicaps, its non-performance, its failure to make a dent on the popular mind and thus, its lack of confidence, have only exaggerated the opposition challenge for G M. Shah. And desperate, he has taken steps that have even further alienated the masses. There was, for example, this order sent out to some artisans and craftsmen of the valley by a group of "art experts" from the J and K government arts emporium which buys their product. The artisans were told they would not be entertained by the government emporium, unless they become members of the National Conference (Khalida). Political analysts in the state also say that in order to break some ground on the popular front or at least to counter the base of the rival National Conference, Gulshah's men have been driven to negotiating with parties like the Jamaat-i-Islami and the Jamaat-i-Tulba. Apologists of the Shah government, on the other hand, have picked up another argument. They cannot disagree that Shah as an administrator has been a failure but they spell out different reasons for it. Shah, they maintain, inherited a decaying administration from Farooq Abdullah and now that he is trying to set it right, the bureaucracy is not ready to help him, and are in fact sabotaging his moves. "But," says Abdul Hamid Zerger, convener of the Naya Kashmir Forum, an intellectual group in Srinagar, "was this not the very argument on which Shah had come to power? That Farooq was leading the state to ruin and he would put everything right with his administrative excellence? What good is a chief minister who cannot control his own officers?"

Will G.M Shah go? A question that everybody asks but nobody has the answer to A memorandum submitted recently to the Prime Minister by the Naya Kashmir Forum lists reasons why political disillusionment in the state is spreading and how this process might ultimately threaten the integrity of the country itself. "The government of India," says the memorandum, "relied time and again on such allies and stooges (in J and K) who for their own survival passed such information to the central government which suited their own designs Unfortunately a feeling is being created in the minds of the Muslims of the state that they are unpatriotic They find no other reason for installing stooges (by New Delhi) in place of democratically elected governments." Even Governor Jagmohan has reversed the political dice cast on 2 July 1984.

He has sent, in the last six months (apart from complaints of corruption to the chief minister) a number of letters to the centre suggesting that Governor's rule be imposed in the state and fresh elections be called some months later The Raj Bhawan is of the view that Kashmir should be treated not as a political but as a national question but New Delhi has been silent to its requests Instead it gives repeated assurances of support to the Shah ministry Arun Nehru, who was holidaying in the state recently did so and only a couple of days later, G M Shah himself flew down to New Delhi to bring forth a fresh promise from the Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi Which is what hurts the Kashmiri pride the most Why should New Delhi decide such a matter? Why cannot Kashmir be ruled by the people of the state by a leader elect? What does Delhi want to say by denying us a democratic government? In an interview to this correspondent immediately after the toppling of the Farooq Abdullah government last year, the former Jammu and Kashmir chief minister, Mir Qasim, had said that by repeating the charade about the "suspicious Kashmiri character the centre was only opening a chapter that is closed. Every day you tell us that Kashmir is drifting apart We sometimes begin to wonder whether we are part of you at all. Why rub it in? If the centre continues to do this, I would not blame the Kashmiri people later." In a year of Gulshah rule, this feeling has only gathered ground.

Congressmen Oppose Shah's Rule

State Congress(I) unit wants support to the Shah government withdrawn

Picturesque Srinagar was recently the venue of hectic political parleys. Not one, but five central leaders descended on this summer capital of Jammu and Kashmir, not, as you might imagine, to escape from the oppressive heat of Delhi, but to confer with chief minister Ghulam Mohammad Shah, his cabinet colleagues and senior Congress(I) leaders of the state. And among those who undertook the journey to the Valley were two faces familiar with Kashmir politics—minister of state for power, Arun Nehru, and Arif Mohammed Khan, both of whom had been associated with Dr Farooq Abdullah's ouster from the chief ministership a year ago. The other central leaders present in Srinagar recently were union labour minister, T. Anjaiah, and minister of state for steel, Kanwar Natwar Singh.

The purpose of their visit was to look into the complaints of maladministration which even senior leaders of the party in the state had been levelling; this has increasingly been leading to strains between the ruling National Conference (K) and the Congress(I) which has been propping up this government of defectors, led by Sheikh Abdullah's son-in-law. Senior state Congress(I) leaders, including Gulam Rasool Kar MP, have been saying in public that the administration of Gulshah, as the chief minister is popularly known, has totally failed to give a clean government to the people of the state and solve their economic problems. "The situation has worsened drastically as some of the ministers are not only openly encouraging corrupt officials but are also indulging in corruption themselves," said a Congress(I) leader, who wished to remain anonymous.

The deteriorating law and order situation in the state seems to have become the chief concern of Delhi. In order to give his government a clean facade, the chief minister recently announced that he would retire all those officials found guilty of corrupt practices. He also ordered the constitution of a special committee to prepare a list of such officials. But even three months after the announcement nothing has been done in this direction. In fact, this committee is being used by the chief minister to censure and warn only those officials who have either come in the way of corrupt ministers, or have remained neutral in the Shah-Farooq conflict or have refused to oblige the ruling party on various administrative matters. As Dr Abdullah said, "It remains to be seen how Shah reacts. But one thing is becoming clear: the chief minister's Congress(I) allies are keen to see the end of the one-year-old relationship with Shah's government."

And this is precisely what is worrying the centre. During their stay in Srinagar, both Arun Nehru and Arif Mohammad Khan had extensive meetings with PCC(I) chief Mufti Mohammed Sayed to bring about better coordination between the state unit of the Congress(I) and the Curfew raj. Para military personnel checking passes during a curfew imposed shortly after G.M. Shah came to power

National Conference (K). They also met leaders of the ruling National Conference and Governor Jagmohan. In fact, on their return, chief minister Shah and his wife, Begum Khalida, also the president of the party, along with deputy chief minister D. D. Thakur were summoned to New Delhi, presumably at the behest of the Prime Minister. The two central leaders had apparently reported in detail the goings-on in the state.

It is believed that there was considerable pressure on the two leaders from state Congress(I) leaders to influence the high command to withdraw support to the Shah ministry. This is especially so in view of the fact that the Congress(I) in Kashmir is virtually a divided house with Trilochan Dutt, a senior party leader from Jammu accusing Mufti Mohammed Sayed of dominating the party with his supporters from the Valley. In fact, Trilochan Dutt is posing a challenge to Mufti since the legislators from Jammu form a larger group in the Assembly than those from the Valley. It is this Jammu-Valley tussle that is touching a breaking point. In fact, there was even a serious move to either expel Dutt, or at least suspend him from the party for sometime. What is, however, being evaluated is the support he enjoys among the legislators. For a crisis in the Congress(I) can even threaten the survival of the Shah government.

Without the support of the 26 Congress(I) MLAs, Shah with his 17 MLAs is no match for the 32 MLAs belonging to Farooq Abdullah's National Conference. However, the fact that the move to suspend Dutt has been given up speaks volumes for the support he enjoys among legislators.

Whether or not the central leaders have succeeded in bringing about a rapprochement between Shah and the local Congress leaders is not known as yet. Arun Nehru has reiterated the party's "unqualified support" to Gulshah's government, but if the attitude of the local Congress(I) leaders has remained unchanged towards Gulshah's administration, then the central leaders failed in their task. It is believed that it was suggested that a coalition government be formed with the Congress(I) and the NC(K), but senior leaders in the state were apprehensive as they felt that this would only give a bad name to the party in the state. The problem seems to be that the Congress(I) leaders in the state are unhappy because they are being made to support Shah's government by the high command, despite the local unit's obvious reluctance.

Meanwhile, Governor Jagmohan who had stopped persuading the centre to impose President's rule in the state, especially after the wellknown "wazwan" hosted by Gulshah at Kashmir House in Delhi where the Prime Minister was present, (apparently, it was this dinner which turned the tide in Shah's favour) has again started indirectly complaining about the functioning of the government. He did not make any secret of this when Shah met him before leaving for Delhi to parley with the Prime Minister. Mufti too seems to favour Jagmohan's view that President's rule should be imposed in the state, after the Assembly is put in suspended animation for sometime.

Adding to Shah's problems is the fact that any call for agitation given by Farooq Abdullah against the goverment of G.M. Shah meets with tremendous success. For instance, last month Farooq Abdullah had announced a statewide agitation to "restore democracy" in the state by holding elections under Governor's rule. The call for a bandh given by the National Conference (Opposition) and some other parties received a tremendous response as the entire Kashmir Valley wore a deserted look on 6 May, the day of the opening of the civil secretariat for the summer. But Dr Abdullah decided not to go ahead with the stir, as it would affect the tourist trade, which would be harmful for the state.

Add to this the facts that there are hundreds of political activists who are in jails for having raised their voice against the Shah government, that anti-national elements who make it a habit to raise pro-Pakistani slogans at public meetings are having a field day and you get a full picture of what is happening in the state today.

Yusuf Jameel, Srinagar

A SUMMER OF DISCONTENT

Acts of sabotage, arson, killings and destruction are breaking out all over India like an ugly rash: The country today seems engulfed in an uncontrollable wave of violence. Tension and frustration everywhere—social, economic and political—is giving way to sporadic terror and mass protests. Thirty-seven years after independence, India finds itself at a crucial point in history. What is happening to the country and why? Romesh Thapar answers.

There is no getting away from dynastic scenarios and assessments. One look at the disarray around the Congress Party and its totemic leader, Rajiv Gandhi, is enough to tell us that he is battered by the problems his mother left behind unresolved, or, better still, the problems she thought she could shelve or keep in cold storage for melting when the moment was opportune—yes, for her. His only stupidity is that he too does not move to untie the obvious knots.

When I was learning my journalistic trade, around the time when we were about to witness the transfer of power, I remember an evening when some seniors in the profession were wondering whether India's problems would burst out all at once, and whether our inexperienced political leadership—in 1947!—would be able to prevent such a disaster. This fear of several, simultaneous eruptions all over the sub-continent, dispersing the strength of the centre, was critical to assessments in those tempestuous years.

A victim of the bomb blasts in Delhi being treated at a hospital

Eruptions there were, even major challenges like the armed struggle in Telengana, but the people in their wisdom respected their leaders who had structured the freedom movement, and they exercised patience. This patience was strengthened by the energy of the first governments of free India to consolidate our ravaged frontiers, to absorb the multitude of princely states, to reorganise the states of the union on a linguistic coherence, and, let it not be forgotten, to embark on the massive, self-reliant industrial development of the sub-continent.

This fund of popular goodwill, despite varying and erratic election results, began to exhaust itself the moment consciousness grew about the ineffectiveness of our planning processes to tackle the gut problems of poverty and lack of opportunity. The escalation in discontent was sharp in the Seventies when no remedial steps were taken to fix more relevant priorities for growth. Behind the political turbulence today is the economic strangulation resulting from our ineptness as managers.

The key is the fact that we have used political activity as a means, not of solving problems, but of acquiring short-term power, unearing of the results. Thereby, the political process has created a number of vested interests, from reservation to 'sons of the soil,' from dissidence to agitations, to gather the votes. This has become an end in itself, making huge gashes in the social fabric.

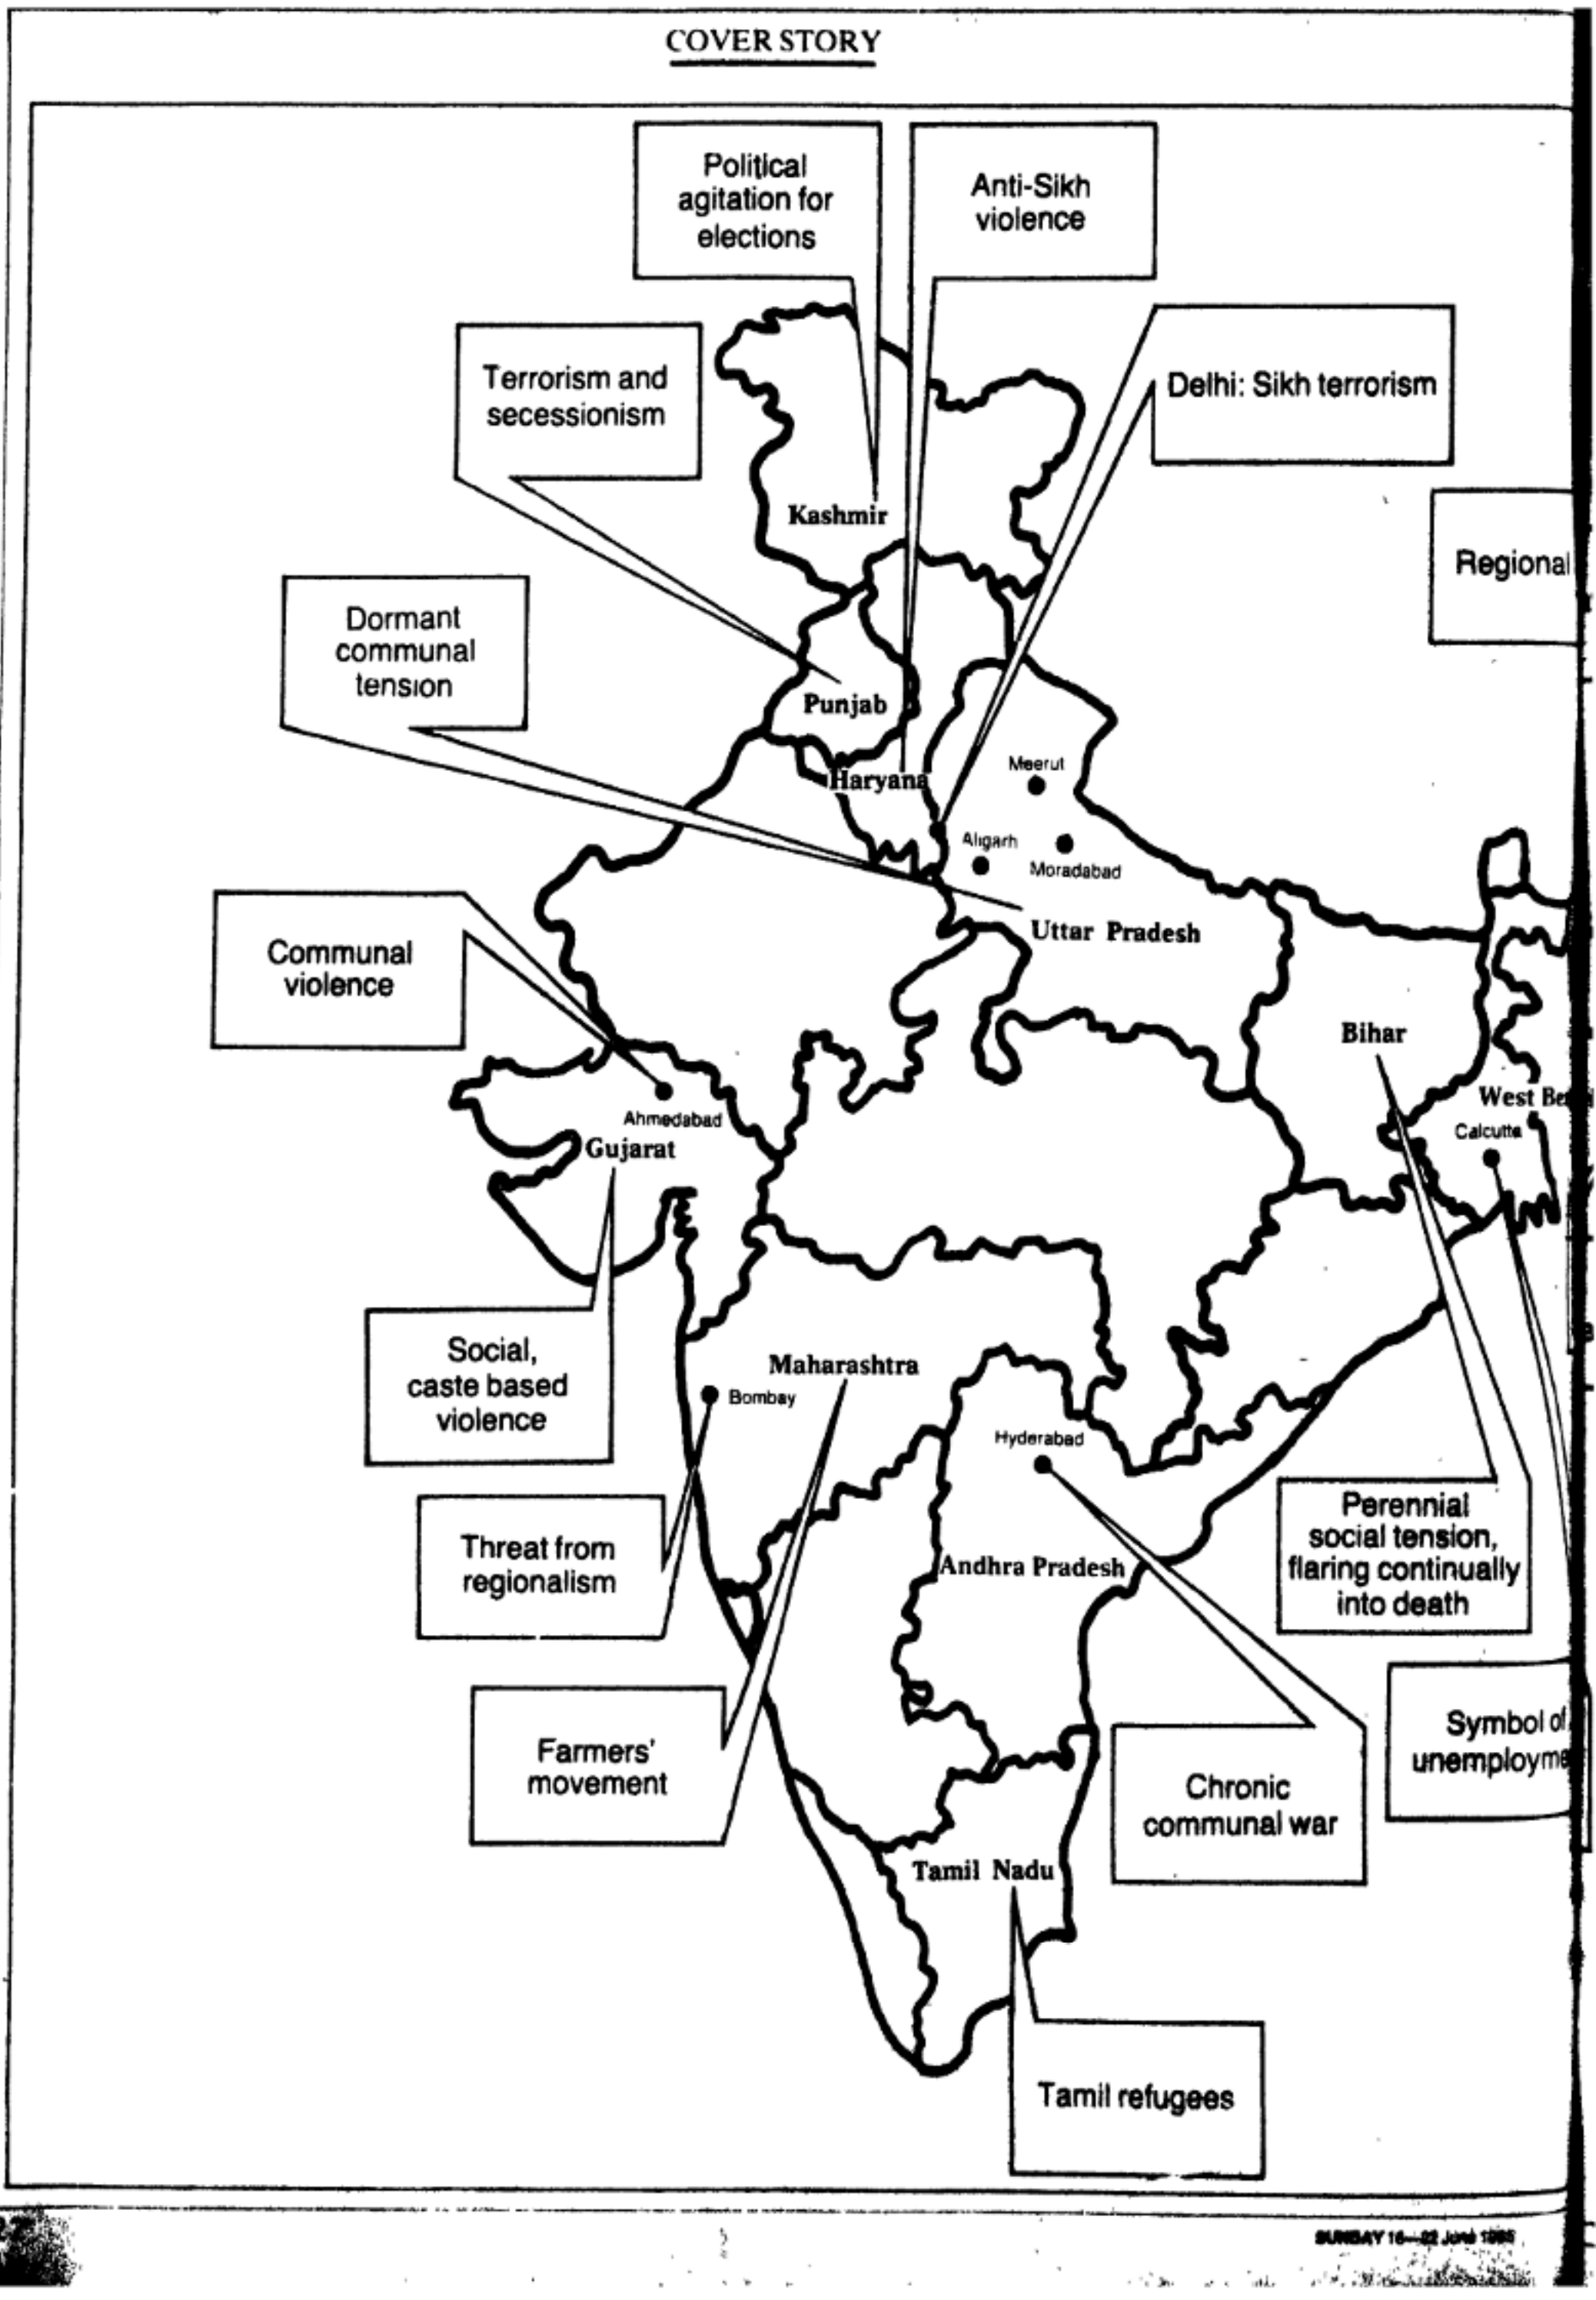
Lumpen, unemployed, alienated youth, unable to link to local opportunity, are latching on to every manifestation of "rebellion," something which might shake the rotten status quo. And such youth is the largest constituency in present-day India—some 60 per cent under the age of 35. A mere youthful Prime Minister, however, is not enough to assuage the angers inherent in this constituency.

I ask myself why should Assam, headed by a very disciplined student and teacher movement, be kept hooked on endless negotiations when we are all agreed that the Bengali migration cannot be allowed to disturb the political balance of the state. Several answers are possible: select one, agree upon it, and implement.

I ask myself why should a thoroughly unrepresentative, defector government be allowed to misbehave in Kashmir when it is widely known that its existence only encourages secessionist feelings of the worst communal kind. Surely, President's Rule and fresh elections in six months or earlier is the only way to restore democratic normalities. What advantage, to put it at its worst, is there in delay?

I ask myself why Gujarat, where everyone has been fighting everyone, has not been salvaged from the faction battles of the ruling Congress Party. "Is central intervention only reserved for opposition-controlled states? Is no one aware that the Hindu caste collisions of Gujarat, punctuated by vicious anti-Muslim sorties, could spread to adjoining states at the bidding of this or that political group? Does the rise of the Shiv Sena in Bombay, and the prevarications of Congressmen on the future of the city, provide no warning signals of the storms on the way?

Naturally, I ask myself why Punjab's problems continue to be treated as exclusively Akali problems, with solutions held up because of crazy terrorist actions to blackmail both Hindus and Sikhs. Political management embraces the techniques of unilateral initiatives to break the disruptive power of the mischief-makers. Punjab's problems around water, boundaries and centre-state relationships are part of the evolution of our federal polity. Could not permanent commissions take over these burdens which interest and affect many states of the union? Then, only Chandigarh would remain to be handed over as Punjab's capital. That was always the intention.



And, finally, I ask myself why we are so slow in legislating mandatory orders to regulate the environs of places of worship—yes, of all religions and sub-religions—as also of the management of their funds, the elections of their leading committees and of the disciplines to prevail in these places. No religion in this country can demand sovereign status for its temple, mosque, gurudwara or church. Let it be stated in clear-cut terms, within the framework of our federal Constitution and on the basis of the fundamental rights enshrined in it. We are dragging our feet without reason though we speak of a secular commitment.

Even as we fail to take these very logical steps towards democratic coherence, and ignore the reports of the police commission which pointed to the breakdown of our law-and-order systems, we keep legislating more and more powers for what will under the circumstances become a lawless state, if it has not already become in certain regions of India. This insensitivity to justice, the lack of concern about torture when in custody, and the connivance in brutalities of various kinds, could bury the democratic life we pledged ourselves to.

There's much more to be concerned about. Let me take just one sample of the duplicity we indulge in—the denouncing of Pakistan as a refuge and training point for terrorists and the quiet acceptance of Tamil Nadu's succour to those who are challenging the Sri Lankan state. Not a whimper from any corner of India because Tamil votes are important. And now, at last, EMS Namboodiripad has to denounce this double-think and double-talk, and win editorial plaudits.

All this is feeding the violence and the angers that are surfacing over the sub-continent. It is as if no one is in command at any level. To some extent, this was inevitable after the rather oppressive Indira Gandhi years. But the fear is growing that we are moving beyond the point of no return, to use a phrase from the jargon of airlines pilots. The breakdown is becoming too visible.

The future cannot be grasped without an understanding of the past. If that is too much for our politicians, at least the recent past needs studying in the context of the developing chaos. The splitting of the Indian National Congress in 1969 on the false belief that this purge would purify. The use of Calcutta's loafers and unemployed to break the back of Naxalism. The Sanjay circus and all its ramifications during the Emergency. The harassment of Indira Gandhi after she had lost the primeministership. The fascistic polarisation of the country by her into friends and foes. The brazen manipulation of Indian politics using the powers of government for blackmail. The nurturing of the killer Bhindranwale. The tragic aftermath. All this, and more, makes our grim present and our uncertain future.

A critical element is the scale of the present crisis and the moral failure to confront it. There is a tame acceptance of every distortion and violation of norms, particularly at the highest levels of governance. The easy rationalisation that adjustment to this style is the way of survival creates the rebellious mood among those who are never heard at the base of our society. They are inflammable material in the hands of lumpen politicians linked to various parties.

This country's administrators, known for their skill and experience in handling riot situations, are no longer able to cope with mobs that have no anchorage or stake in society. The ambience of the lost and the damned, the faceless ones, defeats those who imagine that crises can be managed intelligently. Soon, there is recourse to the traditional medicine, a mix of lawless laws and brutal force. It works temporarily. But when the fevers return, there is no curbing the derangement.

Apart from setting an example of probity and principled commitment at the highest levels, it is becoming increasingly clear that almost everything is wrong with our so-called growth model. It is not able to cushion the crises of the youth. It is here that various alienations are nurtured. We think that the old populist rhetoric will satisfy. Far from it. We need housing in local materials, within a modern mohalla style. Education has to become training for self-employment, particularly to service one of the largest urban spreads in the world. Baby cars are not the answer for Indian mobility when tens of thousands need bus systems of various denominations to meet their needs. Medicine has to gear to a basic health service available within easy distance and without the harassments of today. Within such frameworks we have to formulate our concerns for the people's welfare. We have the skills and resources, but we lack the passion to structure the change.

Admittedly, agitation and eruption lead to some measure of correction but to rely on this kind of pressure and motivation is extremely dangerous, particularly to the functioning of a society which owing to its complexities must remain democratic-minded, flexible and sensitive. We are forgetful of what is expected of us in the give-and-take of today. And there is no one emerging to remind us and to persuade us—an almost obsessive activity in the early years of freedom.

When Congressmen, including office-holders and elders, complain of the inaccessability of the Prime Minister, and opposition leaders feel that they are treated as enemies, as persons not to be trusted, the scenario is one of disarray, of acting without reference to common interest. India cannot function in this manner. It possesses an inherent divisiveness which needs constant and energetic attention—at least, until a genuine modernisation of her people has taken place. So far, only a tiny elite claims this transformation. We remain so terribly tribal in our reactions, and for this reason have no compunction in accepting those three inter-locked evils which have embraced our polity—criminalisation, communalisation and bureaucratisation. I could add a fourth: militarisation.

Many people in our world have been through tempestuous times. They have teetered on the edge of many disasters, pulling back just in time to tread paths of sanity and reason. An amalgam of many factors created the sensitivities required for such a dramatic change. Maybe, what we are witnessing will mark the beginning of our revulsion with the ways of violence and disorder. It has happened with other people. It can happen with us. Yes, in dreams begin responsibility.

These headlines appeared on the front pages of newspapers on a single day last week. They recorded trouble of varying intensity in areas thousands of miles apart, but they had a familiar ring about them, manifesting the syndrome of tension and confrontation afflicting people professing different religions, and speaking different languages. For a long time they have lived on the edge of disaster and this summer their discontent seems to have reached a bursting point.

Punjab today is in the midst of a phase where the Sikh youths, guided by lunatics and frustrated by unemployment, are lost in a wilderness of violence.

Both the Akali Dal groups, one led by Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and the other by Baba Joginder Singh, the late Bhindranwale's father, are wooing the Sikh youth. By asserting itself, the Longowal group has retrieved part of the ground it had lost by its timid approach earlier, but has not given up its old habit of running with the hare and hunting with the hounds. The government is more responsive this time

But the Hindus of Punjab have hardened in the last one year. They are not ready to accept what they would have in 1983 or the beginning of 1984. Most Hindus have come to doubt whether the Akalis consider the Sikhs part of the Indian nation and attach little importance to their oft-repeated statement that India is their motherland. Some of the Akali demands, like the integration of Punjabi-speaking areas, including Chandigarh, with Punjab, equitable distribution of the Ravi-Beas waters, and granting of more powers to the state, articulate Punjabi nationalism, but the Akali emphasis on Dharam Yudh and the gurdwara culture has alienated the Hindus in Punjab. And today, there is a wide chasm between the two communities that will take a lot of effort to bridge.

But even if a solution to the Punjab problem is found, many people from among the Sikhs and the Hindus will continue to harbour resentment. The Sikh youth in particular may, by and large, stay aloof and dream of achieving a separate nation. This is largely due to incidents like Operation Bluestar and the random killings of Sikhs in Delhi and elsewhere in the wake of Indira Gandhi's assassination. In terms of money, the loss to Punjab due to disturbances in the last three years is estimated at Rs 15,000 crores. Material losses apart, the wedge driven between the Sikhs and the Hindus is the concern of every citizen.

Unlike Punjab, the problem in the north-east is not of recent origin. From ancient times, the region, including Assam, has been the meeting place of many tribes and races. Right through its history, there has been an inflow of people of different origins into the area. In 1931, when linguistic tabulation was undertaken, Assamese was not the language spoken by the majority of the inhabitants of the region.

A former British Governor described Assam (which then included Mizoram, Meghalaya, Arunachal Pradesh and Nagaland) as a broad central corridor hall, from which small rooms, corresponding to the hill districts, open on both sides, with, however, no connecting doors between them The reorganisation of the state, which the States Reorganisation Commission rejected in 1956, but which Mrs Gandhi effected 11 years later, has brought to the fore the old problem of the Assamese-speaking population being in a minority in Assam. Immigration over the years has changed the complexion of the state.

The agitation in Assam, nearly a decade-old now, to oust "foreigners" has embittered every section of the population in the state. The Assamese harbour hatred against the Bengali-speaking population, the Hindus are suspicious of the Muslims and the tribals are fighting the non-tribals. At one time it appeared that fixing 1971 as the "cut-off year" for determining the status of those who had come into the state after that would settle the problem. Even the agitation leaders looked like accepting it. But once again the demand of the All Assam Students Union (AASU) to have 1969 or 1968 as the cut-off year in place of their original demand of 1961 has stalled a solution.

Whether it is 1971, 1961 or any other year, it will not alter the basic point: no outsider can be thrown out of India. Bangladesh will not accept them, as General H. M. Ershad, the Bangladesh Martial Law Administrator, told me a few days ago in Dhaka. The solution on the anvil is to disfranchise "foreigners" for a particular number of years. But the cut-off year has to be agreed upon first. And, in the meanwhile, Assam remains a trouble spot.

The situation in the rest of the north-east is more volatile. Violence is a part of the lives of the inhabitants of Nagaland, Mizoram and Manipur. Hostile Nagas and Mizos have pinned down a large army and para-military forces in the area. New Delhi's efforts towards a settlement have succeeded to some extent, but the hard core of anti-Indian elements remains.

For a long time people have lived on the edge of disaster and this summer their discontent seems to have reached a bursting point

The most disconcerting part, as the home ministry says in an assessment, is: "The emerging pattern in the north-east region indicates a link-up amongst the extremists and subversive elements. There are reports of formation of an armed voluntary organisation known as the Seven United Liberation Army (SULA) drawing its strength from the underground youths of Manipur, Nagaland, Mizoram, Assam, Tripura, Meghalaya and Arunachal Pradesh. The aim of the SULA is to fight for an independent country taking together the seven states/union territories of the region."

The People's Liberation Army (PLA) of Manipur has advocated the formation of the Revolutionary United Front by the various extremist groups of the north-east in order to liberate the region. Yet another extremist group claiming to belong to the People's Revolutionary Party of Kangleipak (PREPAK) has also come to an understanding with the Mizo National Front (MNF). Reports also indicate that the MNF has been maintaining contacts with the Tripura extremists.

The problems in the north-east have multiplied because there are several sanctuaries across the border for the insurgents. The inaccessibility of the terrain makes it difficult for the army to liquidate insurgency in the entire north-east region.

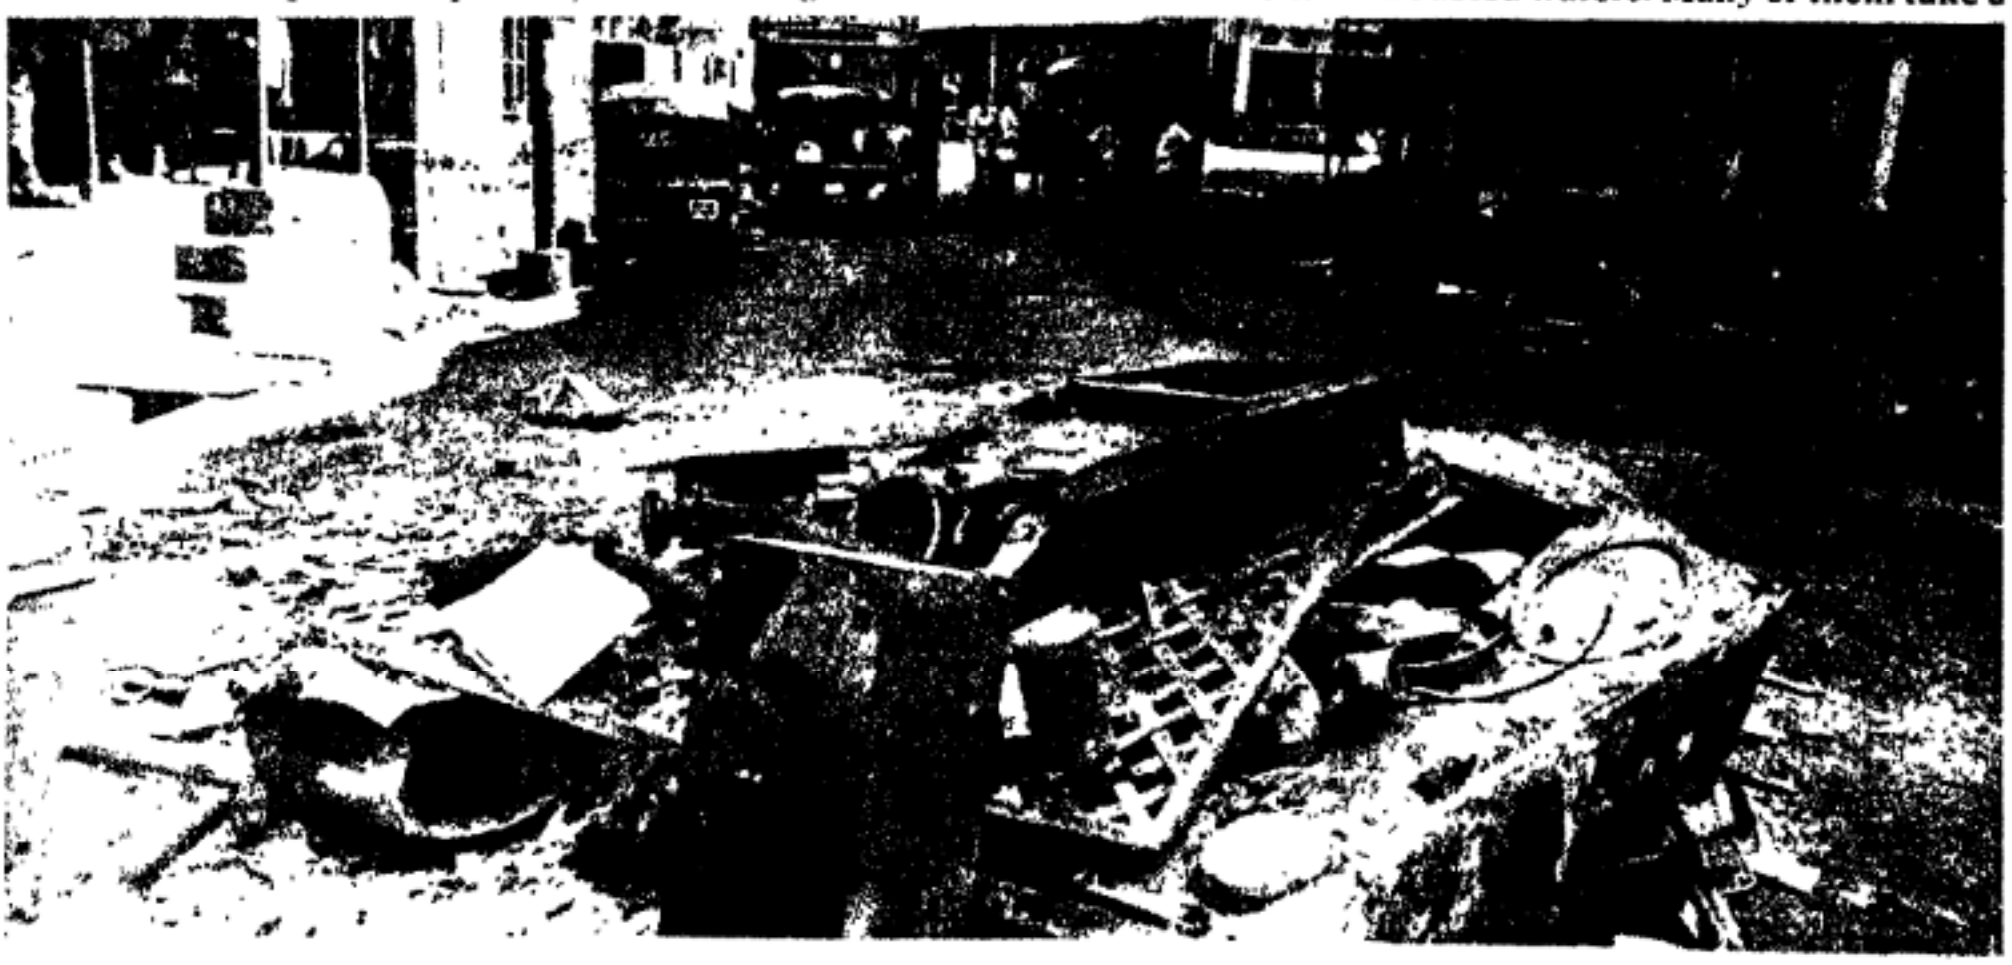
Kashmir, which had achieved some stability when Sheikh Abdullah came to power in 1975, is in turmoil now because Mrs Gandhi arbitrarily dismissed the elected government of Farooq Abdullah, the Sheikh's son, by encouraging the defection of 12 National Conference legislators and installing G.M. Shah as the chief minister. On the one hand, the democratic forces have been weakened, with people saying that India does not believe in democracy when it comes to Kashmir, and, on the other, Muslim fundamentalism has taken root Never before has the Jamaat-e-Islami been so popular in the Valley as it is today.

Adding to the insult of the people is the terrible blow that the state's major industry, tourism, has suffered. For three consecutive seasons there have been few tourists going to Kashmir because of the disturbed conditions in Punjab. The people, especially traders and artisans, are desperate and the slightest provocation brings them to the streets The state government is too unpopular to deal with the situation. Questions regarding Kashmir's accession to India are being asked once again.

But Farooq Abdullah is adamant on his stand that Kashmir is a part of India. However he is being asked to prove that he is an Indian, time and again. Rajiv Gandhi, after assuming power, has held talks with Farooq Abdullah more than once and indicated that he was ready to undo the wrong done by his mother, by dissolving the present state Assembly and ordering fresh elections. But Rajiv's advisers, M. L. Fotedar in particular, who was responsible for Farooq's dismissal, have delayed action so far.

Gujarat has been turned into a battle ground by the state chief minister, Madhavsinh Solanki, himself. The state was amongst the best administered in the country. But the CM's inept handling of a relatively innocuous situation has led to a position where everyone is pitted against everyone: Hindus are against the Muslims, employers are against the employees, and the upper castes are fighting the lower castes. Solanki is not in the good books of Rajiv Gandhi but the PM does not want to oust him from the chief ministership yet.

It is ironical that at a time when India is trying to present its best face to the world outside through festivals, it is doing precious little to cure the festering sores on its body.



The Pains of Progress

K.F. Rustomji analyses the state of the country today

Should we not reorganise our politics and administration so that the fanatic and the demagogue do not claim the right to organise the deaths of thousands under the guise of democratic dissent? In the last three years more than 12,000 persons have been killed in Assam, Punjab, Bhiwandi, Delhi and Ahmedabad in violent movements organised by evanescent groups. Like the Naxalites, they want to "shatter everything to bits" and then "remould it closer to the heart's desire." But what may have seemed feasible to Omar Khayyam may be disastrous today. They may succeed in shattering Indian society if we continue to be unconcerned about their activities, and they may replace the clamour and din of the democratic system striving for consensus and compromise with the silence of an unrelenting dictatorship. Freedom would be totally extinguished. Do we want that? Apologists maintain that India is a large country and that such movements are a sign of growth. They say that there will always be some type of disorder wherever there is dynamism in society. Look at China, look at Indonesia, look at South America, look at any overpopulated country.

If we analyse each disturbance from the time it is an idea mooted in coffee shops or temples, through its various developmental phases, the creation of frenzy and its final outburst into rioting and bloodshed, we will find that the planning is done with a callous disregard for life. When it is first mentioned as a subject which disturbs the people, the authorities view it with a certain amount of disdain and ridicule as in Assam or Gujarat, or they do not know what to say because it is not clear what the agitators want, as in Punjab, or there does not seem to be any genuine grievance. The authorities allow liberty to the organisers even if there is an infraction of the law because they feel that the situation would be aggravated if they take action. Then the intimidation of the police and the executive by the agitators begins and it is followed by sabotage and killings, and the state government goes into a trance. What should we do? Pass another law? Where is the police force to enforce it?

Where can we get the extra policemen from? The whole attitude is defensive in the extreme. Avoid a confrontation--they say to the district magistrates and senior superintendents of police. Let them do what they like. Avoid force. No firing. This is followed by sabotage and murder in Assam, collection of arms and ammunition and the killing of Hindus, Nirankaris and policemen in Punjab. In Ahmedabad, police-baiting occurs on a massive scale in the lanes and by-lanes where stone-throwing is practised as an art (132 policemen have been injured in Gujarat from 18 March to 2 May). Then the centre decides to arraign the state for allowing so much violence. Instructions are issued by the Governor or the chief minister. "No violence should be tolerated." And promptly a few buses are burnt, a few localities looted, and a few men are killed in order to hurl defiance in the face of authority, which results in police firings. The hired bravos of the movement have done their work with practised skill. By this time it is easy to work up an agitation against the police for having used force. Move the police away, even courts say. Not only the police but every single agency of government decides to move away for the sake of safety. The executive with the large cadre of deputy collectors, tehsildars, block officers and thousands of officers who deal with civil supplies, taxes, and so on move away—"Not our business." The judiciary moves towards the agitators thinking that placating them in some ways might help to contain their fury. The media becomes partisan or passive, even the organised political parties take cover. Many important politicians just disappear when their need is the sorest. A large number of others feel that it would be worth fishing in troubled waters. Many of them take a covert part in the agitation, as in Delhi, Ahmedabad, Assam, Bhiwandi or Punjab.

This is the stage at which doubt seizes the organisers. The sanest feel they have raised a Frankenstein and do not know how to contain the public desire for loot and arson, or how to shake off the grip of extremist elements. The easiest course is to carry on and blame the police. This is the time-tested formula since the days of the civil disobedience movements and, as if to confirm that the police have totally failed, the police make numerous blunders and the army is called out. After a few spasmodic attempts at revival by hard core activists who subscribe to the Naxalite philosophy, the bloodshed stops. Now it is a field day for all the do-gooders who are shocked at the violence, and surprised by its intensity. They want to resume talks and parleys, make peace offers and suggest roundtable conferences for withdrawal of the agitation. The media thinks that its role is basically that of doling out the milk of human kindness and government must compromise, even express regret for the use of force. After all, the killings and arson were not deliberate. It is just that the agitation went out of control. Anyway, peace in our time, O Lord, is what is wanted. This, sad to say, is how our democracy functions. The political machine functions only at the time of elections, the government closes down shop and leaves the police to battle alone with the agitators. When the tumult and the shouting breaks out into bloodshed, there is no desire to fix the blame, to find out who failed, why the trouble was not nipped in the bud by enforcing the law. It is a fact that as a race we are terribly afraid of bloodshed. Any group can threaten us with murder and we become pulp, ready to find some way of accepting their proposal, howsoever outrageous it may be. But the number of dead does not move us. They can be counted in thousands. We have no regrets, no tears, no sympathies, no fears of a recurrence of violence. There is, however, a self-purifying desire to help the victims of violence if it does not mean more than contributing an old shirt and a torn saree, or a few rupees to the Prime Minister's relief fund, provided it is tax-exempted. We may, however, protest at the perversity of foreign TV stations that refuse to expound our plans for development, and only show us killing each other all the time.

India is a unique country in one other respect. We never punish anybody in the normal judicial way.

A policeman patrols the streets of a riot-torn area in Khurja, UP

Anybody who is prosecuted in court is presumed to be suitable for acquittal after a brief wait as an undertrial. If he is to be punished, it would have to be in the police lock-up or in the street by angry policemen or frenzied mobs. It matters little if police firing goes out of line and a little girl is killed. She is expendable as far as the state is concerned. In any case the police are a bloody lot. Blame them. That exonerates the organisers and the government.

Forget the dead: but count the votes. In a few years even the votes may not be worth counting because we may have killed democracy by then. Twelve thousand dead in an overpopulated country—particularly as all of them would be poor and half dead in any case—does not create a big outcry. Nor do we think of the widows, the orphans, those left with no support, or the feelings of revenge which generate vendettas that go on for generations. All that has been our lot for centuries, we say.

We can also discount the cost of such disturbances—the crores spent in security arrangements, the relief camps, rehabilitation, the crores lost in trade and industry, the crores spent in wages. We can print notes for 500 or 1000 crores in a day and deal with the inflation afterwards by providing tax reliefs. We keep wailing that the guilty seem to be going unpunished, but no practical steps are taken to correct it. Apart from those that the police shoot and others who have been mowed down by mobs, there is hardly anybody who can be held accountable for the damage caused. Forget Roman law, forget Indian law, and even forget justice. We do not believe in conviction in a court of law. It almost seems a travesty of justice to us to think that those who organise carnage should be punished. In the first place, the FIRs would be defective. Then the court would readily hold that delay of one day has been caused by the police in presenting the chalan, so the case is seriously weakened and the accused can be bailed out. The witnesses refuse to appear in court after some of them are killed, other legalities appear and the court rightly holds that the prosecution has failed to prove the case. In fact even strictures could be considered justified as the police had arrogantly taken on the role of arbiters of the country's destiny according to the defence lawyer.

So, in sum, we have a sort of exceptional democracy in which crime and disorder are rampant (mafias have grown in every major city), where the criminal justice system depends only on the police, which functions spasmodically, where the legislatures have ceased to be the place where conflicts are resolved. Yet we are all sustained by the hope that the government will do something. Inwardly we are getting more and more cynical as the years go by.

Is there a way out, or do we keep on drifting in the ocean of disaster wondering where the next storm will come from and how the frail bark of democracy will weather it? I am one of those who is sure there is a safe passage and we will find it. In the first place we must learn to deal with disorder with the inherent strength of a democracy and the real strength is the popular will. If 700 millions express it in the right way, it can create an impact sufficient to deal with the most obdurate agitation. But first we must learn to stand up against threats and enforce the law ruthlessly from the very beginning of an agitation. The popular will can only appear if the people are well-informed and are able to see what is happening in clear terms, and are able to express that will in such a way that it would strengthen the government and guide it firmly.

It is difficult to say where the blame lies. Is it our size? Is it our poverty? Is it a failure of the media? Why is it that the Indian has failed to feel and be moved by the tragedy that has struck thousands of people? Twelve thousand are only the people killed. The disruption of life has affected millions. Millions more, particularly the minorities, have lived in fear and dread of the frenzy that is organised again and again by the enemies of the people. Mahesh Bhatt can make a whole theatre gush with tears with the story of an elderly couple whose son was killed by thugs in New York in the film Saaransh. Why is it that the tragedy of thousands killed in agitations leaves us cold? We don't relate. Is it because we can identify with one middle class family, and not with thousands of the poor, or is it because we identify only with Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs, or com munity-wise? The poor do not interest us. Why? I can only assume that it is the fault of the national media which is adept at concealing disasters. In a democracy that is a serious crime. But does anybody consider that we are serving democracy poorly by deception, concealment, cover-ups, by not allowing the worst to be known and its causes understood? We have a large number of poor and illiterate people. Is it in the national interest to mislead them, even brutalise them instead of giving them lessons in feeling, in understanding the depth of suffering that is the lot of those who are the victims of out internal wars?

Perhaps we are just at the beginning of our democratic life. Our artists, writers, dramatists and our poets are still searching for a way to depict our condition. Even Saaransh is a new development. Some writers may already have undertaken the task of depicting our deliriums. A sensitive film on the pattern of The Day After may even be in the making, showing the damage that has been done to our national ethos by violence. A dramatist may prove once again that a scream is better than a political thesis.

There is something strong and enduring in the voice of the people which we have felt at times but never properly acknowledged because at heart we are all monarchists. We have seen waves at election time—unpredictable and overpowering—welling up somewhere in the deep sub-conscious of the race. Elections have helped to solve our most intractable problems because it is the inner voice that speaks the most enduring truths.

As soon as the election is over, all the political work collapses. Congressmen become interested only in office—in minitries—what to get out of politics, not what to give. All the other parties also disappear from the scene. Whatever is left of the voice of the people is only there to be heard in legislatures where it becomes the voice of politicians, not of the people. True democracy will only come when each political party maintains and nurtures its cadres, has regular organisational elections, and encourages a mixture of the organisational and the governmental effort, even an alternation between them from time to time.

Unless we have vibrant political parties that are always in the field, prepared to meet every vile concept with counter propaganda, and in which some of the best men of the party are committed, we have only a facade of democracy, not a true democracy. If we can organise the party in the right way, the strength of government will improve immeasurably and we would not have to depend only on the police and the army to deal with agitations.

Forget the dead: but count the votes. In a few years even the votes may not be worth counting because we may have killed democracy by then.

The structure of government too needs a basic change. In the name of liberty we have allowed licence to come into every governmental organisation. There is an enormous amount of indiscipline which we accept as normal—an unjustified proliferation everywhere—a cynical disregard of the need for cooperation in government. What is lacking is a unity of purpose, with the result that the district magistrate thinks differently, the sessions judge has his own ideas, the superintendent of police differs from both in the districts. At a higher level, it seems as if the judiciary and the Legislature, the army and the police, the IAS and the IPS, are all in a state of permanent confrontation.

Where is the basic cohesion which good government requires? Why should there be no common aim? In many cases there is no common meeting ground. We keep on developing institutions which have a separate identity, all of it jealously guarded. What is the result? If there is a threat to the integrity of the nation—a war—unity is mysteriously achieved, but if the dangers are not apparent or are concealed, we work at cross purposes. If we can make all agencies of the government work as a team, we can deal with a problem of any size. All institutional arrangements should be designed only to further cohesion. This applies even to the judicial side where we will have to work out systems which will enable the law to be clearly established and firmly administered with the main purpose of protecting the people from the fanatics and demagogues.

Lastly, future agitations will develop the themes and techniques used in the last three years and add a few unpleasant aspects which are present in our politics and our administration. Terrorism will almost certainly be used by all agitations that appear to be failing because there is a basic theme of Naxalism which persists in all of them. Secondly, mafia kings will take a hand in it, if only because it weakens the police. Their money from drugs and gambling will be a big help to any agitation. Thirdly, politics will be stained by young hoodlums specialising in double dealing, posing as symbols of purity on the one hand, and on the other supporting every cause which spells money.

Will our administration stretched to the utmost with hardly any police reserves, media support or administrative unity be able to deal with agitations without enough legal or judicial support or the massive public backing which is required?

The saaransh (gist) of what I am writing is that we neither realise how weak we are because of our lack of political and administrative cohesion, nor understand how powerful the movements of the future will be, and the destruction they will cause. We still have time to reorganise our politics and administration and strengthen our resolve to face only movement with firm determination, and to crush it the moment it resorts to violence. Each one of us has to see that this opportunity to review our defences against internal enemies is not lost.

Bihar: Living with Violence

Caste and class conflict leave the state in turmoil

The sound of gunfire, instead of the chiming of bells, heralded in the new year (1985) in the harijan settlement of Kaitha-Bigha in Bihar's Aurangabad district. A police patrol surrounded one of the village huts and demanded the surrender of its unyielding inmates. The resulting gory battle that lasted throughout the night left 12 people dead. Locals say that the landlords of the area personally doused the village huts with kerosene and set them on fire during the encounter, so that all that remained of the village by the morning was a heap of ashes.

This incident is a typical example of clashes in Bihar that are triggered off by social tensions, rural poverty and aggravated by considerable economic inequalities and increasing harijan militancy. Locals say that on the evening of 31 December, harijans led by Naxalite militants, met to discuss how to avenge the rape of a harijan girl by the son of a powerful landlord. The landlords, unable to prevent the meeting from taking place, called the police with the message that "armed extremists were planning to annihilate the landlords." The landlords had long been looking for a chance to teach the harijans a lesson, since the militants had inspired them (the harijans) to demand a hike in their minimum wages and resist attempts at eviction from their lands, and that night seemed the perfect excuse.

Such occurrences are only a few examples to illustrate that bloodletting and violence have assumed staggering proportions in Bihar. Home department reports state that Bihar witnessed nearly 14,000 riots in 1984, 18 per cent more than in 1983, and more than 3,000 murders, 4.3 per cent more than the previous year. A senior police official who refused to be quoted said that this was due to the 'retaliation' after Mrs Gandhi's murder coupled with the two general elections. Fair and free elections are a must for effective functioning of a democratic system, but in Bihar, might prevails, and the politicians stoop to criminal dealings and even murder, to establish their supremacy.

The largescale violence witnessed by Bihar during the December elections caused the election commission to mark Bihar as the most sensitive state. During the Lok Sabha elections about a dozen Congress(I) and CPI workers were killed in Jehanabad and the Assembly elections witnessed similar casualties.

Besides fights for political supremacy, the perennial clashes are also associated with land disputes, caste wars, economic deprivation and exploitation of women. "Most of the cases are related to land disputes," says Mr Sudhir Kumar Katraia, an advocate of Patna High Court.

Recurring clashes have now become the way of life in more and more areas of Bihar and gradually greater parts of the population are being affected. From official figures we see that only 15 per cent of the state's population owns more than 80 per cent of the land. The remaining land has to be shared by a very large number of people. The middle-class agriculturists, unable to get remunerative prices for their produce, are unable to pay minimum wages to their workers. In the fight against the have-nots the more prosperous upper-middle class peasants take the side of the landlords. Eviction of landless harijans from the "benami" plots they occupy or from the meagre plots allotted to them under the 20-point programme is an integral part of the social set-up in every village. Harijans leaving their villages with none to speak in their favour is a regular feature of life in rural Bihar. The January incident at Kaithi Bihar was one such example.

The restless among the tribals in Santhal Parganas and Chotanagpur is due to some traditional reasons as well as lopsided government planning. Erosion of the tribal culture by outsiders, eviction of the tribals from their lands by money-lenders and government officials, without alternative place for the tribals to go to, deforestation and government apathy to develop these areas are cited as some of the reasons. Another factor generally mentioned with reference to the clashes between the tribals and the 'dikus' (a term used by Santhals for non-tribals) is the exploitation of the tribal sentiment by the leadership for their own ends. The allotted government aid has not reached these areas. The National Rural Employment Programme (NREP) and the Integrated Rural Development Programme. (IRDP) have not been effectively translated into practice. "Here it was much easier to cheat the tribals," says Suraj Mandal, leader of the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha.

Thus, with landlords clashing with the landless, police versus people and students against students, Bihar may not be as peaceful a place as the new chief minister envisages. There have already been 78 murders, mainly due to clashes, in the first quarter of 1985. However, the law and order problem is high on the state government's priority list. With the monsoon and planting season imminent, Bihar might be the scene of another round of gory clashes. Will the government be able to bring the situation under control ?

Dissent in the Ranks

The old order has changed yielding place to the new—but not without an expression of discontent

The discontent in the summer of 1985 is unique. Normally an organised opposition is needed to sharpen feelings against the ruling elite. The Rajiv Gandhi-led Congress(I) mauled the opposition in the December 1984 Lok Sabha polls. The performance of the opposition parties improved in the Assembly elections held in March. However, the poor performance of the ruling party was due to the denial of tickets to many sitting Congress(I) members coupled with general discontent among Congressmen. Apart from Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh, where the Janata Party and the Telugu Desam respectively swept the polls, the only state where the opposition staged a creditable performance was Maharashtra. It was not the personal charisma of any individual which enabled the Progressive Democratic Front (PDF) led by Sharad Pawar to restrict the Congress(I) to a majority of only 18 seats in the Maharashtra Assembly. The splitting of the anti-Congress(I) vote having been avoided, the opposition parties fared better in Maharashtra. Today, Sharad Pawar and a group of his followers are debating whether they should join the Congress(I) or not, instead of mobilising opposition against it. The discontent in the summer of 1985 is unique because it is not politically organised. The masses in various parts of the country are expressing their discontent without any help from organised political parties. Also, there is discontent within the ruling party—though they are not free to express themselves openly.

Why are Congressmen unhappy? Under Rajiv Gandhi, their party has won a better mandate from the people than it ever did under Jawaharlal Nehru or Indira Gandhi. The discontent among Congressmen is two-fold—discontent among the party MPs (evident from the fact that dissent has been voiced both in party meetings and expressed in the voting patterns of the parliamentary party elections) and discontent among those who are not members of the legislature. Inaccessibility to the power centre is the main cause for discontent. In the party's functioning today, Arun Singh, the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, has emerged as a central figure. He is one of the three parliamentary secretaries, the other two being Oscar Fernandes and Ahmed Patel. But due to his close relations with the Prime Minister, he is the one most popularly known. He is a personal friend of Rajiv Gandhi from his schooldays. Such is his proximity to the Prime Minister that when the latter decided to take a holiday along with his family and retire to a forest resort in Madhya Pradesh in March, Arun Singh and his wife Nina Singh (who is friendly with Sonia Gandhi) also went along. Arun Nehru, the minister of state for power, is not as powerful as Arun Singh. Mrs Gandhi's trusted political aide, Makhan Lal Fotedar too has a say in party matters. When he was elected to the Rajya Sabha recently, there were rumours that Fotedar was on his way out. But the fact was that by nominating him for a Rajya Sabha ticket, Rajiv Gandhi was only ensuring that his political adviser had better facilities in Delhi. After the 1980 elections, Sanjay Gandhi had decided that AICC(I) office-bearers of the rank of general secretary should be accommodated in the Rajya Sabha so that they could get an official bungalow, telephone and other amenities. (Later some AICC(I) joint secretaries too were accommodated in the Rajya Sabha on the same principle). Besides, Oscar Fernandes too is an important personality in the capital's power equation.

And the buck stops there. No party general secretary or cabinet minister is included in the ruling caucus today. This is a major cause of discontent among Congressmen.

It may be argued that if there is discontent in the Congress(I), why does it not come out in the open? The AICC(I) session held in Delhi, in early May, did indeed see some criticism of the official resolutions, but the power centre was not attacked directly. The psyche of the Congressman over the last decade and a half has been oriented towards sycophancy. The removal of Vasantdada Patil as the chief minister of Maharashtra was a rash step. It only revealed the discontent in the party. By and large, partymen were unhappy with the modus operandi being adopted in Maharashtra. Sharad Pawar had been a young Congress leader in that state. He had been initially propped up by the late Y.B. Chavan. Congressmen cannot forget that in the days when Indira Gandhi was out of power, Sharad Pawar had headed a coalition government with the Janata Party. Asked to choose between Pawar and Vasantdada Patil, the partymen preferred Patil, who had been an AICC(I) general secretary in the days when Sharad Pawar enjoyed power outside the Congress' fold The inaccessibility of Arun Singh, however, seems to be restricted only to Congressmen. His sudden appearance at a dinner hosted by a Congress(S) MP a month ago created a flutter among the ruling party MPs. When Vasantdada Patil resigned, he won kudos from most partymen. In one stroke he had foiled the plans of the leader of the opposition in Maharashtra as the chief minister of the state. Congressmen may be submissive, but even submission has a limit. If party tickets are denied to leaders, if meetings are not possible with the powers that be, then submission cannot be sustained for long. The very fact that Shivajirao Patil Nilangekar, the new Maharashtra chief minister, was "weeded out" when Assembly tickets were given, shows the arbitrariness of the high command's decisions.

The discontent in Assam had seen the sudden departure of organised political groups. The students of Assam, organised under the banner of All Assam Students Union (AASU) and the masses of Assam under the banner of the All Assam Gana Sangram Parishad (AAGSP) have challenged the very existence of organised parties in the state. In Punjab, too, the traditional leadership of the Akali Dal has been challenged by Baba Joginder Singh, a non-entity until a year ago, when suddenly the world came to know of him as the father of the late Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. In Gujarat too, discontent is not being organised by traditional political organisations. The victory of the Shiv Sena in Bombay has shown that national political parties have not been able to cut any ice with the electorate of the country's most modern and alert metropolis. Bombay had been the centre of disorganised discontent earlier, too. The emergence of Datta Samant as the militant trade union leader of the city had made all the central trade union organisations irrelevant. With the mishandling of Andhra Pradesh by the Congress high command till 1982, N.T. Rama Rao, hitherto a political non-entity, emerged as the leader of the Telugu people The discontent of the summer of 1985 has another dimension—that of a generation gap. With Rajiv Gandhi at the helm of affairs, the generation which was born around the time India attained freedom has taken over the reins in India. This is the generation which is preparing to take the country into the twenty-first century. The generation which ruled the country till last year is refusing to bow out gracefully. And the intervening period, between the rule of one generation and the takeover by the next, is bound to create discontent—which is what we see today.

Sikkim: Dormant Secessionism

An uneasy calm prevails in Sikkim today, beneath its apparent tranquillity. A decade after its emergence as the 22nd state of India, the Himalayan state continues to be haunted by an "identity crisis" that has a different meaning for different groups, though the question of a demerger is no longer avidly pursued.

The people of Sikkim, particularly the Bhutia-Lepcha community, would like the present Chogyal, Wangchuk Namgyal, who was consecrated as the 13th Chogyal in 1982, to come out in the open and lead them. But, Wangchuk says, he is not interested in joining politics. Sources close to him maintain that he may have some emotional attachment to the Naya Sikkim Party, which is currently advocating the cause of a demerger, but he refuses to either advise or finance them. The palace supporters had once done so with the present chief minister, Nar Bahadur Bhandari, then of the Sikkim Janata Parishad, and had been let down. After having swept the elections largely on the demerger issue, Bhandari dumped both the issue and the Chogyal at the altar of political exigency. The Naya Sikkim Parishad, created by Captain Wangda, an officer of the late Chogyal's disbanded Sikkim Guards, aims at restoring direct rule by the Chogyal in the future. It is reported that a leader of the Naya Sikkim Party, who enjoys burning the Indian flag and disfiguring portraits of Indira Gandhi, had met some American senators just before the December parliamentary elections. Besides, the Chinese stand which continues to refer to Sikkim as a "country" fuels the lingering dream of such elements.

While such incidents can be described as portentous, reading too much meaning into them may also be misleading for the simple reason that people in this state are more concerned about being swamped by 'outsiders' than the political status of Sikkim The aboriginal Bhutia-Lepchas are haunted by a fear of being outnumbered by the Nepalis, especially from the neighbouring Darjeeling hills and more recently by people from Bihar, Rajasthan and Uttar Pradesh. In fact, the allegation that Bhandari has amassed huge sums of money has only led to apprehensions among the Bhutia-Lepchas who feel that this would help Bhandari consolidate the political base of the Nepalis in the state. The election of the first ever plainsman, Balachand Sarda, in the last Assembly elections has added to this fear.

Bhandari, however, is trying to balance the Nepalis and the Bhutia-Lepchas in a state where people are convinced that no national party can win an election. "Having merged, we do not want to be submerged," is gradually becoming more of a political rule than an exception.

Punjab: Terrorism on the Rise

After the recent wave of violence, the Punjab problem is nowhere near a solution

Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale is dead but the philosophy of violence that he preached continues to inspire the youth of Punjab. Although Indira Gandhi succeeded in crushing him by sending troops into the Golden Temple last year, once dead he grew even more powerful and dangerous than when he was alive. Mrs Gandhi was assassinated. Today, her son Rajiv Gandhi has inherited a problem far more complex. As a Punjab watcher put it, "The fight in Punjab is no more between the terrorists and the government." What started off as an agitation to coerce the centre to concede a couple of regional demands has become a unique religio-political issue. With the agitationists and their leaders unsure of their own demands, the situation is more confusing.

The government too is confused. Extremists have been operating in Punjab since 1980 and most of them are followers of the Akali Dal. Their aim is to force the centre to accept the demands put forward by the Akali Dal. The Punjab administration is certain that the activities of the extremists would come to an end as soon as the government arrives at an understanding with the Akalis. "But what is bothering us are the terrorists," said an intelligence officer who wished to remain unnamed. "The terrorists have no religion and all they are interested in is to establish a new nation, Khalistan, to be precise."

The beginnings of the Punjab agitation can be traced to a seemingly innocuous incident which took place on Baisakhi day, 13 April, 1978. On that day the Nihangs, including followers of Bhindranwale, clashed with the Nirankaris at the Railway Stadium in Amritsar leaving 16 people killed. Of them 13 were followers of Bhindranwale. Says Harbir Singh Bhanwar, a Sikh intellectual and journalist, "The Nirankari-Sikh clash marked the beginning of terrorism in Punjab. The Sikhs believed that the government was siding with the Nirankaris to crush their community." Interestingly, at that time Prakash Singh Badal was heading the Akali-Janata coalition in Punjab.

The Sikhs today find Rajiv Gandhi no better than his mother. They allege that he is responsible for the killing of "thousands of innocent Sikhs—men, women and children—in the November riots." They may not openly talk about Khalistan but they are certainly dreaming of a separate Sikh state.

With Punjab now a virtual police state, the army, the para military forces and the Punjab Police have converted an otherwise curable disease into a cancer. The government claimed that Operation Woodrose—the mopping-up operations by the army to apprehend extremists, after Operation Bluestar broke the backbone of the terrorists in Punjab. The truth is that during such operations, the army harassed, humiliated and kept in illegal custody a large number of innocert Sikhs, a majority of them youths from the villages. Official sources disclosed to SUNDAY that the army personnel relied on mere hearsay while arresting people. A majority of the Sikhs arrested and kept in custody for months by the army after Operation Bluestar were actually innocents. Such an action by the army alienated the Sikh community. Moreover, reports started pouring in that innocent Sikh youths were being falsely implicated in criminal cases involving the killing of Hindus, bomb blasts and arson. The Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF) and the Punjab Police have also angered the Sikhs. All throughout the CRPF has been blatently pro-Hindu and anti-Sikh. The Akali Dal has time and again demanded the withdrawal of the CRPF from Punjab. The Punjab Police is still busy killing Sikh extremists in fake encounters.

As things stand today, there is no sign of an end to terrorism in Punjab. The sentiments of the Sikh youth against the government is still too strong. By and large, the Sikh community feels that it is being discriminated against in India The army action in the Golden Temple, the destruction of the Akal Takht and the November riots have alienated the Sikhs from the national mainstream. The extremists want to continue their tirade against the "Hindu sarkar" and the unknown terrorists operating under the command of Pakistan and America will continue to indulge in bomb blasts and kill innocents, irrespective of the community involved in breaking up India and in the eventuality create a separate Sikh state. Says Gunbir Singh a young industrialist from Amritsar, "There was an increase in the number of extremists in Punjab during the last one year. The reason is mainly the harassment of innocent Sikhs and torture of Sikh youths by the police. The forces are encouraging Sikh youths to take to extremism." Mubarak Singh, a senior Janata Party leader of Punjab, feels that the best way to curb extremism is to educate the general public. But the remedy does not sound very convincing. A senior Punjab government officer was of the view that extremism and terrorism would end only if a solution to the Punjab tangle was found.

Haryana: State of Tension

If up north in Jammu and Kashmir it has played havoc with the economy, the turmoil in Punjab has increased communal disharmony in Hindu-dominated Haryana. It had taken almost no time for the strife in Punjab to spill over into Haryana. Haryana forms a major part of what has come to be known as the 'Punjab problem.' The dispute over Chandigarh and the border districts of Abohar and Fazilka as also the fact that till very recently Punjab and Haryana were one, have added to the state's problems. Artificial boundaries might have been created and the administration separated, but the people remain the same They react to problems in Punjab differently from people of other parts of the country. And in this case, the reaction has been one of anger and retaliation. Haryana, as far as the Punjab problem is concerned, has come to be known as the 'backlash-state.' Indeed political analysts feel that Haryana has stoked the fire of terrorism in the region by returning violence with violence and thus inviting retaliation till it has all become a vicious circle

It has been rolling on its ruinous path perhaps ever since November 1982 when hordes of Akali agitators, determined to disrupt the ninth Asian Games being held in New Delhi, were held at different points in Haryana, in a clever joint manoeuvre by the centre and Haryana chief minister Bhajan Lal. Mum on the Akali demands in the beginning, it was Bhajan Lal who in the post-Asiad days has wielded the iron fist on Sikh extremism in the state. But, as at several other places in the country, it degenerated into indiscriminate violence against Sikhs: the burning down of gurdwaras, stray attacks on Sikhs, looting and destruction of their property. The moment something happened to Hindus in Punjab, Haryana was ready with a reply. And when violence was missing, the more dangerous enemy emerged: hatred and mutual suspicion, creating gaping cracks in the social fabric of the state.

Chandigarh used to be known as the 'peaceful city,' life there verged almost on dullness. Students from other parts of the country, where university education entailed recurrent strikes and closures, came to Chandigarh to study. Education, though not exactly of the highest standards, was a smooth affair. Now, over the last three years, this union territory, though spared recurrent violence, has become a knot of tension. The people live perpetually in fear of something happening. When the armed garrisons come out of their barracks after sundown, as they have been for the past so many months, the city takes on a besieged look. Two cannot ride on scooters and motorcycles, cinemas do not run night shows, hidden terror always lurks. At the university of Punjab classes have been disrupted like never before. Examinations have been scheduled and postponed, students have gone to the examination hall with curfew passes in hand. Many of them will be returning to their native states this year to continue their education. Chandigarh is no longer the students' haven. Nor is Haryana the fertile territory for business and enterprise that it once was.

Other parts of Haryana have time and again been convulsed with spasms of violence, the worst of which was witnessed only recently on 10 and 11 May when a series of bomb blasts shook Sirsa, Hissar, Sadhaura and Ambala, sending shock waves throughout the state. More than twenty were killed and the security mechanism had to be brought on more heavily. Prohibitory orders were imposed, the police were placed on red alert, tension returned to the border with Punjab and the Haryana Roadways, which has borne the brunt of the violence, had to once again suspend its night services. A lull followed and then another scare: on 31 May four armed Sikh youths attempted to hijack a bus travelling by night from Hissar to Ambala. Their attempt was foiled but the damage was done: suspicion was even more firmly implanted into the minds of the people.

Haryana has known no peace since the beginning of the troubles in Punjab. People have not led normal lives for months together. And they live with little hope of normalcy returning in the near future. Instead of ebbing, the tide of terror only seems to be gathering force.

"Come Immediately. We are Going to the Gujarat Samachar Office to Avenge What They Have Done to Us. Come Immediately with the Vans"

With these words, the Gujarat police attacked the office of Gujarat Samachar, adding another dimension to the violence in the state

"Come immediately. We are going to the Gujarat Samachar office to avenge what they have done to us. This is what they will get for opposing us Come immediately with the vans." The voice rasped out an order on the police wireless in Ahmedabad in the afternoon of 22 April. Over the cackle of the static came the instruction to launch an attack on the offices and the press of Gujarat Samachar, an outspoken critic of the police and chief minister Madhavsinh Solanki. Shortly afterwards, the newspaper's office premises in the Khanpur area were set on fire. This was followed by an attack on the building by a mob of unidentified people. All through the day, the city's policemen were on the rampage in other parts of the city. A frightening dimension had been added to the social strife that was rocking Ahmedabad for the last 105 days. There were also numerous complaints of police excesses and that they had abetted attacks by goondas at the time communal violence had broken out. The government has turned a Nelson's eye to all this, confounding suspicions about its role in the affair.

Today, Ahmedabad, with a population of 2.5 million, can easily claim a place of prominence on India's map of trouble spots. The city has witnessed not only Hindu-Muslim riots and violence between upper castes and lower castes but also policemen going beserk. The worst Hindu-Muslim riots in India after independence had broken out in this city in 1969, claiming more than a thousand lives. In 1974, the city witnessed the Nav Nirman Movement, primarily an uprising of the urban middle classes. It was nihilist in political complexion. The first anti-reservation riots erupted in Ahmedabad in 1981 as an expression of upper caste hatred for the backward classes. But since February this year, the city has become a theatre of communal and caste-violence.

Since the year 1969, when the Congress split for the first time after independence, politicians have been increasingly depending upon lumpen elements for mustering grassroot support. This has affected the city's social fabric. The lumpen elements have a stranglehold over various communities, and can easily provoke them into a violent confrontation with each other. Simultaneously, the economic condition of the poor and middle classes has been steadily worsening. To add to their woes, there is a shortage of jobs and housing. The latest round of strife, which has already claimed some 126 lives in the city over the past 100 days, has baffled both social scientists and ordinary people alike. SUNDAY spoke to a number of people,representing a cross-section of society, about the violence. Most people tended to blame politicians for the mess and did not know of any solution to the problem. More important, Ahmedabad now feels very insecure.

It has become a city of paradoxes. The Sabarmati divides the city between the modern Ahmedabad, on the west bank and the medieval city on the east bank, with industrial Ahmedabad farther east. The west bank suburbs have wide roads, modern shops, buildings exquisitely designed by renowned architects like Le Corbusier and Lois Kahn but inhabited by people who are conservative. The walled city on the eastern bank, more than five-and-a-half centuries old, has narrow, winding lanes, small, crowded houses and is also inhabited by conservative people. In the industrial areas, poverty is writ large—dingy slums, overcrowded chawls, widespread joblessness, poor civic amenities, and a population drawn not only from various parts of Gujarat but also from different parts of the country. It is only a few kilometres away from the well-laid avenues of the west bank, but economically, far away. In spite of the substantial wealth generated by industry, trade and commerce in Ahmedabad as a whole, poverty is all-pervading. A census of slums some years ago estimated that nearly half of the city's people lived in slums and squatter settlements or dwellings which were not much better. Almost one-third of the slum-dwellers had an income of about Rs 200 to Rs 250 and more than half got between Rs 200 and Rs 400 a year. Many of them worked in the unorganised sector of the economy where hours of work are long and wages low and unregulated by any labour laws.

The city has about 1.5 lakh people working in the 60-odd textile mills, getting wages that are much better than in the unorganised sector. But the large size of families and inflation has also affected their living conditions. Nearly 30,000 regular millhands are also out of jobs owing to the closure of some mills. Many substitute workers, who got irregular, but frequent employment in the mills have become jobless. According to a study by Prof. Mahesh Bhatt and V.K. Chawda some years ago, five out of every ten citizens of Ahmedabad live in houses resembling slums. The average size of a family was around 5.6 persons. In most families, the main source of livelihood was a manual job like pulling a handcart laden with goods. Another 15.7 per cent were in textile mills and other factories, and about 10.5 per cent in government jobs at the lowest level. Sixty per cent of the slum-dwellers were self-employed At the same time, Gujarat has seen a lot of economic development, underlined by speedy urbanisation. In the decade between 1951 and 1961, the population in Gujarat increased by 26.88 per cent, with the rural population growing by 29.42 per cent and the urban population by only 20.07 per cent. This trend was reversed heavily over the past two decades. In 1961-71, the rural population grew by 25.3 per cent and urban by 41 per cent, and in 1971-81 by 21.89 per cent and 40.82 per cent respectively. Ahmedabad's population increased by 44 per cent between 1971 and 1981. Literacy was as high as 61 per cent.

But the brisk pace of industrial development in Gujarat, especially after the formation of the unilingual state in 1960, brought about a dramatic change. In 1960, workers in textiles and related industries were a good 75.5 per cent of 3-10 lakh workforce in the state, with a heavy concentration of them in this city. By 1977, the proportion of textile workers fell to 48 per cent of an industrial labour force of 5.63 lakhs. On the other hand, the proportion of workers in the chemical and engineering industries rose to 19 and 18 per cent of the state's work-force respectively, almost double that of what it was 17 years ago. Ahmedabad district alone accounted for 40 per cent of the labour force in the state. In spite of this dominance, it would be wrong to assume that the textile industry alone is the backbone of the city's economy. Some years ago a detailed study of the situation in Ahmedabad by Dr T.S. Papola found that the informal sector—which means jobs in the unorganised sector and self-employed persons—formed 46.5 per cent of the work-force in Ahmedabad but contributed only 28 per cent of the total domestic product here. A lot of people were working in poor jobs, earning pittances and living in penury. One more revealing aspect of the slum situation in Ahmedabad till a few years ago is that nearly 51 per cent neither paid for nor owned the land on which their huts stood A study by B.B. Patel found that 47 per cent of the slum-dwellers paid rent.

The decline in the importance of textiles in general and the setting in of bad days for the mills in the past few years has thrown a lot of people into the unorganised sector for jobs. Already a large number of people were migrating into the city every year. The migration, according to Prof. Pravin Sheth of Gujarat university, took on a different complexion since the 1950s. Until then people from nearby districts, a majority of them Patels, came to the city. Since the formation of Gujarat and the development of chemical and engineering industries, many others from Gujarat and outside the state came to Ahmedabad. The non-Gujarati workers settled in the eastern industrial areas and distant suburbs in the west. North Indians live in a large number in the eastern suburbs, while the Patels are in a large number in Usmanpura, Navrangpura, Naranpura while Jains are predominant in Paldi, Ellisbridge and in older village localities of Madalpur, Navrangpura and Naranpura as well. Prof. Sheth estimated that in Ahmedabad about five per cent of the people are from the Patel (Patidar) community, 15 per cent are Muslims and another 15 per cent harijans and backward classes.

According to Achyut Yagnik, a social worker, the decline in the fortunes of the textile industry led to economic hardship for two sections of Ahmedabad's population, the Muslims and the harijans, because together they formed nearly one-third of the work-force in textile mills in the city when they were prospering. At one stage, about 50,000 were jobless, which meant about five lakh, in all, had been badly hit by the textile crisis. Although some mills had reopened, there were complaints from the Muslims and harijans that they did not get preference in reemployment. Officials denied there was any discrimination against these two sections, but both Muslims and harijans strongly felt that if a job was available after reopening of a mill, they were unlikely to get it. Again as Prof. Papola found, the unorganised sector did not serve as a newcomers' stepping stone to jobs in the organised sector, instead it swelled the ranks of unemployed in the eastern suburbs.

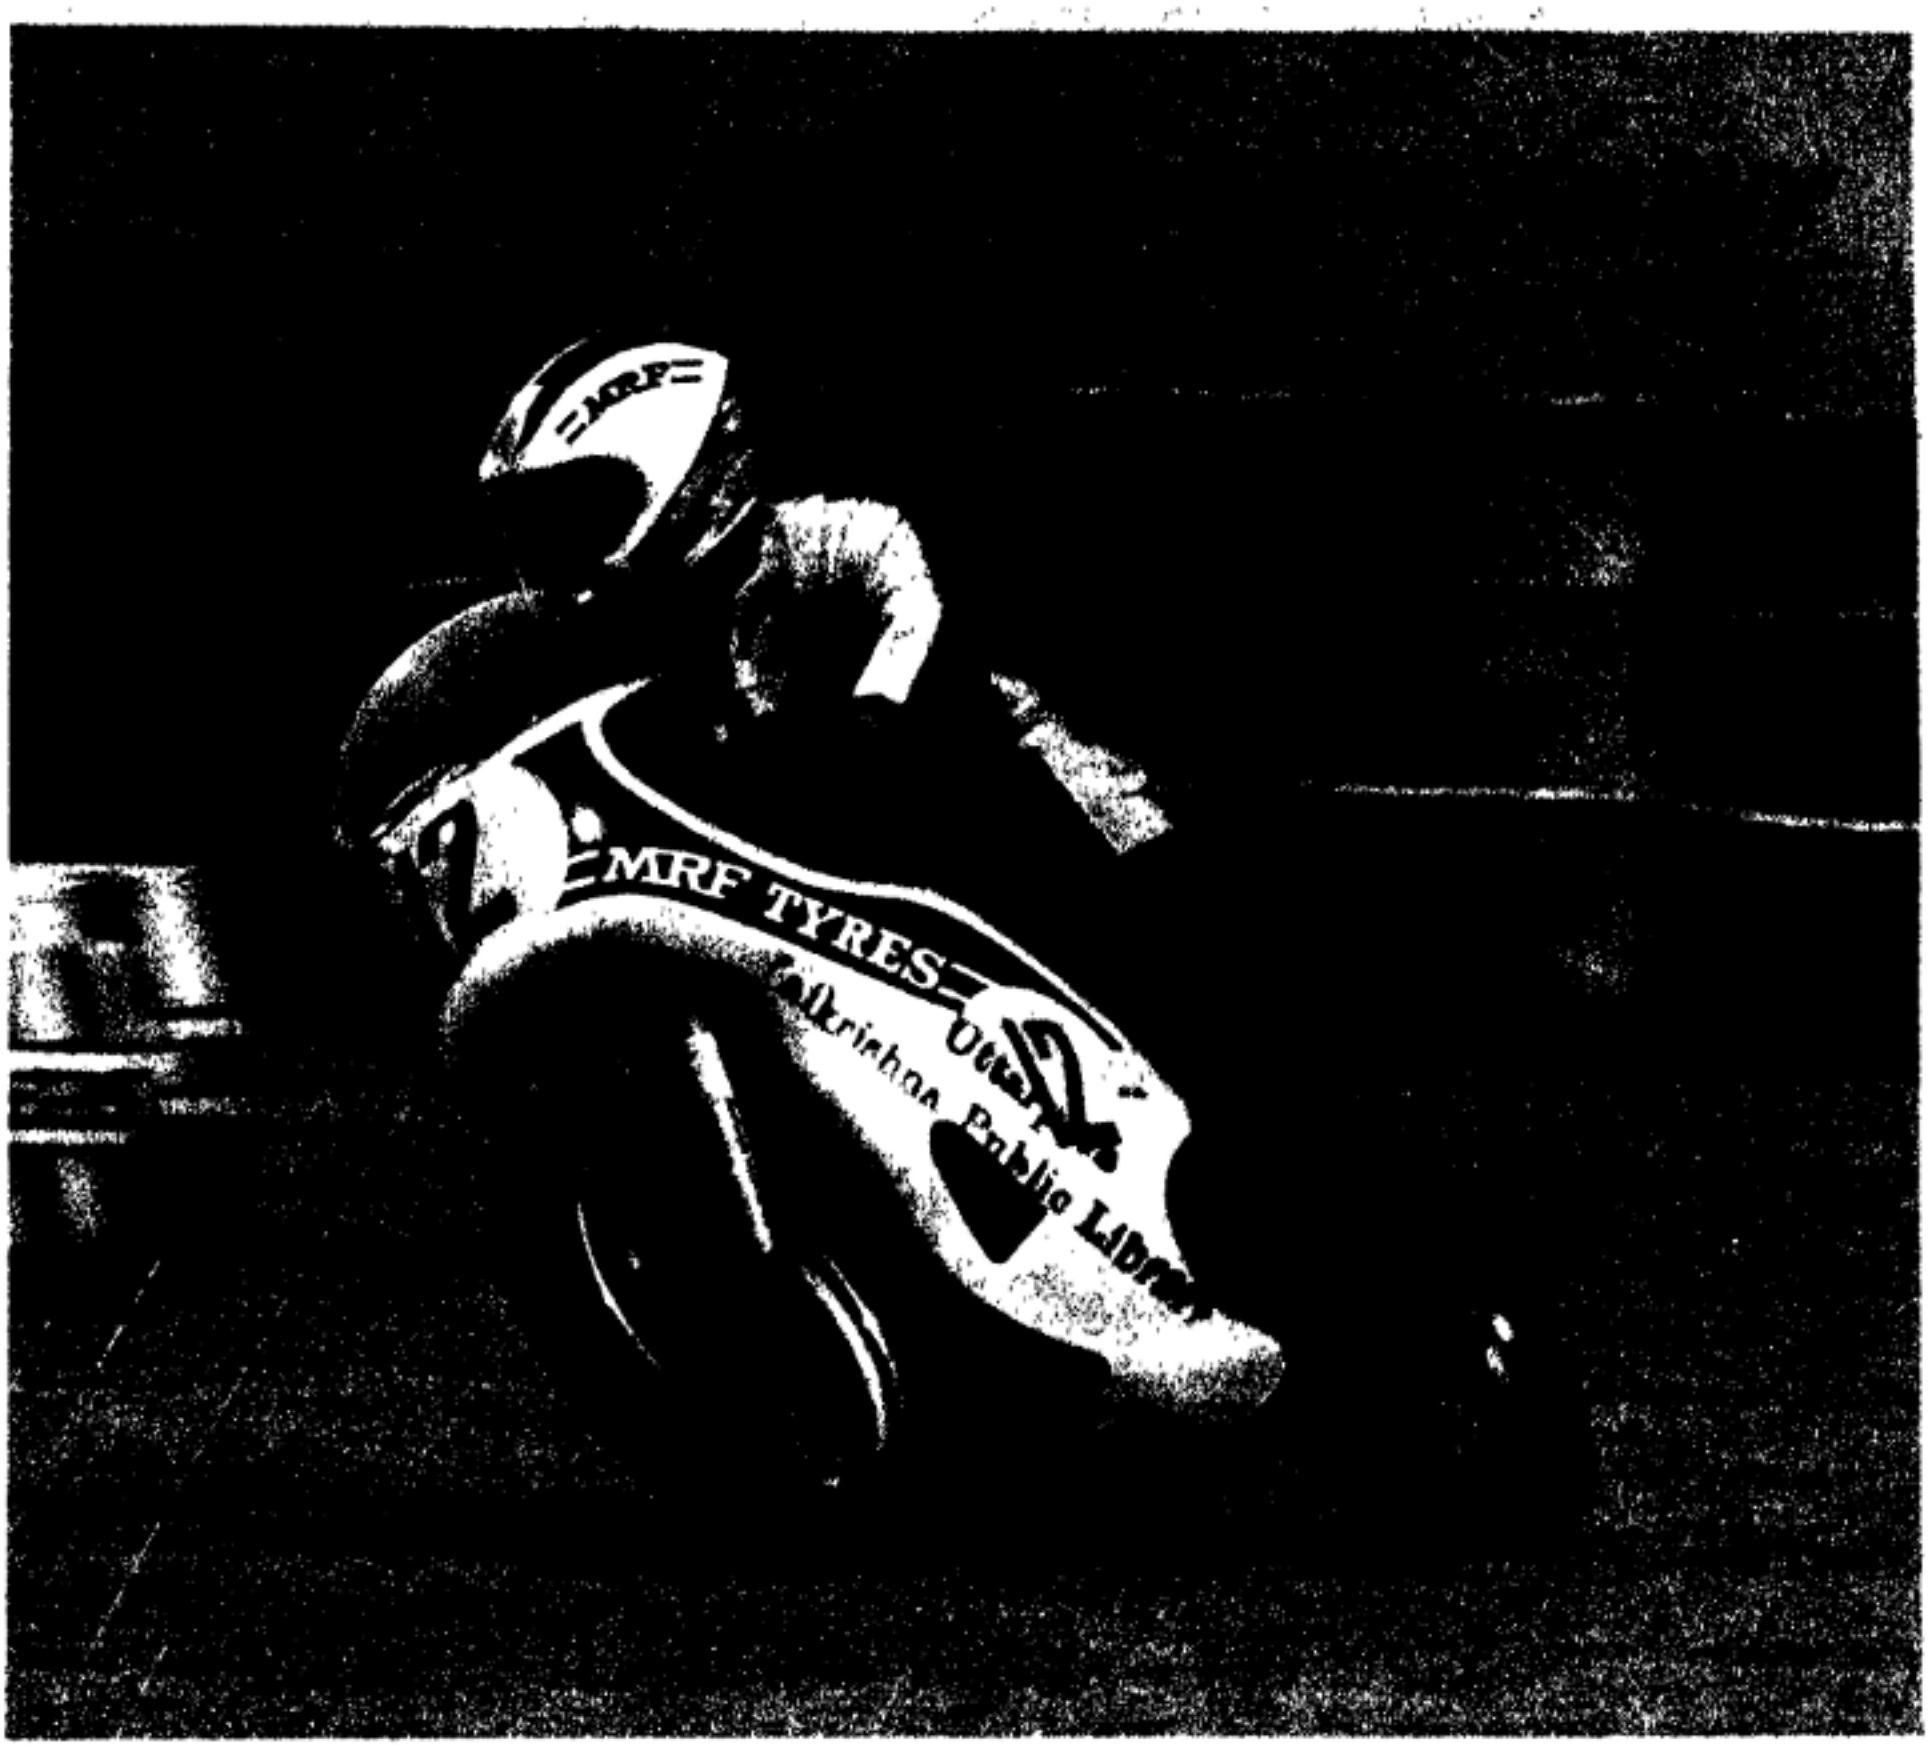
Mr Yagnik felt that the distortion in the economy brought about by industrial growth on capitalistic lines—joblessness and rising competition for both a job and a shelter—contributed to social tensions among the poor. This economic process was accompanied by the "criminalisation" of politics. Since the Congress split, political parties in the formal sense were in a state of flux. The old power structures like cooperatives, Ashramshalas, various social service organisations, which were serving as mass support-props for the old Congress were not active after the split. Despite their shortcomings, these had served well in providing a base for political sustenance and mobilisation of people during the elections. When these were not available, political parties of various hues turned to lumpen elements for filling in the gap because the aim was always to win elections.

A number of people noted that even the Congress(I) which had recently won 149 of the 182 Assembly seats and 24 out of the 26 Lok Sabha seats in Gujarat did not have a well-defined mass base with an organisational wing nursing it. The trauma of the 1974 Nav Nirman movement and the subsequent coming to power of the Janata front ministry of Babubhai Patel in 1975 caused the Congress(I) to hastily attempt to woo a potential power base among the kshatriyas, harijans, adivasis and Muslims, in what was later dubbed as the KHAM theory. These classes together had more than 70 per cent of the electorate and ensured a smooth victory for the Congress(I) in 1980. But in the cobbling up of the KHAM strategy, the Congress(I) brought about an upheaval that had far-reaching social implications. When Madhavsinh Solanki became chief minister in 1980, he was the first person from among the non-Patidar, non-Brahmin section of society to occupy such a position. When Gujarat came into being, it was initially ruled by a small elite drawn from among brahmins and banias. For the first few years after Gujarat became a separate state, this dominance of brahmins and banias was resented also by the Patels, who form about 22 per cent of the population. Analysing the emergence of kshatriyas and other castes in the 1980 polls, B.C. Shah, a social scientist, noted that if the history of the first two decades of post-independence Congress rule in Gujarat "is nothing but the story of the struggle waged by the Patidars (Patels) against the brahmins and banias for establishing their supremacy, the next two decades are going to witness a bitter power struggle between the Patidars and the kshatriya."

The KHAM strategy came in very handy for the Congress(I) as well as the kshatriyas, who form around 40 to 50 per cent of the population. When it was put together, the KHAM strategy provided the Congress (I) with a mass base, held together by the fact that most of its supporters were have-nots. But it also had casteist hues, as old-time Congressmen in the ruling party like Ratubhai Adani were quick to realise. They eventually left the party. Even among the proponents of the KHAM cracks developed, with a dissident group finally emerging under the leadership of Jinabhai Darji, one-time political guru of Mr Solanki and one of the architects of the strategy.

Why has the Ahmedabad society become so vulnerable that riots occur like this? Again, no single answer is available. Some people see it as a result of life becoming more and more difficult, plus the absence of a leftist movement in the city. Among the larger cities, Ahmedabad probably is unique where no significant leftist ideology has flourished even in a limited way. The two communist parties have a presence, but they are not very effective. "We have no progressive middle class like in Maharashtra," said Mr Yagnik. The conservatism of the people resulted in closing of the ranks in different castes. It was not that banias or Patels did not exploit their own clansmen, but when dangers like the reservation quota hike loomed large, even in imagination, the communities united. The lack of growth of a rationalist movement was accompanied by the heightening of religious fervour all round, both among the Hindus and Muslims.



It was argued by these people that such a society was prone to get worked up emotionally and when agitations really got under way, they tended to draw sustenance from successive emotional issues even as the original issues were forgotton for a while. Although it has been a stir against the reservation quota hike, the current agitation has drawn a lot of strength from the angry reaction of the people against police inaction, police excesses, killing of a police sub-inspector and of a little girl and the failure of the government in ending the strife.

What are the prospects for the future? "They appear bleak to me," said Babubhai Patel, former chief minister, who was pained to see secularism on the decline. As Mr Patel pointed out, really speaking, the current agitation—either for the reservations or against them—was needless. "The backward classes together have 31 per cent (reservation) now, but half of this was utilised. The need is to help these classes to utilise more seats. Similarly, if the existing quotas were not being used, there was no need for the upper castes to feel threatened about the increases in quota. And still there is a marathon violent agitation."

It's true! The very same tyres that you use on city-roads, are repeatedly tested by MRF on race and rally tracks around the country

There's a simple reason why. On a race-track a tyre is subjected to severe torture and strain. In just six hours on the track, a tyre goes through more than half its life. Something that would take more than a year on a city road.

Which means we get our test results that much faster. And you get an improved product that much quicker.

It's a testing technique developed by our collaborators B F Goodrich of the USA, people who build tyres for the NASA Space Shuttle Programme.

And since MRF tests city-tyres on the race-track, you can be sure that when we win, you too are winning. With tyres that are setting new standards for grip, handling, mileage, durability and sheer staying power.

At the end of the race, it's over to the MRF technicians... Testing for heat build-up in a tyre with an electronic pyrometer.

Delhi: An Uneasy Calm

The November anti-Sikh riots and the recent bomb blasts leave their scars on Delhi

From the murder of Nirankari Baba Gurbachan Singh in 1980 to the present phase of organised disturbance, Delhi has had its quota of terrorist tension. In these five years time and again the menace has appeared, once even in the shape of Bhindranwale himself who had come crusading to Delhi with his bandwagon of followers armed to the teeth: the killing of Jathedar Santokh Singh, president of the Delhi Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee in December 1981, the assault on the gates of Delhi on the eve of the Asian games, the protest over the "martyrs" of the Taran Taran bus accident which culminated in rioting and firing at Gurudwara Rakab Ganj near Parliament House, murders of other Sikh leaders opposed to the cause of Bhindranwale, the assassination of Mrs Gandhi, the riots that followed and then the big revenge of May 1985. Bombs concealed in transistors went off at more than 20 places in New Delhi on 10 and 11 May killing nearly 50 and leaving many others injured. It was an example of organised terror at its best: Bhindranwale's children had struck again almost a year after Operation Bluestar and six months after the anti-Sikh violence in November 1984. The mid-May outrage, many thought, was a vendetta for both. So what began essentially as a feud between Akalis and Nirankaris disintegrated into rank communalism. Nothing could stop it going that way.

When "ghallughara" began—the Akali's genocide week—it sent Delhi scurrying once again under the wings of heavy security. Police set up roadblocks and checkpoints at night at Palam airport, at the two main railway stations in the capital and at the inter-state bus terminus, some of the worst hit spots during the May blasts. Vigilance was stepped up. In office buildings the police posted pickets which frisked people going in. Parking in the basements was stopped, guards were even placed on duty in lavatories. But as it turned out, while the security buildup was awesome, "ghallughara" was a bit of a let-down for those expecting trouble. Attitudes and reactions during the week from 1-7 June well underlined the extent to which fear had embedded itself in the peoples' minds.

There were sighs of relief at the end of the week. But the terrorists need never give advance warnings, the possibility of future strikes is always there. The Delhi police have arrested 36 people—most of them Sikh youths—from various parts of the capital in connection with the blasts. They also unearthed in West Patel Nagar in central Delhi, a crude actory for manufacturing the transistor bombs that ripped Delhi. But to date, they have not been able to lay their hands on the real conspirators behind the crime. They were able to make their way out in time. Sikh intellectual groups of New Delhi have, during the genocide week, expressed their determination to preserve communal harmony between Hindus and Sikhs and pledged themselves to unity. But when has the terrorist had anything to do with the greater mass of the Sikh population? He has his own centre of activity, striking from a tangent with the sole purpose of keeping the situation destabilised.

"Ghallughara", from that point of view has been a failure and even the May blasts, which brought death and injury to innocents, tagged along a welcome signal: the villains behind the blasts had failed to provoke a communal backlash, as obviously was their intention. Harmony between the two communities held. But how successfully Delhi can keep away further forays by terrorists is a difficult question to answer. As the recent arrests of people concerned with the May blasts have shown, a lot of young Sikhs, some from well-off families, have taken to terrorism. It seems to have captured the imagination of the Sikh youth. How wide has this network spread? In Delhi, as in Chandigarh, insecurity and fear always lurk in the corners. Having made its gory passage through Haryana, it has now established its roots in the capital. And its eradication, if and when that is done, will require more than the services of the security and intelligence networks. The socio-political knot of Punjab will have to be untied, something that the terrorist attacks are meant to abort.

Bombay: The Threat From Regionalism

Reservations threaten to become an issue in Maharashtra, too

Ever since the Shiv Sena scored its brilliant and unexpected victory in the Bombay municipal elections, there has been apprehension in certain circles about an outburst of parochial skirmishes and communal clashes. Pramod Navalkar, the Shiv Sena's journalist-turned-politician, disputes this and says, "In fact, we are thinking of making Rajiv Gandhi the president of the Shiv Sena because he has fallen in line with our thinking. Mr Gandhi has said that the influx into Delhi should be stopped." There have been several instances, says Navalkar, where "we have had alliances with the Congress(I) and opposition parties, and at that time no one spoke about regionalism and parochialism. Why is it that because the Shiv Sena was isolated and won the corporation elections on its own that these fears are being voiced? We have talked of stopping the influx and have also talked of cut-off years. This does not mean that we can put this into action, but we can certainly reverse the trend. We can discourage people from flocking to Bombay. You must remember, we are nationalists first and then regional. We would disband the Sena if the nation's interest demanded it."

The Sena's mayor, Chaggan Bhujbal, discounted the possibility of a regional war saying, "We have nothing against outsiders. We are prepared to welcome everybody, but then the centre must help us. The centre takes Rs 3,000 crores annually from Bombay and gives nothing in return. The centre is like a Pathan who takes his money and does not care whether the person lives or dies, as long as he gets his money. There is a limit to what Bombay can accommodate and after a time it will be the people of Bombay themselves who will confront the outsiders."

The Shiv Sena chief, Bal Thackeray, is more direct as he zeroes in on the problem. He says the police commissioner, D.S. Soman, has informed him that hordes of Bangladeshis are leaving Assam and coming to Bombay. Besides, there is a continuous influx of people from Uttar Pradesh and Bihar. Thackeray also says there are one lakh Pakistanis who have overstayed in Bombay after expiry of their visas. He has called for a committee of citizens to decide on a cut-off date that may even be a future date, and says that other state governments should take the responsibility of seeing that their people do not migrate by providing them jobs on the line of the Maharashtra government's employment guarantee scheme, which has significantly reduced the influx from Maharashtra's rural areas into Bombay.

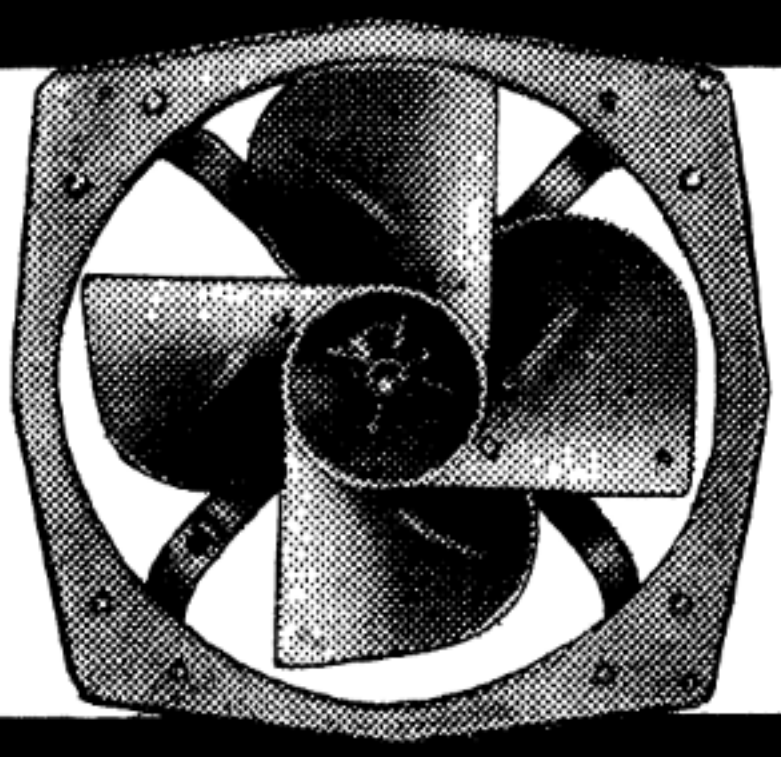
However, the realities of the situation are that the people who dwell in slums are predominantly from the lower-income groups, the Dalits and the Muslims. Such a predicament, dictated by economic hardship, is ripe for anyone wanting to take advantage of the simmering discontent. A relevant development in this connection, according to political circles, is the alliance forged between the Dalits and the Muslims, headed by Prof. Jogendra Kawade and Haji Mastan respectively. This organisation, though maintaining a low profile at the moment, has been growing gradually in strength and can pose a formidable force against caste Hindus and other groups should a confrontationist situation develop.

One such problem could be the reservation issue. Maharashtra has by and large remained unaffected by the anti-reservationist stir in neighbouring Gujarat, but this does not mean that there is no grievance on this issue. A vital section that has been adversely affected by the reservation policy in Maharashtra is the police and at the moment the discontent has been channelised through writ petitions in the Bombay High Court.



In addition to the normal reservations, a general resolution No. BCC-1074-J of 23.5.74 provides 24 per cent reservation for SC and STs and denotified and notified tribes at all levels till the first promotion to class 1 service. The result is that a sub-inspector of police becomes an inspector of police by virtue of this reservation within a service period of five years, whereas his colleague becomes an inspector after 15 years of service. There are three writ petitions pending in the Bombay High Court challenging the reservation in relation to yearly vacancies. In his writ petition, Gopalkrishna R. Chavan and three others said if it is interpreted to mean reservations in relation to yearly vacancies and not in relation to cadre strength, then by 1992 all the 69 posts of assistant commissioners of police in Greater Bombay would be filled by appointees from the backward classes, most of whom would be junior to many of the inspectors of police (general category) by as much as over 15 years. The petitioners also stated that by getting seniority as ACPs other high posts will only be available to these backward classes, resulting in gross discrimination to the petitioners and other officers and leading to further discrimination, dissatisfaction and lowering of morale of the whole Greater Bombay police force and further impairing of its efficiency. ACP Chavan and three of his colleagues have been named as respondents, besides the state government and the director-general of police, three of their colleagues who belong to the scheduled castes and have become assistant commissioners of police.

Assistant commissioner of police R.K. Sharma (traffic) said that though he joined the service 25 years ago, those who joined it in 1972 as sub-inspectors have become ACPs in 1985. He said that of the 72 ACPs in Bombay at present, 25 are from the reserved category and only two of them are senior to him. What is worse, he said, is that these juniors can retire as deputy inspector generals of police in 2004 A.D. and those from the general category can at best retire as junior ACPs.

Mr Sharma and his colleagues believe that by not taking this genuine problem in hand the government is only postponing a solution to the problem. The situation is volcanic enough.

Assam: Old Issues, Fresh Efforts

But the AASU's talks with the centre are still making no headway

The foreigners' issue has for long evoked strong ethnic emotions among the Assamese. However, much of the enthusiasm which marked those early days of the movement in 1979 has now ebbed, as the search for a political solution is on. The rigid stand of the AASU-AAGSP leaders who are now in Delhi to have talks with central leaders to settle the issue has also mellowed with the passage of time. The AASU leadership has been engaged in talks with S. B. Chavan, the union home minister, since 16 May, to resolve the 'foreigners' issue. While the student leaders have no objections to retaining the people who came into Assam between 1951 and 1961, a formula for dealing with the infiltrators who came into the state between 1961 and 1971 is still being sought. The suggestion that those who entered the state between 1967 and 1971 be disenfranchised has received the leaders' approval. Moreover, there is the problem of rehabilitating those disenfranchised. Now, the question being asked is: Which should be the cut-off year: 1961, 1965 or 1967?

Another question that is being asked in Assam today is: When will elections be held? The past five years have witnessed a gradual erosion in the impact of the Assam agitation. The mass protests snowballed into violence and bloody deaths, following the Assembly elections which brought the Congress(I) into power in this northeastern state. Today, the student leaders maintain that in view of the revised electoral rolls, the Saikia ministry should be dissolved.

When the Assam agitation initially began in late 1979, it started as a movement against the bohiragotas or outsiders. Very soon however, the agitation leaders realised that they could gain leverage and acceptability among the masses by dropping the word 'outsiders.' However, in essence, the Assam agitation, especially prior to 1983, remained essentially a movement against all outsiders. The AASU-AAGSP leadership which spearheaded the mass movement received an overwhelming response from the Assamese, who had for long been silent sufferers against what they felt was a gradual domination of outsiders in all spheres of life in the state.

Even before independence a broad current of sub-nationalism has always been prevalent in the Assamese society. Much of this strong sense of Assamese nationalism came from the genuine fear of a minority community finding it difficult to take its place in a federal set-up dominated by the more populous states of the country. Much more important, however, were the historical forces at work during the last few centuries. Before the advent of the Ahoms in the 13th century, Assam or more specifically Kamarupa, had been an integral part of the then Indian mainstream. There was a constant exchange of travellers and scholars between the kingdom of Kamarupa and other Indian states. Mention of expeditions to Kasi or ancient Benares is found in several ancient works. Scholars from other principalities came to the sacred shrine of Kamakhya and a two-way traffic between the kings of Kamarupa and the rest of the northern and eastern Indian kingdoms was maintained. However, since the coming of the Ahoms to Assam and their domination over the land for the next 300 years or so, this inter-action between the people of the Ahom kingdom and the rest of the Indian states gradually disappeared. With the Ahom kings repulsing the attacks by the Mughal armies which were sent to subjugate them, Assam and the region remained aloof from events sweeping the rest of the Mughal empire.

The coming of the British to Assam once again broke the insularity of the region. However, along with the annexation of Assam by the British, came a long retinue of Bengali babus in the service of the foreign masters. The babus naturally got the coveted jobs in the courts and the administrative services in the state, in tea gardens, railways and postal services. Locals started to feel overpowered by the new army of clerks and petty officials. One of the most shattering effects of British rule in the state was the compulsory use of Bengali language in the courts and educational institutions of Assam between 1835 and1873. This replacement of the local vernacular by an alien language has left an indelible mark on the Assamese psyche, clouding for generations their attitude towards Bengalis living in the state.

While the urban Assamese have been resentful of the Bengalis, in the rural areas there is a bias against the immigrant Muslims, who came to Assam from former East Pakistan. The hard working Muslim peasants from Mymensingh and neighbouring districts of East Bengal were initially encouraged by the authorities to come into Assam and work the marshy lands into suitable agricultural plots. The availability of land, the pressure of population in East Bengal and encouragement by politicians like Sir Sadullah led to an increasing influx of peasants from East

The aftermath of the Nellie massacre: when the movement turned violent

Bengal. Even after Independence this influx into rural Assam continued and over the years the easy-going local peasants resentfully watched the hardworking East Bengali immigrants prosper at what they felt was their expense.

The Assamese landlord who had once welcomed the Muslim peasant to work on his land, is today increasingly apprehensive of the immigrants. The poorer local peasants are today joining forces with the landlords in the fear of being overrun by the immigrants. With land becoming more and more scarce and the once reasonably well-to-do local peasants feeling the pinch of rising prices, resentment against the immigrants had been building up to an all time high.

Thus, when the AASU-AAGSP call to throw out the foreign nationals from the land was given, it found a ready echo in the hearts of the peasantry. The Assamese peasant who is as emotional as his urban cousin, responded enthusiastically to the agitation programmes. In fact, it is in the rural areas where the villager was aroused, that the worst attacks on the minorities took place.

Much of the influx of Muslim immigrants into Assam till the late Sixties was done under the protection of Assamese political leaders and bureaucrats. To the Congress ministers of those days, helping the immigrant Muslim to settle in Assam paid rich dividends, as they formed a vote bank for the party. Large numbers of Assamese officials helped the Bengali peasants to settle in the land for a small fee. Today, these very people who are now retired government servants, are staunch supporters of the agitation and blame the politicians for selling their land to foreigners. The Congress politicians, dependent as they were on the Muslim vote bank, made it a point to get them registered as voters and as a consequence the electoral rolls are today replete with names of alleged foreign nationals, though by virtue of living here for generations most of these people have become Indian citizens. The people of Assam also felt that with the entry of immigrant Muslims into the voters' lists, the political power in the state was gradually slipping out of the hands of the traditional Brahmins and upper castes.

Thus, the Assam agitation started at a time when the people were slowly feeling the pinch of a backward economy in a state where development had been ignored. The movement leaders played on these latent fears of the common people, exaggerating much of them to untoward proportions and pointing out that the economic, cultural and political ills of the society was the result of the outsiders' domination. The common man too found a willing scapegoat to account for his declining fortunes. A strong regional bias was built up in the state against outsiders, especially the Bengali Hindus, and for the first time also against the immigrant Muslims. Mass hysteria was so well evoked that the simple Assamese villager felt that by killing the minorities, he was doing a patriotic act for his state. The agitation leaders were able to project themselves as new messiahs, ready to lead the people to a better future. However, today in the aftermath of the traumatic violent Assembly election and the flush of generous funds from the centre, much of the movement's potency has been lost. Despite the strong regional feelings still prevalent, it is doubtful if in the coming elections in Assam a regional party can ever gain a foothold in the state.

Land of the Underground

Insurgency continues to stalk Manipur, Nagaland and Tripura but peace may return to Mizoram

ON 16 February, one of the numerous army vehicles which criss-cross the hillroads of the north east, was passing through the deserted Chassad Kangapt Road, a little more than ten kms from the Burma border, when suddenly 13 unsuspecting armymen on it came under extremist fire from three directions. All 13 armymen, including a junior commissioned officer, were killed. One light machine gun, three sten carbines and nine self-loading rifles were taken from the security men before the attackers dispersed into the hills. Later they were identified as members of the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN) a pro-Beijing Naga extremist organisation, one of the many ethnic terrorist groups operating in the north-east.

Except Meghalaya and Arunachal this is a familiar scene. In the rest of the north eastern states various tribal and radical organisations have been active. Ambushes on security men, bank hold-ups and gunning down of class enemies have become routine occurrences, especially in Manipur. Today the older insurgent groups like Z.A. Phizo's Federal Nagas and Laldenga's Mizo National Front (MNF) are no longer active. Today Phizo's revolutionary government in exile in Burma is a more or less scattered and spent force not too actively concerned with events in Nagaland; while, with Laldenga ready to begin negotiations with New Delhi, there has been a lull in insurgent operations in Mizoram. Younger groups like the People's Liberation Army (PLA) of Manipur, the National Socialistic Council of Nagaland and the Tripura National Volunteers (TNV) are today holding centre stage. However, despite the present lull in insurgent activity in Mizoram, the MNF is continuing to provide aid to the TNV and help train the Tripuris in guerrilla tactics.

The TNV, an extremist tribal organisation bent on liberating Tripura from the clutches of "outsiders," in this case the Bengali refugees from erstwhile East Pakistan, has been consistently supported by the MNF as a result of the excellent relationship the TNV leader, Bijoy Hrankhal, enjoys with the Mizos. Hrankhal, a Christian, had come in close contact with the MNF leaders while studying in a Catholic institution in Shillong. Thus when he began thinking in terms of organising an underground movement he realised that he could go for advice and assistance to the Mizo Christian underground. Bijoy Hrankhal realised that without an armed struggle he could not not free his fellow tribals from exploitation at the hands of the plainsmen. Tripura, which had originally been a tribal kingdom ruled by tribal rajas, had gradually been flooded by plainsmen from the adjoining erstwhile East Pakistan. Today Bengalis, who constitute nearly seventy per cent of the population, are gradually dispossessing the tribals of their land and driving them deeper into the interiors. When Hrankhal asked for help the MNF was ready to oblige the TNV, especially since both groups were bent on ultimate secession and considered the Indian government to be their common enemy.

Paradoxically the tribals who had initially formed the first CPI(M) bases in Tripura turned towards the TNV. While many of the older tribals remained sympathetic to the CPI(M), the younger generation, many of whom had benefited from missionary education, felt that the CPI(M), which had by now extended its influence over the Bengali settlers, no longer had the interest of the original inhabitants at heart.

At the moment, the TNV has been conducting hit-and-run raids on unsuspecting security personnel and non-tribals of the state from their bases across the border. In the first week of April, eight CRPF men were ambushed and killed in a daring attack by TNV extremists, in Tripura's troubled north district. Since then, though minor incidents have been continuing no major incident has occurred. However, with the TNV making easy escapes to their hideout across the border, terrorist attacks are expected to continue.

The CPI(M) government of Nripen Chakravarty has been assiduously trying to win over sections of the tribals who have been alienated from the party. As a first step towards allaying the suspicions of the tribals, the state government passed the Autonomous District Council Bill in the Assembly to ensure that tribal belts and blocks would be directly administered by the elected tribal representatives. This has since been passed in Parliament. The Marxist government has also been wooing the extremists and trying to bring them back to the mainstream with generous offers of financial assistance. Mr Chakravarty, with the help of tribal party leaders, has been in constant touch with extremist elements who wish to return from the cold. Paramilitary forces in charge of combating the TNV are, in private, critical of the state government's soft stand on the extremists. The Tripura chief minister is however convinced that his method of cajoling and trying to convert tribals to the Marxist ideology would in the long run be more efficient in controlling secessionism than the strong arm tactics of the security forces. Mr Chakravarty asserts that the army and CRPF's operations in other north eastern states have convinced him that an understanding attitude would prevent the large-scale alienation of the local population which has occurred in the other states. Despite the chief minister's attempts to win over the tribals, TNV activities from across the border continue for the present, with or without connivance of the local villagers. The state government hopes that once the centre arrives at a settlement with Laldenga, New Delhi can persuade the MNF to stop giving all-out support to the TNV.

The NSCN operation in the last one year has been confined more to the Naga dominated Ukhrul district of Manipur than to Nagaland. The NSCN headquarters is in the loosely administered jungles on the Burmese side of the international border. It also has a strong foothold in the Naga dominated Ukhrul district of Manipur. The NSCN is a relatively new pro-left insurgent group which was made up of radical young elements disillusioned with the Federal Nagas led by the aging leader in exile, Mr Z.A. Phizo. The NSCN leaders, Isacc Swu and Muivah who belong to the Sema and Thankul Naga tribes respectively, had initially turned to the Chinese for help and had been convinced by the Chinese leaders that unless armed struggle had a powerful ideological content it would remain as futile as the earlier Naga insurrection led by Phizo.

The NSCN is a cohesive ideologically committed group attempting to stregthen the various extremist organisations of the north east by taking a leading role in attempting to bring them together under one umbrella. Various insurgent groups who try to contact the Chinese for arms and training in guerrilla warfare, are often directed by Beijing to approach the NSCN. The NSCN has been training members of the ULFA, the Assam-based latest addition to the extremist list of the north east. The NSCN has also been in contact with the leadership of Manipur. It has been responsible for a number of political killings in Manipur. Ukhrul, the most powerful NSCN stronghold inside Indian territory, has witnessed a number of brutal killings of politicians of the district.

Despite being disciplined and well organised, the NSCN following is generally confined to the Semas, Thankuls and other smaller clans settled in the border areas of the state. The NSCN is unlikely to receive support from the majority of the Nagas who, being staunch Christians, are still suspicious of the NSCN for its links with communist China.

The PLA, one of the most dreaded and committed of the north-east terrorist groups seems to have passed its days of glory, with its once charismatic leader Bisheswar Singh contesting the Assembly elections Unlike the other terrorist groups of the region secession from the Indian Union is not the aim of the PLA. The PLA manifesto has made it plain that it is waging a war against the "Delhi bandit" with the hope of finally liberating the entire nation from its vested bourgeoise class. With the death of most of the front ranking PLA leaders like Kunjebehari, the capture of important leaders like Samba and the surrender of large numbers of disillusioned cadres to the authorities the PLA has curtailed its activities for the last three years. The present PLA leader in the absence of Bisheswar is Temba Singh, the last of the original band which went to Lhasa to be trained by the Chinese.

Calcutta: Unemployment and Despair

Unemployment has grown with development

For the people of this spirited, yet much-maligned city, hardship has a permanent quality—especially for the thousands living on the social fringe, eking out an existence as jobless vagabonds and touts who often gravitate to crime. Throughout the history of Calcutta, discontent has endured—exploding in violent phases like the Naxalite movement which pursued an impossible dream. And the single most important factor behind the social unrest is, and has been, unemployment.

A city that has for ages sheltered and sustained a large migrant population from Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, Orissa, and Bangladesh offers very little to the local Bengali youth. The result: a growing army of the unemployed. According to official records, in June 1983 the number of unemployed in West Bengal stood at 37 lakhs. In 1977, when the CPI(M)-led Left Front government came to power, it was only 14 lakhs. There was a 207.65 per cent increase in the number of registered job-seekers in the state between July 1977 and December 1983. The total employment generated in the organised sector during this period rose only by 1.26 per cent. According to an estimate of the latest figures, the number of jobless persons has increased threefold over the last seven years.

To add to the problem, employment in the public sector in the state shrank in 1984 While 8,606 vacancies were filled during 1983 in central, state and semi-government undertakings and local bodies, the number dropped to 6,950 in 1984. Even of the vacancies notified by the public sector, the percentage of persons absorbed in these posts fell from 42 to 40 over a year. Official records relating to employment opportunities during 1984 show that 3,421 vacancies were notified by the central government in the state. Against this, 1,859 vacancies were filled up. The vacancies filled up in 1983 stood at 5,994 and 1,960 respectively. The state government, for its part, filled up only 2,997 out of 7,817 posts in 1984. During 1983, the figures were 6,661 and 3,411 respectively. In the private sector, only 764 vacancies out of 6,554 notified were filled up in 1984. In 1983 only 567 jobs were offered against 4,088 vacancies.

An obvious result of frustration is protest. Today, unemployed young men and women have organised themselves into groups to articulate their demands—often violently. Recently, there was tension in Kurseong, near Darjeeling, when members of the Parbatya Beker Sangha held a demonstration outside the office of the local fire brigade to protest against the recruitment of 17 people from the plains. The SP and the subdivisional officer rushed to the spot to prevent any untoward incident. It was not before the demonstrators got an assurance from the deputy commissioner that only hill people would be given jobs in future that they finally dispersed. It was a fine example of how restive a peace-loving people can become if they are denied jobs. In another incident, 418 members of the West Bengal Unemployed Society including 15 women, courted arrest at Dacres Lane after the state labour minister refused to meet them. There also exists a "Sara Bangla Bekar Samiti" which fights for the cause of the jobless.

The protests have a good reason: unfair recruitment is rampant all over the state and merit is rarely rewarded. Many government organisations recruit persons who do not come through employment exchanges. And there is enough corruption in the recruitment for jobs. A member of Parliament was sometime ago accused of signing a large number of papers which were being used to give false certificates of residence to people in Durgapur for supporting claims forjobs. Prabir Sengupta, the minister of state for labour, told newsmen that a civil official who had detected offenders in some cases had not prosecuted them. And when the newsmen asked the minister why the MP in question had not been brought to book, he replied "It's not easy to prosecute an MP."

The irony of the situation is that despite the increased pace of development activities, the percentage of total workers in West Bengal has recorded a steady fall over the past two decades, according to the 1981 census. Calcutta, however, is an exception. But the availability of jobs is still far short of the demand. The fact is that although West Bengal gets the maximum bank credit from the public sector banks under the employment promotion programme, things are still at a sorry pass. Out of the total of Rs 106.09 crores given by the public sector banks as on 31 December 1978, the eastern region accounted for Rs 35.51 crores, with West Bengal topping the list with Rs 23.27 crores.

Not enough is being done to tackle the problem. According to the records of the West Bengal Industries Development Corporation (WBIDC), West Bengal has in the past one year or so been moving steadily towards sophisticated, capital-intensive industries. While this would undoubtedly ensure a modern industrial base for the state, it would at the same time seriously threaten about five million job-seekers. A list of 32 new industrial projects assisted by the WBIDC, including six expansion projects, reveals that with an aggregate capital outlay of over Rs 91 crores, these units have a job potential of less than 4,000 persons.

UP: Communalism Runs Deep

Brickbats strewn on a street in Moradabad, the scene of bloody rioting

Often it only needs a small, harmless pebble thrown across, on just a few words—communalism is a monster that is easy to provoke. More so in Uttar Pradesh where most incidents of communal rioting have taken place in the country since independence. In the beginning there were only a few centres—Kanpur, Aligarh and Varanasi. Then over the years, the communal virus spread across the state. Some old centres like Kanpur and Varanasi became less volatile, while new ones reared their ugly heads. But Aligarh held its ground as communal riots broke out repeatedly in the nations capital with all its gory, fractious trappings. Recurrent communal riots have wrecked the city's conscience, built walls of fear and suspicion and doomed life to a divided existence. Aligarh today, as it has been for sometime now, is a city permanently under siege.

Then there are the fresh flashpoints of communal tension—Meerut, Moradabad, Sambhal, Maunath Bhanjan, Bulandshar, Pahasu—where in the last five years communal clashes between Hindus and Muslims have taken place again and again. In most occasions, a small spark has ignited the riots.

There are several levels on which communal clashes have taken place in Uttar Pradesh in the last few years: between Shias and Sunnis and of late between Akalis and Nirankaris and Hindus and Sikhs. Kanpur, which had been spared Hindu-Muslim riots for a long time was beset by clashes between Akalis and Nirankaris in 1978. Eighteen people were killed in the violence then. Again, reflecting the mood in Punjab and Delhi, there were clashes between Hindus and Sikhs following the assasination of Mrs Indira Gandhi in November 1984. Since then, tension between the two communities has always been on its edge, threatening to overflow into violence. On the other hand, the state capital Lucknow's sorrow has been the volatile animosity between the Shia and Sunni populations of the city. There is threat of violence almost on every Muslim festival.

There is evidence in Lucknow; as in other places, of the foreign forces that come into play, as far as creating communal tension is concerned. The Shia and Sunni sects have built rival mosques named Saddam Hussain Masjid and Ayatollah Khomeini Masjid in different parts of the city and allegations are that they are funded by foreign agencies. Also having a stake in arousing communal passions are the local politicians and the entire state machinery as a whole. This is how the vote bank will remain intact. For others it is just a question of fanaticism. Officials and policemen have, on several occasions during such riots, been found wanting in impartial and secular thinking. Then there is ofcourse, the question of political power and elections. Such has been been the tendency built up over the years, that politics in the country, even though it professes to be secular, is anything but that. Elections are fought on the basis of religion and caste. And till such time when attitudes change, communalism will always live somewhere beneath the surface, ready to serve its mischievous masters. The state, though troubled by communalism, has also produced some of the most secular minds in the country. But it seems time has only buried their voices. Ganesh Shankar Vidyarthi of Kanpur was one such person. He was killed while trying to control a riot in the pre-independence days and his body was so badly mutilated by the rioters that people could only recognise him by his slippers. After that they forgot him and all that he stood for. Kanpur never even gave him a memorial or remembered his anniversary. And only a few years ago, when some people organised a programme in his memory and called a Uttar Pradesh cabinet minister to inaugurate it, the press was aghast to see that only a few dozen people had turned up to commemorate the martyred hero of secularism.

Refugees to Humanity

The influx of Tamils from Sri Lanka has created social tension in Tamil Nadu

Time hangs heavy with the Sri Lankan Tamil refugees who have been in Tamil Nadu for nearly three months now. If last year was the summer of torment, this year it is the summer of discontent as far as they are concerned. Living a rootless, desultory existence in an alien land can beappalling, and the refugees are anxiously awaiting their return to their homeland.

There is a total of 5,157 refugee families comprising 21,074 persons at present in Tamil Nadu. They have been dispersed into refugee camps in all the districts except Kanyakumari and Nilgiris. In the coastal areas they have been put up in the cyclone relief shelters and in the interiors they have been housed in wedding halls. So far the central government has spent Rs 1.3 crores on the refugees. Cash doles are given every fortnight as are subsidised rice at 57 paise per kg. An average-sized family gets about Rs 180 per fortnight. In other words, the centre has to spend Rs ten lakhs every fortnight on the refugees. According to the regulations, refugees are not provided with employment as they are not recognised as citizens of India. They have to subsist on the doles given by the government.

This correspondent toured a few refugee camps in the coastal areas to assess the mood of the refugees. The cyclone relief shelters are double-storeyed circular structures so as to offer least wind resistance in the event of a cyclone. The Tamil Nadu coast is vulnerable to cyclones and gales. Such shelters are built with a view to providing temporary accommodation for not more than a week. In each one of them about 200 Tamil refugees have been accommodated for nearly four months at a stretch. The shelters are relatively clean when one bears in mind that 200 people are crammed in them.

All the refugees had fled from Sri Lanka to escape oppression, persecution and terror. At that time, anything seemed better than the living conditions in their homeland. Simeon (42) had a tragic story to recount. He is a supplier of fish to the government corporation in Pesalai, a village inhabited mostly by fishermen. What led him to believe that he had no future in his homeland was the way his 30-year-old cousin, Pathi died. Early in the morning a couple of armymen raided his house, dragged out Pathi who was hiding in the bathroom and shot him dead. His finger was chopped off and the gold ring taken away by the marauders. A few days later, Simeon's son disappeared. He does not know where his son has gone. Obviously the boy must have joined one of the militant groups.

But in Madras there is no threat to their life. They are free but far from happy. The fault lies not with the state or the central government; in fact the state government officials have done a commendable job in housing the refugees. Talking to the refugees this correspondent found that they had four major complaints. Firstly, the money given to them was insufficient Secondly, the climate does not suit the Tamils from Sri Lanka. They find Madras too hot and humid and a number of the children are suffering from skin diseases. Thirdly, the refugees are increasingly finding it difficult to spend their time, since they do not have any work to do. Past experience has shown that invariably refugee camps degenerate into criminal dens. Many of the camps become brothels—the wives and daughters are often forced into the flesh trade by their menfolk to supplement the income. The men start drinking heavily and often drunken brawls break out. Gambling and smuggling are also common features. But this time the authorities are extremely vigilant.

Refugees on their way to a camp

The fourth complaint which a few refugees had was the dispersal of their family members. In a number of instances the families crossed over to India in stages. As a result they are now in different camps in different parts of the state. Some families have approached the authorities for help but the overworked officials have not been attaching much importance to this problem.

In a number of the camps there were posters of the Tamil Eelam Liberation Organisation (TELO) headed by Sri Sabarathnam. According to the refugees some people had come down from TELO and assured the refugees that the situation in Sri Lanka would soon improve and they would be able to return soon to 'Eelam.' In some camps members of the Eelam Revolution Organisation (ERO) also came and spoke to the refugees. Some of the refugees confided that a number of young refugee boys went away with the EROS and TELO activists.

All the refugees, without a single exception concurred that they wanted to return to their homeland. Tamil Nadu is a temporary sanctuary but their future eventually lies in returning to their homeland. They do not expect to see their house and land to remain intact but the yearning to get back to familiar surroundings is puissant. They firmly believe that India is in a position to help restore normalcy in their homeland. They are also hoping that, should their stay in Tamil Nadu prove to be long drawn, they will be given employment by the Indian government. So you have a person like Arulanandam repairing his fishing net. He figures that if he does not return to his homeland to pick up the threads of his livelihood he will be able to do so in Tamil Nadu soon. But here the Indian government just cannot oblige at this juncture, however sympathetic they are, unless they take a policy decision on this matter like in the case of the Tibetan refugees; the government authorities expect them to return to their homeland. The government on its part wishes to take no chance and has therefore prepared detailed documentation to trace each and every refugee at the time of sending them back

Why Vasantrao Patil Resigned

The reason, apparently, was his 'humiliation' by the centre. But it was a clever ploy against Sharad Pawar

Former chief minister Vasantdada Patil's resignation was unexpected. His switch from a posture of confrontation with the high command to that of a person who has thrown in the towel when the chips are down, is equally intriguing. But his game with the high command is not over with his resignation. According to political observers it has only begun; he was not only given a say in the choice of chief minister Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar, but the ministers he wanted retained were also kept; his favourites were promoted and those he wanted out were dropped unceremoniously.

Mukesh Parpiani

Vasantdada Patil

Dada's handiwork is interesting. Vilasrao Deshmukh, who was in his cabinet, was dropped as he was the nominee of the union home minister S.B. Chavan. Anil Warhade was a nominee of the MP, Mrs Usha Chaudhari, who is one of the few Marathas trusted by the high command. So he was dropped. Shivaji Rao Moghe, is another Maratha nominee and a close confidant of union minister Ghulam Nabi Azad, who owed his victory to him. He belongs to the Aandh Adivasi caste which dominated the Washim constituency and has also been excluded.

Among those included are Mrs Damayanti Deshbhratar who is from Nagpur and rabidly opposed to Nasikrao Tirpude and Saroj Khaparde; Gangadhar Kanturkar, a Deshmukh from Nanded who is anti S.B. Chavan and Ram Meghe from Amravati, who is a foe of Usha Chaudhari, and union minister Vasant Sathe. Ramchandra Patil is from Osmanabad and is against union minister Shivraj Patil.

Justifying Dada's political manoeuvrings, a close confidant of his said, "Why should he not have his way? The central government has six ministers from Maharashtra—S.B. Chavan, V.P. Sathe, Vithalrao Gadgil, Narasimha Rao, Ghulam Nabi Azad and Shivraj Patil, who are all anti – Dada. All, except one, are non-Marathas. Then the MPCC(I) is headed by Prabha Rao who belongs to the Tirpude group. The centre by its treatment to Dada has humiliated Maratha pride and so Nilangekar's cabinet has the largest representation of Marathas than ever before. Nine of the 12 cabinet ministers are Marathas and three former ministers of state who have been promoted are also Marathas."

But anti-Dada forces believe this ministry will not last long. Dada has won the first round. Rajiv Gandhi gave in to him because on the eve of his important foreign visits he did not want any political upheaval in Maharashtra. In good time, Dada's power over legislators, ministers and the party as a whole will diminish, they say, because the Congress practice has been to cling to the chair and not to the person.

Among those who were promoted are Anantrao Totpe who represents Pune (rural). His elevation is thus expected to minimise Sharad Pawar's hold there. Shivajirao Deshmukh from Sangli is a Dada man.

The CM-in-waiting?

Sharad Pawar, the Congress(S) leader, is probably one of the most destabilising factors in the state's politics. Political circles here which are unable to believe that former CM Vasantdada Patil resigned for purely emotional reasons, namely continuous humiliation by Rajiv Gandhi and the caucus, interpret Dada's move as one to scuttle the smooth entry of Sharad Pawar into the party. That Sharad Pawar will join the Congress(I) is now being accepted by most of his partymen, barring a few who owe allegiance to the Shetkari Sanghatana. Pawar's men, of course, do not believe or even expect that Sharad Pawar will get the chief ministership the day after he walks into the party. They cite the instance of a senior person like Y. B. Chavan who had to wait patiently for some position, or the younger A. K. Antony who had to wait two years before being made AICC(I) secretary.

It will, however, be interesting to see what excuse or cover Sharad Pawar gives for entering the Congress(I). He fought on the Progressive Democratic Front plank and won primarily on the slogan of "Maharashtra asmita." In Bombay the slogan of "Marathi mansa cha asmita" is very much in the air. Dada is being hailed as the symbol of this "asmita." The question is how will Sharad Pawar enter the party under these circumstances? Has Dada really queered the pitch and spiked his ambition again? Arun Mehta, a close confidant of Sharad Pawar, said, "We all know the colour of the self-respect of Dada. He was the one who begged to be made chief minister for a day. He realised that if Sharad Pawar comes into the Congress it would be at his (Dada's) cost. So he resigned. He will soon be forgotten."

If Sharad Pawar was the catalyst for Dada's resignation, he is expected to be the cause of the possible break-up of the Progressive Democratic Front. Of course, Sharad Pawar saw to it that theFront was not formalised during the last Assembly election, under the pretext of wanting to study whether it would attract the provisions of the anti-defection law. The Janata and PWP have all but disowned him. Shetkari Sanghatana leader Sharad Joshi has threatened that they will have agitations against Sharad Pawar wherever he goes in Maharashtra if he defects to the Congress(I). Congressmen in the ruling party are understandably united on one issue, that while they welcome him into the party they will not permit him to become CM. However, their views can be discounted because the high command has its way of imposing "their man." Scores of legislators, for instance, confess privately that they just don't know how and when Shivajirao Nilangekar was elected "unanimously."

Which leaves one more exciting option for Sharad Pawar—forming a broad front with Dada, Tirpude and all other groups hurt by the high command's reckless political manoeuvres of playing one section against another. Politics is a game of probabilities and since Sharad Pawar's description of Congress(I) culture is vague, he can form a non-Congress(I) government, and call it a 'true' Congress government.

Olga Tellis, Bombay

Vijaysinh Mohite Patil, though not known to be a man of calibre, was taken into the ministry to neutralise the influence of Sushil Kumar Shinde who has been playing a double game in trying to woo Sharad Pawar.

Vasantdada Patil was shrewd enough to make full use of the political compulsions that cramped the high command's style of functioning. It looks like they played into his hands deliberately and Dada made as much political capital out of the situation as he could.

When political observers say that the game has only just begun, it means that in the days to come, the high command will do its best to wean away Dada's so-called followers from his camp while Dada himself will try to see that his team gets stronger.

Dada has several options before him. Ever since Sharad Pawar's famous speech on Congress culture, Dada, a clever political strategist,

Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar

realised that Sharad Pawar was trying to stage a comeback and that he would be welcomed. Dada knew that he would be at a disadvantage. He was peeved because he was not even consulted. Dada also knew that he had burnt all his bridges with the high command. His complaint that he was being humiliated was not a figment of imagination. As even Rajiv Gandhi's admirers say, he should not have called Dada to Delhi if he did not intend to see him. G.K. Moopanar, the AICC(I) observer, said that Dada was asked to wait for a day. But the new Governor of Maharashtra was scheduled to land in Bombay the next day and the former CM wanted

'Observers' or Power-brokers?

Everytime there is a political crisis in Maharashtra, among the first people to arrive in the city of Bombay are the so-called AICC(I) observers "in-charge" of Maharashtra. "In-charge" is a nebulous term fraught with hidden dangers and traps for the state. For instance G. K. Moopanar and union minister P. Shiv Shanker were the observers. What do they really know about Maharashtra? Mr Moopanar comes here only a day after the crisis sets in and then flies in and out of the city or sometimes stays put for three days, as in this latest instance, to oversee the changeover from Vasantdada Patil to Shivajirao Patil Nilangekar. The only other occasion on which Mr Moopanar comes to Bombay is to speak allegedly on behalf of the city's most notorious underworld don called Varadarajan Mudaliar who is now in Nasik jail, detained under the National Security Act. Both of them are Tamilians. If until now Varadarajan has stayed out of the clutches of the law, it is largely due to the "good offices" of Mr Moopanar and the influence he wields over successive chief ministers whom he "helps"

And how are chief ministers chosen? In the case of Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar, one sat for hours at the state guest house, "Sahyadri", where the so-called observers were interviewing legislators to assess their views on who should be the next chief minister. The MLAs went in and came out in barely a minute; yet Mr Moopanar told a press conference later that he had discussed issues with them. What discussions can one have in a minute?

In fact, young veterans in the Congress(I) recall the earlier days when an observer in charge of Maharashtra had to go from district to district and meet representatives of the party at all levels to try and understand the issues and problems involved. Some workers even wonder, if Maharashtra is not getting a raw deal from the centre, and whether these so-called observers ever give the Prime Minister a correct picture of what is happening in the state. The observers act as middlemen between the state chief ministers and the Prime Minister. Rajiv Gandhi, in particular, has had no time to meet representatives of the state, as several young Congress workers have been complaining. His understanding of Maharashtra would necessarily be through these observers who know practically nothing about the state. Yet these observers manage to bully chief ministers. They have their favourites in the state. Mr Moopanar, for instance, is said to be "patronised" by Murli Deora, the BRCC(I) chief and the MLC-in-waiting Moti Daryanani, who look after all his needs in Bombay. In the same way, the "needs" of Sitaram Kesari and others too are looked after by other rich people, it is alleged.

In the days of Sanjay Gandhi, it is said that Youth Congress office-bearers used to travel throughout the state and knew workers from every district. But today besides Bombay and perhaps Pune, the youth leaders are ignorant of the problems of the party in vast areas of the state. There are various reports about money allegedly changing hands between the observers and state leaders to help them remain in power. There are reports that some years ago an observer became an enemy of a certain former chief minister because not enough money was being put into his pockets.

Rajiv Gandhi will have to look into this institution of "observers" if the situation between the high command and the state governments is not to deteriorate. The state governments also seem to depend entirely on the observers for their stability because wrong decisions taken by them would harm the interests of the state. How, for instance, did the same high command which found Shivajirao Nilangekar unfit for being given an Assembly ticket now find him suitable to rule the state? Who connived with Dada, and why, to keep Nilangekar out? Answers to these questions would surely reveal the persons and policies that are wrecking the political stability of the party and the state.

In the old days it is said that M. L. Fotedar, R. K. Dhawan and Arun Nehru used to build channels of influence between themselves and various state leaders in order to bolster their images in the Prime Minister's eyes.

Dada's Last Days in Office

The 83-day stint as chief minister for the fourth time was Vasantdada Patil's shortest. It was marked by controversy almost from the first day. He had suggested the name of Dr W. Sherekar, Marathi-speaking minister from Bombay, but the high command dropped his name. Dada explained the omission as a "clerical error" and said it would soon be rectified.

Then came the municipal corporation elections during which he was in confrontation with Murli Deora, the BRCC(I) president, who had made people with police records candidates. When Dada was asked about it he said "people will not vote for them." When the Shiv Sena won the corporation elections in Bombay with a thumping majority and began talking of a cut-off year to stop the influx of immigrants into Bombay, the chief minister got involved in a controversy in Delhi on 6 May when he said that there would have to be some cut-off year and something had to be done about the overcrowding in Bombay.

Matters between him and the high command worsened over issues like the border row where also Dada made it known privately that he was prepared to resign on the issue. Things came to a head by May. Here is an account of the last few days of Dada in office:

•20 May: Dada went to Delhi to try and get the five-member list of the Governor's nominees to the Legislative Council changed. But he was told that it would not be changed and the names of Mr Tirpude and others would be left.

•22 May: Dada, in reply to a question about the functioning of the party, told reporters that there was a need to discuss whether one person should hold both the post of Prime Minister and party president.

•24 May: Dada claimed, "I was quoted out of context" and that it was only party workers who were discussing the issue.

•27 May: Dada repeated at a meeting in Pune that the party functions only during elections. He said, otherwise, one witnesses a lock on the taluka office of the Congress committee. And there was no one even to pick up the phone. He said, even when workers met him, they only had tales of bickering to tell.

•28 May: Rajiv Gandhi reportedly rang up Vasantdada Patil and asked him to come to New Delhi. There was speculation that Dada would be taken to task for his pronouncements on his now famous "one-person-one-post" observation.

•29 May: Mrs Prabha Rao, who belongs to the anti-Dada faction, was made MPCC(I) chief, displacing the inefficient Prof. Kamble. The appointment was made by Rajiv Gandhi, without the knowledge or consent of the chief minister Vasantdada Patil.

•30 May: The CM returned to Bombay without meeting Rajiv Gandhi. He told friends that he was not interested in continuing, and said he had nothing to say.

•31 May: The chief minister decided to resign on 1 June unless Rajiv Gandhi came up with a peace formula during his visit to Bombay the next day.

•1 June: Dada told friends in the morning to wait for 24 hours. There was tension at Varsha as everyone waited for Dada to return after seeing Rajiv Gandhi off at Santa Cruz airport. The AICC(I) observers were bargaining with him, making all kinds of offers to get him to withdraw his resignation. They promised to return around 10.30 pm. After they returned, Dada called for his car to take him to Raj Bhavan. He had written out his resignation letter in Marathi, in his own handwriting—as he told waiting reporters. He was back by 11.15 pm. When reporters asked him the outcome, he handed over to one of them, Mr Sukrut Khandekar of Kesari, the Governor's letter typed in English, accepting his resignation with "regret." Dada asked the journalist to read it aloud in English.

to be there to receive him. Besides, as an old Congressman, Dada was familiar with the delaying tactics of the high command. When they wanted a chief minister out, they would keep him waiting. For instance, the late V. P. Naik was kept waiting for five days before he could meet the then Prime Minister Indira Gandhi; Siddhartha Shankar Ray was kept waiting for seven days, and H.N. Bahuguna, for ten days. Dada was not going to let such a thing happen to him.

He had built up a smoke-screen of humiliation meted out to him, which matched the mood in Bombay at least, if not the whole of Maharashtra. The Shiv Sena pramukh Bal Thackeray has already come out with an editorial saying that Dada is the true symbol of Maharashtra's self-respect. However, the converse is also true—that Dada has eaten so much humble pie at the hands of the centre, that is the late Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi, that he is probably suffering from political indigestion. His threats to resign had become a joke because he always swallowed them, whether it was in the appointment of the then MPCC(I) president Prof. S. M. I. Aseer or the non-appointment of a Marathi-speaking minister from Bombay. So much so that when he threatened to resign last month, if Mrs Prabha Rao's appointment as MPCC(I) president was confirmed, he was not taken seriously.

The Patil - Nilangekar ministry promises to be a shaky one for two reasons. It represents only one group in the Congress, namely the Dada group. All other groups have been deliberately hurt politically, or ignored. There is no alternative left but for those left out to fight for their survival and this is when the political tremors will start. Several legislators are already unhappy as is evident from the talk in the crowded MLAs' hostel. The new chief minister, like all his predecessors, is holding out the carrot of appointment of some ten new ministers in the near future. But they all know that this hardly ever materialises.

Mr Patil - Nilangekar is an able administrator, having held various portfolios from dairy to irrigation and cooperation ever since the time of V.P. Naik. But he starts with a handicap of being a captive of his immediate predecessor. He was appointed on a political turnabout, having been considered unsuitable to get an Assembly ticket in March and then being made a chief minister in June seems funnier than the March Hare's tea-party. His job will be toughest because not only will he have to contend with malcontents in his own party, but he will have powerful opponents outside his party like Sharad Pawar and A.R. Antulay.

BORDER DISPUTES

When Policemen Killed Policemen

Thirty-one die in clashes between Assam Police and Nagaland Armed Police

The unprecedented "police war" along the sensitive Assam-Nagaland border area in the Merapani sector of the Golaghat subdivision of Jorhat district, has officially taken a toll of 31 lives, with the recovery of 13 more bodies. In the full scale "mini-war," the Nagaland police forces using mortars, petrol bombs and medium machine guns completely outnumbered the Assam Armed Police and "won" a decisive victory pushing deep into Assamese territory and occupying the Merapani police station. After the ceasefire was announced on Thursday and the two governments ordered their forces to go back to their original positions, the Nagaland Armed Police burnt down the Merapani police station before leaving the area. The Assam Rifles have taken control of the area and an uneasy truce now prevails.

Despite the ceasefire announced by Hiteswar Saika and S. C. Jamir, the chief ministers of Assam and Nagaland respectively, at the insistence of the home ministry, the Nagaland forces are helping civilians in their depredatory missions across the disputed border. The Assamese villages in Joypur, Rattanpur, Bheluguri and Dayalpur in the Merapani sector remain under attack. According to the minister of state for forests Mr D. N. Rajkhowa, 50,000 villagers living along the Merapani sector have fled in terror from their homes. Fifteen relief camps at Golaghat and Furkating are accommodating the refugees.

Tension along the 420-kilometre Assam-Nagaland border has been building up since the end of April. On 20 April, the Wokha district authorities in Nagaland erected a barbed wire fencing with concrete posts and the Nagaland Veterinary Centre at Merapani encroached into Assamese territory. The Assam police protested,and seized the fencing material lying on the Assamese side of the border The Nagaland Armed Police (NAP) force then overran the Merapani police station. Since then, skirmishes have been continuing. The NAP then killed an Assamese villager of Dayalpur under the Merapani police station. On 1 and 2 June, the village of Ratanpur was attacked by the NAP and a number of civilians were injured in the firing. This was followed by the unprovoked attack on 4 and 5 June by the NAP and finally the exchange of fire between the two forces

Skirmishes along the border have been frequent In January 1979, armed Naga villagers with the help of the Nagaland Armed Police launched a midnight attack on unsuspecting settlers of Chunnajan in the Sarupathar area of Golagha killing more than 60 people including women and children. Most of the dead were tribals and Nepalis settled in the cleared reserve forests of the area. Since then, the area has never been free of tension

Like Meghalaya and Mizoram, Nagaland was once a part of Assam. Nagaland became a separate state in 1963 when the Naga Hills district was demarcated by a notification issued by the British in 1925. Since then, the demarcating line fixed by the 1925 notification has been accepted. However, after independence,the Nagas had declared a number of times that they were not happy with the British line of demarcation. After Nagaland became a full fledged state, the state government of Nagaland once again brought the boundary question to the notice of the centre. The home ministry then appointed the Sunderam Commission to go over the boundary disputes. The commission submitted its report in 1976 and against Nagaland's claim of 4,000 square metres of Assam's territory, it awarded just 300 square meters as Nagaland had based its claims on it's right of occupation during the pre-British period. The Sunderam Commission also suggested that Dimapur, the largest commercial town in Nagaland should be given to Assam. None of the recommendations of the Sunderam Commision have been followed as the then Nagaland chief minister Mr Vizol had openly declared that the commission's report was not acceptable to Nagaland.

After the 1979 incident, a status quo had more or less been maintained with occasional violations mostly by the NAP. The Assam government has not been conciliatory towards the Nagas and has restrained the Assam Police from taking the initiative against the NAP. The two important English dailies of Guwahati, The Assam Tribune and The Sentinel lashed out at the Assam government criticising its weakeness and vacillation. They felt that the government was not strong enough to guard the life and property of its citizens.

Much of the Naga thrust into Assam is because of the rich forest reserves which fall within the state's boundary. With their own forest resources depleted because of the high consumption of plywood in the saw mills of the state, the businessmen, and the rich contractors have been largely responsible for keeping the border issue alive and trying to exploit Assam's forest reserves.

MRS GANDHI'S ASSASSINATION

Progress in the Trial

The prosecution identifies five eyewitnesses

The recording of evidence in the Indira Gandhi murder case began on 6 June. The special judge, Mahesh Chandra dismissed the petition of Kehar Singh, one of the accused, for holding the committal proceedings in an open court. Turning down the plea for an open court trial, which had taken up a week of proceedings, the special judge in his order, stated: "What makes a proper court is a qualified and an impartial judge, a competent defence counsel and a fair opportunity of defence.The rest is a matter of form only." The 12-page order assured that the holding of trial proceedings inside the jail would not have any "demoralising effect on the witnesses or affect their veracity and truthfulness."

The three accused, Satwant Singh, Kehar Singh and Balbir Singh, seated as usual inside the bullet-proof glass enclosure in the makeshift courtroom listened attentively as the chief public prosecutor, K. L. Arora, named them as the murderers of Indira Gandhi. Separate charges against them were read out by the public prosecutor and details of evidence, which had been missing from the chargesheet, were presented before the court.

Of the 144 witnesses mentioned in the chargesheet, the prosecution has now identified five persons who were present at the spot on the morning of 31 October. The five eye-witnesses to the assassination are Narain Singh, head constable in the Prime Minister's security, Lawang Sherpa, storekeeper at the PM's house, ASI Rameshwar Dayal who also received bullet injuries during the shoot-out, Nathu Ram, personal attendant of the Prime Minister and R. K. Dhawan, special assistant to Indira Gandhi. Three other eye-witnesses who saw the accused persons throw up their hands in surrender after shooting the Prime Minister are Dinesh Kumar Bhatt who was Mrs Gandhi's personal security officer, Makhanlal Fotedar, political adviser to the Congress president and sub-inspector Ramji Lal.

Evidence against the accused persons was recorded on 6 June when the contents of a diary seized from the house of Balbir Singh, a sub-inspector in the late PM's house, were produced. Balbir Singh's diary, according to the prosecutor, gives a month-by-month description of the conspiracy hatched by the three accused persons and the events leading to the assassination. The diary's contents will form the core of the arguments against him. The entry that Balbir Singh had made in the diary after the army action in the Golden Temple in June 1984, reads: "I felt like killing. But I was put on duty outside 1, Safdarjung Road, residence of Mrs Gandhi." In July, Balbir Singh had met prosecution witness Dalip Singh, who is presently detained under the National Security Act. Balbir Singh's meeting with Satwant Singh, days before the assassination is also mentioned in the diary. The prosecutor told the court about another witness account which stated that Balbir Singh had earlier claimed he would kill Mrs Gandhi if Rs 14-15 lakhs was given to his family after the assassination. Besides evidence against Balbir Singh, details of other evidence against Kehar Singh and Satwant Singh, the gold kara and gold ring belonging to Beant Singh which had been recovered from the residence of Kehar Singh, the statement of Bimal Khalsa, widow of Beant Singh and details of the amrit chakhana ceremony attended by Kehar Singh and Beant Singh, were placed before the court.

Arguments were taken up by the defence counsel, the following day. P. N Lekhi, counsel for Satwant Singh alleged that the prosecution was hiding the "real identity of the persons responsible for the political murder." Lekhi claimed during his long argument that "the real assassins" of the late Prime Minister were "still roaming free." During the course of arguments, Lekhi raised many questions: Did Satwant Singh shoot Indira Gandhi? Did he shoot in conspiracy with others (accused) and did Mrs Gandhi die of the bullets fired by Satwant Singh? He also demanded to know why Sonia Gandhi, who had been present at the spot of the assassination and who had taken Mrs Gandhi to the hospital, was not named as an eye-witness in the case. The defence counsel also challenged the authenticity of the chargesheet and the post-mortem report

CRIME

The Godfather: Arrested

Varadarajan Mudaliar is imprisoned

In the annals of Bombay's crime history, 5 June 1985 will be remembered as the day when the don of the city's underworld was arrested in Madras by a Bombay police inspector after a prolonged war on organised crime. It was difficult to imprison a man as rich and powerful as Varadarajan, who had numerous "associates" among politicians, policemen and even journalists. But it happened, proving the DCP. zone IV, Y.C. Pawar's assertion that the law would eventually win. Before Mudaliar was arrested and imprisoned in Nasik central jail, a proclamation by a city metropolitan court stated that his property would be attached if he failed to surrender to the police within a month of its declaration. The court order was put up in the railway station and the office of the Bombay Tamilar Peervai, an organisation which he founded in his domain—Matunga.

The police were instructed to "clean up" the city, infested with warring underworld figures. The then police commissioner J.F. Ribeiro signed the order for the detention of 26 of the city's godfathers on 29 April. Among them were Varadarajan Mudaliar and his cohorts, Mohinder Singh Vig alias Soma, Khaja also known as Thomas

Kurien and Darshan Kumar Dhall alias Tillu. The police also arrested Karim Lala, a big name in Bombay's underworld under the National Security Act, and Mudaliar's aides demonstrating that it meant business. The Dholakia brothers, Arvind and Mahesh also surrendered when the question of attaching the property of absconders arose. But Mudaliar refused to surface and was reported to be in Delhi and then in Madras, where he was finally caught.

The threat to attach his property could not scare Mudaliar who has always managed to find a legal loophole. He has never been jailed except during the Emergency. Mudaliar filed an application for anticipatory bail under Section 438 of the CRPC in the Madras High Court, stating that he was engaged in film production. His plea was dismissed by Justice David Annousami and Mudaliar was arrested by the Matunga police, who brought him back to Bombay, before sending him on to Nasik central jail.

From his humble origins, Varadarajan became one of Bombay's most powerful men. His functions were attended by eminent people, and he organised padayatras by top politicians. Finally he emerged as a media figure, hailed by the press as the godfather of Bombay. He has made and marred the fortunes of local politicians. His Ganesh festivals and contributions to charity are well known. He even supported the Sri Lankan Tamil liberation movement and donated Rs 25,000 to the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front

However, the scenario changed quickly. Changes were being made in the home department after a number of decisions by officials allegedly favouring the mafia led to disagreements with the police. Bombay's former municipal commissioner B.G. Deshmukh took over as chief secretary, dismissing home secretary B.K. Chowgule's aspirations for the post.

What had hitherto been an isolated battle by DCPs, with Y.C. Pawar leading the crime-busters, became an organised move. Pawar's efforts to eradicate crime led to a unique counter-attack, with three cases filed against him by the mafia. The harassed policeman has been given a special advocate now. All the moves suggest that the don's fortunes have declined.

Varadarajan came to Bombay in the early sixties, and began his career as an illicit liquor distiller starting on the payroll of Chella Muthu, a small-time hood. Gradually, he began mediating between the illiterate Tamils and the police, becoming a spokesman for the former. By the Seventies, his push carts and petty distilleries had given way to an organised business with a fleet of vehicles and a Rs 50 lakh turnover. The period between 1970 and 1984 saw a tremendous influx from Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh and Kerala. Many migrant labourers who could not get work, joined the don's empire.

With the crackdown on the Sion—Koliwada illicit distillery network, the underworld activities have shifted to the more distant suburbs and smuggling to the Raigad-Ratnagiri coastal areas. It was in this area that Mudaliar suffered a major setback. The seizure of a vessel carrying Rs 46 lakhs of contraband off the Ratnagiri coast was linked to the Bombay Tamilar Peervai and Mudaliar. This led to the arrest of Ulhas Ghosalkar, editor of the Ratnagiri Times and some of his colleagues. The houses of Mudaliar, Khaja and Soma were raided by the Directorate of Revenue and Intelligence. On 27 March 1984, Mudaliar was, however, released on bail by a Ratnagiri magistrate. Soma and Khaja were detained under COFEPOSA by the Customs.

Whether his political clout is on the wane, has to be seen. Recently, a senior Congress(I) functionary reportedly tried to intervene on Mudaliar's behalf in his personal capacity but could make no headway. On the other hand, while Mudaliar has been imprisoned, his aides are free. The day Mudaliar was finally nabbed, Khaja was released by the NSA advisory board. Tillu was released last month and Soma was set free on the ground that he should have been detained under the Bootleggers and Slumlords Act as the police had cited these offences to detain him under NSA.

KERALA

Minister Quits

Succumbing to pressure

Mr R. Balakrishna Pillai, the controversial energy minister, resigned from the Karunakaran government recently. He was one of the founders of the Kerala Congress and a trade union leader, born into one of the wealthiest families in the state. It was his brilliant oratory that made him an important political leader in the state. But as a high caste Nair Hindu, he was slightly out of place in a party (the Kerala Congress) that keeps mainly Christian interests in mind. Finally, it was his weakness of playing to the gallery, that led to his downfall.

During the state meet of the Kerala Congress in Cochin recently, Mr Pillai stated that only a Punjab-style agitation would open the union government's eyes to Kerala's needs. But realising that he would not get away with what he had said, he denied saying anything about a Punjab-style agitation. But all the pressmen who had reported the speech stood by their reports which everyone including the chief minister K. Karunakaran, believed. The Congress(I) insisted on an apology from Pillai, but an apology after a denial would have been too unbecoming of a man who has always made his own rules.

Just when it seemed that the Congress(I) and Kerala Congress would part ways, a writ petition was submitted to the High Court by K.C. Chandy, a Congress activist and son of the Madhya Pradesh Governor K.M. Chandy, who was president of the Kerala Pradesh Congress Committee. Justice Radhakrishna Menon, while admitting the petition remarked that if the minister had indeed violated his oath of office, it would be in keeping with the highest traditions of parliamentary democracy if he stood down while the petition was being heard. The petitioner said that he could prove that the minister had indeed called for a Punjab-style agitation and in doing so, had violated the oath of office. Legal experts also pointed out that the minister was liable to be punished under the new Anti-Terrorist Law which says that even an exhortation to such anti-constitutional activities is punishable. "Some people were after my blood and they have got it," Pillai told newsmen soon after his resignation. In a way, the writ petition saved the UDF ministry, otherwise, the Kerala Congress would have had to disown Pillai or head for a split.

TENNIS

Set to Match the Best

Amritraj brothers to coach promising youngsters

A time will come when the Amritraj brothers will no longer be India's top tennis stars. An exit, however, need not necessarily mean a total break from a game that they love so much. While they will continue to play top level tennis for a few more years, they realise that their days are almost over. The Amritraj brothers have decided to give back something to the game that made them famous. With the U.S. based biscuit company, Nabisco Brands Inc and its associate, Britannia Industries Ltd, they have set up the Britannia Amritraj Tennis Foundation (BAT) in Madras to develop young Indian tennis talent.

The prime objective of BAT is to spot the best tennis talents available in the country in the age group of ten to 14 years and coach them so that they can find a place in the Davis Cup team and do well in the junior Wimbledon level. At the moment, the BAT has been set up with temporary facilities but should it progress along the expected lines, its sponsors will go in for permanent facilities with an investment that could exceed Rs one crore, according to R. K. Lal, vice chairman and managing director of Britannia Biscuits. For the inaugural batch, eight boys in the age group of 13-14 have been selected on the basis of their potential—Jay Merchant, Gaurav Matekar and Sridhar Bhabhalia from Maharashtra, K. P. Balraj, Prasanth Shetty and Bunesh Venugopal from Tamil Nadu, Rohit Rajpal from Delhi and Rafi Farooqui from Hyderabad. Trials for the selection of the trainees were conducted during December 1984 by Vijay and Anand Amritraj who personally played with and evaluated in all 30 boys, out of whom these eight were finally chosen. The BAT will at present make use of the training facilities at the Madras Christian College. The boys will continue with their studies at the MCC school. They will be put up in a self-sufficient private hostel. Coaching will start at six am with jogging and stretching exercises and about two hours of tennis practice. After classes are over, there will be three hours of tennis practice in the evening followed by 45 minute aerobic classes. The trainees will lead a tightly regimented life and the training will cover not the only physical aspects and coaching but also nutritional intake and mental discipline "to develop the instinct to win." Mrs Maggie Amritraj, mother of the Amritraj brothers who has considerable experience in nurturing tennis players of international acclaim will also be closely associated with the project. She will play "mother" to the eight boys. Apart from the boarding and lodging of the trainees, their schooling will also be looked after by the sponsors.

Two experienced American coaches, specially selected by the Amritraj brothers, Ted Murray (31) and Frederic A. Roecker (33) have already been roped in by the BAT. Both of them come from Peter Burwash International of Texas, USA, which is a well-known company specialising in providing the services of expert tennis coaches. They have come equipped with video taping equipment which will be used as a training device. The services of an Indian coach T. Chandrasekhar have been obtained from the Railways Sports Control Board on loan. The BAT has also employed a marker and ground staff.

Vijay and Anand Amritraj will be making frequent trips (in intervals of four to six weeks) to Madras to personally coach the boys and Vijay Amritraj states that the boys would not be dropped by BAT even if they found there was superior talent in the country. However, if any of the boys decided to drop out on their own volition the sponsors would reserve the right to demand a refund. Lal pointed out that they were promoting a project of this sort because it would be a significant contribution to Indian sports—"We have a social responsibility apart from the contribution we make to the economy of the country by way of our day to day operations." Britannia and Nabisco are undertaking the responsibility for the financing and administration of the scheme which will later be a full-fledged permanent centre. However, if the scheme does not yield results, it may be abandoned. Apart from the coaching, the boys will also be given an opportunity to play in the international circuit for juniors.

At the press conference, P. L. Reddy, secretary, All India Lawn Tennis Association asked why Ramanathan and Ramesh Krishnan, also based in Madras, were not involved in BAT. He pointed out that they were also involved in the development of tennis potential in the age group of 15 to 18 years. The scheme to train Indian talent was conceived by Vijay Amritraj 18 months ago in America. Rounds of discussions between the Amritraj brothers and the Nabisco culminated in the setting up of BAT. Vijay Amritraj pointed out that the scheme was open to girls and ideally they would like to take in at least two girls. But the practical obstacles that came in the way of girls (marriage, babies and more babies) often curbed their potential so much so that there were better returns in coaching boys. If BAT runs smoothly it might play a major and vital role in putting India on the world tennis map.

Dubious Deal at Dam Site

Is the Orissa Forest Corporation guilty?

When the Orissa Forest Corporation (OFC) handed over the Rengali dam reservoir area in Dhenkanal district to the dam project authorities through the forest department in February last year, it had not anticipated that whatever it wanted to suppress would soon be exposed. While surrendering the area of over one lakh acres, the OFC had stated that it had cleared the area of all forest growth. The OFC officials had thought that the dam would be completed before the 1984 monsoons and the reservoir area would be submerged covering up all the leftover trees and vegetation. But to their misfortune, the dam remained incomplete and several lakhs of trees and high stumps were discovered by the dam authorities. The OFC sought more time (up to the end of March 1985) to clear the submersible area. But what is suspected is that "false vouchers (were) prepared for the earlier work." According to an estimate about Rs two crores might have been misappropriated.

The OFC has also not been able to complete the work by March this year as promised. A.K. Ray, chairman of the OFC, while admitting this to SUNDAY, hoped that the reservoir area would be cleared before the onset of rains this year. "I have engaged not only the Deogarh division (of the OFC) but the adjacent divisions," he said. According to the OFC, 70 per cent of the area had been cleared.

But why was the job not completed during the four years when the OFC was engaged by the forest department as its sole contractor to clear the submersible zone to make it fit for pisciculture which forms part of the multi-purpose dam project on the river Brahmani? "There was total obstruction from the forest department. The DFO (divisional forest officer) prevented us from working. That is the reason why I have protested to the government," Mr Ray replied.

How then has the OFC handed over the area when lakhs of trees and stumps were later discovered? To this, Mr Ray replied "We must have cleared the area before the handing over." He, at best, admitted that there might have been some coppice growths which were natural. But it is baffling as to how even such growths were possible when the trees had to be cut flush to the ground, meaning that the stumps, which have sprouted shoots, should have been removed. The OFC, as Mr Ray said, was aware of the World Bank's stipulation that no stumps could remain as it would impede fishing. It is now highly doubtful whether the OFC will be able to clear the area before the monsoons. The two other agencies concerned with the job, the forest department and the Rengali Dam Project, have pointed out that the OFC had bungled. Said a letter from the office of the chief engineer, Rengali Dam Project, "The OFC failed to clear the area as they were (only) interested in valuable timber available in the approach locations." The chief engineer himself wrote down the figure of left-out stumps and trees given by the forest department (after the OFC's surrender of the area) from the actuals. The DFO of the dam project area who was the forest department's local representative also noted "there were a large number of high stumps in the area worked by the OFC."

The trouble between the OFC, the forest department and the Rengali Dam Project came up when the dam authorities engaged private contractors in May last year to clean up the trees and stumps in the area already shown by the OFC as cleared. The private contractors were engaged to cut the forest growths and carry them away free of royalty. The reason for this step was to ensure the full clearance of the area without further delay and make it feasible for pisciculture. The dam authorities' measure, though earlier okayed by different authorities, was objected to by the OFC. As the OFC lobby is very strong, the action of the dam project authorities was condemned by the government and the OFC was given back the job of clearance of the same area which it was supposed to have achieved a year ago. No action is reported to have been contemplated against the OFC for its earlier failure. The only victim of the entire affair is the DFO of the dam project area against whom proceedings of suspension have been initiated. His demand, contained in a letter to the chief conservator of forests on 6 February 1985, that "all the problems on clearance of Rengali reservoir be thoroughly enquired and the actual facts be sorted out or else the whole thing will remain in darkness" seems to have been ignored. His letter reveals that he had to agree with the action of the dam project chief engineer and act in accordance with "the resolution passed previously by the revenue divisional commissioner (northen division), chief conservator of forests Sambalpur circle, chief executive OFC and other officials."

The DFO's letter also reveals that the then forest minister Harihar Karan, now a Congress-I legislator took unusual interest in the matter of the private contractor's job and on 29 November 1984 issued instructions to allow timber transport (TT) permits to the private parties engaged by the chief engineer (dam project) "on collection of some royalty from them." The royalty was considered to be nominal. It was only after the OFC authorities took up the matter with the chief minister that the private parties were eliminated altogether, it is reliably learnt. But the OFC is reported to have lost heavily. When asked how much the loss was, the OFC officials told this correspondent that the accounts for the Rengali area were not recorded separately but were included in the total accounts of the several OFC divisions responsible not only for the reservoir site clearance but with other jobs.

A Natwarlal's Ram Rajya

Criminal runs a "parallel government" in UP

Ram Rajya was never so easily established. Beni Ram Yadav did it sitting in a three-room shack in Bidhnu, a country-town about 20 miles away from Kanpur. He appointed "district magistrates" and "police inspectors," issued warrant and public decrees, framed laws, arrested people, pronounced judgments—an entire government subsystem that functioned in Kanpur, Gonda, Behraich and Etawah districts of Uttar Pradesh. For years his Ram Rajya flourished. Then sudden ly. in early February this year it went bust.

While on his rounds, an officer from the Chamangunj police station of Kanpur, came across a rather strange signboard. "Colonelgunj police station: officer-in-charge, Munnalal." He was surprised because the Colonelgunj police station is somewhere else and the place did not look like one at all. He knocked at the door but was told that "station officer saheb" was away on his beat. The police officer came back the next day and found Munnalal in the "police station." When asked to produce his credentials, Munnalal showed an identity card issued by the "Karma Veer Ram Rajya Bharat Society Samiti" and signed by Beni Ram Yadav, Pradhanadhyaksha (chief presiden') of the organisation. Munnalal was immediately arrested and interrogated. During the questioning he had named ten other people—"karam veers" as he said of the Ram Rajya Bharat Society Samaj—running a parallel government in central Uttar Pradesh.

The police raided the Bidhnu head quarters of the organisation, arrested seven persons including Beni Ram Yadav and charged all of them under Sections 120B (conspiracy), 171 (impersonation) and 420 (cheating) of the Indian Penal Code. The four-page FIR at the Chamangunj police station listed all the articles recovered from Beni Yadav's house in Bidhnu. A large number of police uniforms complete with insignia, badges of rank, caps, whistles and documents including blank challan forms, arrest warrants, forms used by the police under various sections of the Criminal Procedure Code, oath forms that members of the society were supposed to fill in, certificates of "training" despatch registers, cash receipt registers and some copies of the "declaration of the establishment of Ram Rajya" issued by Beni Yadav sometime ago. Also recovered was a copy, perhaps the only one that Beni Yadav had cared to print, of the constitution of the organisation. Material including identity cards of the "vanguards of Ram Rajya" is still freely available in Kanpur

Beni Yadav's doings seem less an effort to run a parallel government and more a convenient way to make a fast buck. Beni Yadav was just another 'conman' who tricked people whom the administration remained unaware of Fifteen years ago, Beni Ram Yadav, a village youth registered (registration No 550) the Karam Veer Ram Rajya Bharat Society Samiti as a social service organisation and then turned the social service organ into a moneyspinning racket. Netaji, as he is known by the people of Bidhnu, then began gathering his staff. For only Rs 238 he promised to make anyone a "district magistrate" or a "police inspector." He gave each member of his society an identity card, and the title of karam veer and invested them with unlimited powers. They were so wide that karamveers were virtually unaccountable to anyone. They could carry any kind of arms and distribute them to people of their choice, they could seize vehicles, search any house and arrest people (who incidentally could not be bailed out under the laws of Beni Yadav's society).

A Ram Rajya "policewoman"

While they went around flaunting their uniforms, identity cards and powers, Beni Ram Yadav accumulated money. He constructed a pucca two-storeyed house at Hridaypur Shimbhua, his native village some distance away from Bidhnu where it still stands. His whereabouts or those of his family are still unknown. They have all been missing ever since he was granted bail a few days after his arrest on 18 February. But there is someone around who knows Beni Yadav. Ram Khilawan was a middle-aged man with a perpetual frown on his face. He used to be the "treasurer" of the Karam Veer Ram Rajya Bharat Society Samiti. When the police came to arrest him he managed to escape saying he was only a pratinidhi (representative) who was responsible for recruiting members for the society. "I did it as a friend.... Beni of course made a lot of money.... it used to pour in in the form of taxes collected from the districts...he has got all the money," Ram Khilawan said. He does not know where Beni Ram Yadav is today or what he is doing. Neither do the Kanpur police who have flashed an alert in all neighbouring districts know about Beni Yadav. Perhaps, sitting in some obscure region Beni Ram Yadav is planning a new move.

BHOPAL TRAGEDY

The Catastrophe on Screen

A London TV film blames Union Carbide

Six months after the tragedy at Bhopal, "London Television's World in Action" presented an hour long in-depth investigation of the catastrophe. It unveils a story of bad engineering, reckless cost-cutting and a disregard for people's lives. The most striking example of callousness was the sale of tee-shirts in stores in Connecticut and West Virginia saying "Kiss a Carbider today" and "I'm a lovable Carbider." This is a public relations campaign by Union Carbide in order to regain its image in the USA. It has been supported by its employees scared to lose their jobs in the West Virginia plant which is similar in design to the one in Bhopal. A resident of the town, who is campaigning for the closure of the plant which has just been reopened said, "There is no other word for it but obscene To wear something like this after Bhopal. Just obscene." The investigations of the TV team show that the American company was aware that their methods of making and storing deadly MIC gas were dangerous, that Union Carbide bequeathed to Bhopal a dangerous plant, ignored warnings and in a fierce bout of cost-cutting drove the plant through the safety barriers in contrast with the company's claim that it did nothing that caused or contributed to the world's worst industrial accident.

With the aid of confidential Union Carbide documents and interviews with former key employees speaking out for the first time, the documentary team says that Bhopal was a disaster just waiting to happen. It says that Union Carbide had a very strict safety operations manual which instructed safety officers all over the world to send in a report of accidents and fatalities to the head office in the US. Hence, there could be little truth in the Union Carbide statement that they were not aware of the various accidents that had been taking place in Bhopal from 1982 onwards, the many warnings and the growing fears of the workers of the factory. Indeed, it quotes a Union Carbide operation manual saying, "A certain amount of toxic gas release and emission is unavoidable and unpredictable."

The team interviewed Ian Swift, an expert in safety systems. He had worked with Union Carbide from 1975 to 1980. Mr Swift categorically said that the three-stage safety system in Bhopal was inadequate and he indentified critical deficiencies in the system. He said the scrubber (the second line of defence should the deadly MIC gas be released from storage tanks) at best could have dealt with only one-third of the MIC stored and the flare tower, which was designed in the US could burn out only a fraction of the lethal gas.

Comparisons were made between the plant in West Virginia and the one at Bhopal. Union Carbide's chairman Warren Anderson had said: "The safety systems were just as good." However, after examination, the documentary says that the West Virginian plant is better maintained, there is no dangerous cost-cutting at the expense of safety—the crucial refrigeration plant was not shut down. Most important, it had an evacuation plan and a computerised alarm system. A safety official at the plant said, "Our plant wouldn't operate without such an evacuation plan."

Mr Swift said that one knew as early as in 1976 that safety systems like the one in Bhopal couldn't cope with a leak of gas and liquids since they had only been designed for gas flow. According to him, there are at least 50,000 safety systems for chemical production throughout the world which would be inadequate if a Bhopal type of leak occurred. It is a reminder that the tragedy of Bhopal could happen again because some companies are too preoccupied making profits and cutting losses to be bothered by safety requirements.

India: The Friend in Need

Rajiv Gandhi's trip is welcomed by Bangladeshis

Gen. Ershad(left) with Rajiv Gandhi

Aloke Mitra

The 250-minute long flying visit to Bangladesh by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi on 2 June was a trailblazer. Most people in Bangladesh, though surprised by the sudden decision, have taken his initiative not only as a good neighbourly gesture but also as a sign of his new brand of politics.

The Indian Prime Minister, accompanied by the Sri Lankan President J.R. Jayewardene, left Dhaka within ten minutes of their arrival, for Urir Char, one of the worst affected islands. When they reached Urir Char, much of the island was under water. Rajiv Gandhi wearing a gum boot, walked through the slush to the briefing centre on the island and visited other places to distribute relief materials to the survivors. The leaders spent about 50 minutes on the island before returning to Dhaka. After a brief press conference 30 minutes later, they were back in Delhi. The visit by Rajiv Gandhi and J.R. Jayewardene, however, left a visible and lasting impact on the people's mind. Rajiv Gandhi told newsmen that the purpose of the visit was "to show that we care for Bangladesh and the Bangladeshis at the time of their distress and when they are down." The presence of Sri Lanka's President, J.R Jayewardene was also significant. Replying to a question, he said he was "looking forward to the SARC summit anxiously," thus removing doubts about Sri Lankan participation in the summit.

Mr Gandhi said: "The visit was very very short but we are very much moved by the warm feelings of the people in the affected areas in spite of their sufferings." The trip, he felt, would lead to stronger and closer ties between the two friendly neighbours. Though he seemed quite overwhelmed, he did not mince matters. He said: "There was tremendous devastation.. by the cyclone. We have done our little bit to help." But he made it clear that he had not come to Bangladesh to either discuss or solve the Ganga waters problem, at a time when the Joint Rivers Commission (JRC) ministerial level meeting was in progress in Dhaka but thought that his visit would further improve relations between the two countries and help to solve the outstanding issues.

However, President Ershad and Rajiv Gandhi did discuss bilateral issues and all international matters of mutual interest including the SARC summit schedule in Dhaka next December, on their way to Urir Char and on their way back to Dhaka. Bangladesh's foreign adviser, Humayun Rashid Chowdhury while briefing newsmen said: "I have reasons to believe that the discussions ended on very positive and friendly note," and appeared optimistic about the solution of some of the outstanding bilateral issues in the near future. This was the first time President Ershad and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, were meeting after Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's funeral. During their brief discussions on bilateral problems in November, President Ershad had told Rajiv Gandhi that had he (Rajiv Gandhi) played golf, they two could solve their problems in the golf course!

Rajiv Gandhi's brand of diplomacy has generated a positive reaction. A well-known Bangladeshi architect, with strongly anti-Indian opinions, told SUNDAY recently, "This man (Rajiv Gandhi) means business He is young and has come with refreshingly new ideas and has dynamism. He gives us hope " The Dhaka Chamber of Commerce and Industry's newly elected President Mahbubur Rahman, lauded Rajiv Gandhi's gesture. He too believes, that the Indian leader's positive thinking would yield positive results in the near future President Hossain Mohammad Ershad was pleased with the unique gesture of the Indian Prime Minister and described the visit as a "significant development in the spirit of regional cooperation " Ershad said that the visit had demonstrated the extraordinary gesture of solidarity and sympathy towards the people of Bangladesh and added that the visit was a source of inspiration to the cyclone-affected people. "We are deeply touched by this gesture," he said.

SRI LANKA

A Small Step Forward

Talks between India and Sri Lanka end on a hopeful note

The joint communique issued at the end of the visit of the Sri Lankan President J. Jayewardene and national security minister L. Athulathmudali was only a small step forward in solving the Tamil problem. It reiterated only the peripheral issues that have been taken for granted—that India has a role to play in the ethnic crisis and that the present problems should be solved quickly. No fresh proposal was put forward, though Jayewardene said that the regional autonomy he envisaged, would ensure elections for the constitution of the district councils, with representatives from the area. Later, more rights and powers would be given to the district councils, culminating in the setting up of a coordinating council. He also promised to grant amnesty to Tamil militants provided they laid down their arms.

The adjectives used by both governments to describe the talks were "cordial, frank, sincere and useful." But how useful the talks actually were can only be judged by the course of events in Sri Lanka. The two governments have decided that "immediate steps" should be taken to defuse the situation and create a proper climate so that a political settlement can be evolved within the unitary structure of Sri Lanka. Romesh Bhandari, foreign secretary however, did not spell out the 'steps' as it was up to the Sri Lankan government to decide on that This is a comedown from G. Parthasarathy's days who as Indira Gandhi's special envoy had outlined the workings of provincial councils that would provide regional autonomy to the Tamils

The joint communique states, "The two sides further agreed that all forms of violence should abate and finally cease Every effort will be made for the speedy restoration of normalcy in the northern and eastern provinces. This will be conducive to the early return of Sri Lankan citizens who are in India, to Sri Lanka "

The only progress the Indian government made was to record that "all forms of violence" must cease. Mr Bhandari clarified that it referred both to terrorist violence and army actions against civilians. The joint communique issued after Bhandari's visit to Colombo in April had given the impression that terrorist violence must first stop if talks are to be held. Even here, it has not been made clear whether terrorism should end first, or whether both forms of violence should stop simultaneously. Neither has a time frame been mentioned. It is clear that the two governments began their search for a solution all over again. Thus, the nuts and bolts of a permanent peaceful solution will come much later, if it does at all. The trip has disappointed the Tamils who feel that the exercise is a way of buying time.

According to sources, the Sri Lankan government has promised to restore civil administration in the Tamil areas, the moment India persuades the Tamil terrorists to stop fighting. This is likely to reduce tensions for the Tamils who live in fear of the Sri Lankan troops.

Rajiv Gandhi(left) with Sri Lanka President J. Jayewardene

With Jayewardene showing visible signs of aging, it is the 48-year-old national security minister, Lalith Athulathmudali, who has begun taking charge. The Oxford-educated minister and in all probability Jayewardene's successor agreed to meet this correspondent recently. In the course of the exhaustive 90-minute interview, Athulathmudali made a number of things clear. Under no circumstances would the President ever agree to bring the north and the east under one umbrella as initially suggested by the provincial councils. The two regions would be carved into two districts because the Tamils are not in the majority in the area. The ruling UNP holds ten of the 12 seats in this area. This is a testimony to the fact that the people in the region support the government. But TULF leader Mr Amirthalingam is firm on this score and walked out of the all party conference when the government made known its decision to bifurcate the region. Mr Athulathmudali, however, said that his government was prepared to discuss the issue with the people of the east. He said the kind of regional autonomy envisaged by the UNP government revolved around the provincial council with the only difference being that there would be two districts instead of one. He said the Tamil areas would have more powers than the union territories of India.

But terrorist activity has increased in the recent months. According to Athulathmudali, "The Tamil terrorists who have finished their training in Tamil Nadu and have crossed over with weapons are now confronting us. The Tamil Nadu training camps are the biggest obstacles in curbing terrorism. I know for a fact that there are training camps in Coimbatore, Thanjavur, Mettupalayam and Coonoor. We have these training camps on video. I have a lovely film of Sri Sabarathnam (leader of TELO) inspecting a camp in a lovely place between Coimbatore and Mettupalaym. I have sworn evidence taken by the local police in a small town where a poor farmer was killed (by Tamil militants) because he gave protection to a small boy from Sri Lanka who ran away from one of the training camps." "I know for a fact that Mr Pirabhakaran (leader of LTTE) sends his boats from Vedaranyam (in Tamil Nadu) to Velvetithurai and Nagerkovil in Sri Lanka."

Pirabhakaran

Athulathmudali accused the militants of being brutal and racist. The killing of the ex-convicts of the Kent and Dollar farms in November 1984 by the LTTE was "done in the most brutal fashion.' He states that he has a recording of Pirabhakaran ordering his men to kill 300 Sinhalese in the Anuradhapura massacre. He also pointed out that in a bank robbery conducted sometime ago, Uma Maheshwaran (leader of PLOT) killed the Sinhalese guards while he chose to gag the Tamil guards.

Admitting that a major problem in finding a permanent political settlement was the Sinhala opposition parties, the minister stated that the most crucial aspect of a settlement was to make it last. He felt that a consensus would have to be evolved and said that he had an open mind about negotiating with the Tamil militants. Referring to SLFP leader Mrs Bandaranaike's assertion that any fresh proposal would be opposed unless it was put before the people, the minister said that, he was willing to concede this point as "any proposal that is ultimately agreed on will gain in strength by being accepted by the people." Asked whether that would mean another referendum, he replied, 'I don't want to talk about the special modalities...the key sectors of public opinion will get an opportunity to express their views.'

Mr Athulathmudali denied that his government had opted for a military solution to end the crisis. He said the military had to be strengthened to counter the terrorists. "History says that when faced with acts of violence governments in power have to resist it. But we don't make the mistake of thinking that resisting violence is the solution." He said the morale of the armed forces, contrary to what the terrorists say is very high and claimed that the programme for the settlement of armed Sinhalese in predominantly Tamil areas was a response to the LTTE attack on Sinhala civilians. While such a programme can lead to civil war, he felt that the repercussions would be greater if Sinhalese civilians continued to be killed. They were armed only to defend themselves against the Tamil terrorists. Why did'nt he post troops in these villages instead of arming civilians? Mr Athulathmudali's reply was: "It is quicker to arm civilians than train soldiers as the latter requires four to five months to be trained and Pirabhakaran will not wait for four or five months till I train my soldiers." He feared that killing civilians would result in something worse than a crisis of confidence against his government.

Mr Athulathmudali said that as soon as terrorist violence ended, army actions would stop and the country's ethnic problem would be settled. Talking in a lighter vein, he said that he and Pirabhakaran are both born on the same day—26 November. He hoped they would have more in common and would eventually become friends. "There are so many important things to do in Sri Lanka than shooting at each other. And these people (the militants) who are doing all sorts of terrible things now must one day, come into the mainstream of politics."

Understanding the Police

His severe police cap and gentle hazel eyes may look incongruous together. He happens to be a police officer with an impeccable record. Ved Marwah, the first union territory cadre officer to become New Delhi's police commissioner, recalls his first posting 29 years ago at Diamond Harbour, West Bengal: "I had a huge house on the banks of the Hooghly. There was no running water or electricity but I had three pankhawallas and two launches at my disposal. For a boy from arid Peshawar, the abundance of water all round was a delight." Subsequent postings as DIG (VIP security) and IG (Mizoram) were less comfortable and in his own words "more demanding and adventurous." Decorated many times, the police chief specially remembers the gallantry medal he received in 1974. "How can you forget pellets that are still lodged in your head?" he laughs. Has he any new ideas on how to improve the police's tarnished image? "The police have pride in their job and organisation. We must make their working and living conditions more humane to enable them to be sympathetic while dealing with the public. You can't pay a constable an unskilled worker's wages and expect him to behave like a London bobby," he said. Mr Marwah continues to live in his old house. He has not moved into the official residence of the commissioner, and the only signs that show his change in status are a few bouquets of wilting flowers.

Mulk Raj Anand

Honoured Indian

International recognition came the Indian novelist Dr Mulk Raj Anand's way when his name was announced for this year's International Academy for Philosophy of Art prize. The 80-year old author whose popular works include Untouchable, Coolie, The Big Heart, Morning Face and Confessions of a Lover was chosen as one of the two laureates for his contribution "as an Indian novelist writing in English and as a poet devoted to the values of freedom and peace..." The other writer chosen for the prestigious award is Dr (Miss) Florence Hetzler, professor at Fordham University, New York.

Doubles for Life

With the ageing Vijay Amritraj spending more and more time on tennis schools and showbiz, the chubby-cheeked 21-year-old son of Ramanathan Krishnan, arguably India's greatest tennis player ever, is the one tennis fans are looking up to for miracles on court. Ramesh, a rising star in today's highly competitive world of professional tennis, and winner of the junior Wimbledon and French Open titles, won another round recently, this time off court. His new partner for life is Priya, a college student and a friend of his sister Gowri.

Kalpana Jhingan

The Light in Her Life

The large almond-shaped eyes are sightless but a pretty smile lights up Kalpana Jhingan's face when she talks to you: "I was confident of passing," she says, talking about her recent success in the class XI board examinations. "But I never hoped for a first division, because you can never be sure of results in a secondhand examination." Kalpana had to dictate her answers to a writer and was given an extended time limit.

A student of Modern School, Delhi, Kalpana finds her alma mater "the best part of my life after my family". As she tires easily, she cannot devote much time to music. She cheerfully shrugs off this disadvantage. "I can listen to all the music I want to." One of Kalpana's favourite pastimes is to listen to the Gita being read by the person closest to her —her grandmother.

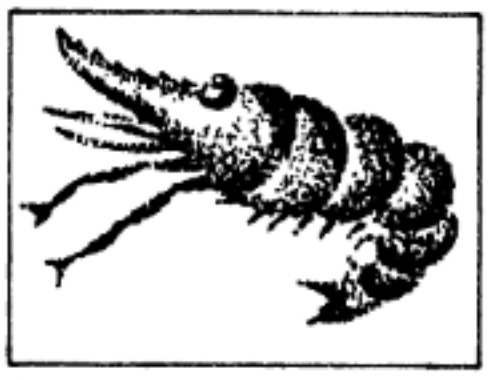
Television for Deaf People

The visual medium can make an impact only if it is completed by sound. Millions of viewers have been deprived of this unique audio-visual facility which television provides because of their physical handicap of deafness. However, they need not despair, as French television has now introduced a special teletext system of providing sub-titles, which inserts a few lines on the top of the screen to make for better understanding. Moreover, the sub-titles remain invisible to those it does not concern. A miniaturised decoder is made available to help the deaf with the sub-titles, which can also be attached to the television set.

Fatal Spirit

In the United States, alcohol is the third leading cause of deaths among old people. More than 20 per cent of those aged 61 and above, are alcoholics. A large number of them turn to alcohol to escape from the problems associated with growing old. Symptoms such as "falling and breaking of the hip," confusion, forgetfulness, changes in behaviour, and failing health among the elderly are often passed off as senility or the "ageing process."

Sponge: The Latest Contraceptive

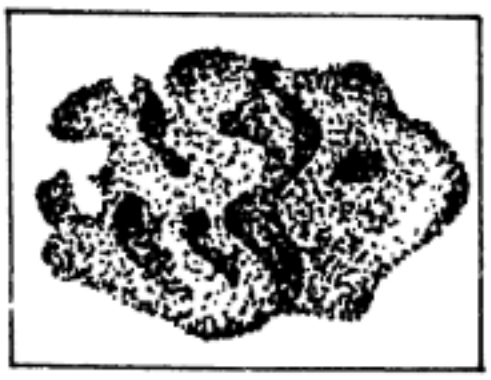


The latest contraceptive to hit the American markets is the sponge. Thirty four million sponges have already been sold and an estimated one million American women have used it. The sponge, which fits inside the vagina, can provide contraceptive cover for 24 hours without additional spermicide. It is said to be 89 to 91 per cent effective. However, doctors in Britain are still sceptical about the efficacy of the sponge as a contraceptive device.

Visionary Creatures

A series of experiments by a Swiss research team shows that ants use two different forms of vision for finding their way back to the nest after foraging for food. One depends on recognising landmarks and the other on the ability to use patterns of polarised light in the sky as a compass. The scientists say that an ant can easily be trained to find a food source more than 20 metres away from its colony. Having arrived at the food, the ant will grasp the bait and run home along a straight path, selecting the proper direction even if the insect is removed to an unknown territory and prevented from seeing either landmarks or the sun; the celestial pattern of polarisation is sufficient as a compass cue.

The Long-distance Traveller



Some lobsters, known as sluggish creatures of the deep, may cover 100 miles or more each year. Many appear to complete a long-distance circuit and return to their starting point, according to Mary Cerullo of the University of Maine Sea Grant College Programme who is undertaking a research on the movements of large lobsters in the Gulf of Maine. The research seems to confirm what lobster men have known for decades—that lobsters tend to migrate farther offshore in search of deeper and warmer waters in the winter, then return in the springtime. The study could also shed light on how the movements affect the lobster population. Although most of the lobsters moved two to seven miles from where they were released, 11 per cent were tracked an average of 60 miles, including several that later returned to their original release area.

Occupational Hazard

Occupational hazards often go hand in hand with one's job, but none are as strange as the tale of the glove maker of Somerset (England):a woman who made leather gloves at home suffered from an over-active thyroid gland. She was put on radio-iodine but the level of the thyroid hormone circulating in her blood dropped below normal. The effect was that she changed from a rational person to a confused one and was admitted to hospital with a severe stomach ache. On examination it was found that the large bowel was perforated and a peculiar yellow worm-like mass was sticking out. This mass turned out to be 800 elastic bands, which were used to keep the glove leather bundles together. Later, it was discovered that her nephew had been putting them in her tea.

Meteorites: Clues to Life

Meteorites from space contain tantalising chemical clues to the origin of organic life. But while chemists find such pre-life materials as amino acids (which are building blocks of proteins, or the bases that form units of the genetic code), they have been unable to explain how these crucial compounds have arisen. Now two scientists from the university of Alabama, Thomas J. Wdowiak and David G. Agresti, report the presence of tiny particles of magnetite in a meteorite that fell near Orgueil, France, in 1864. These particles could have been the catalysts that encouraged the chemicals to form. The Orgueil meteorite is 3.5 per cent organic material, which includes amino acids. Such pre-life chemicals have been found in other meteorites. Also, Cyril Ponnamperuma, of the University of Maryland, recently announced that the Murchison meteorite contains all five of the bases that combine in different ways to encode genetic instructions.

For those born between 15 May and 14 June

You are honest and trustworthy but sometimes you have a tendency to overestimate your own capabilities. It is only with your very intimate friends or those whom you greatly admire, that you admit your faults. However, once you have recognised the 'fault,' you try to eliminate it as far as possible. Nature is a great source of joy to you and helps you to regain confidence when you are feeling down-and-out.

VARIETY

CHESS

The art of provocation has been perfected by a number of British players over the years, though it stems largely from distant shores Michael Basman, who is of Armenian extraction, must claim ultimate responsibility for most of the frivolous ideas we see being played around the country today, but his standards have been picked up and borne with considerable success by players such as Tony Miles, Jim Plaskett and Julian Hodgson

Broadly the idea is to draw an otherwise timid but solid opponent out of his shell by the judicious use of a few 'bad' moves early on Against somebody who will simply ignore you there is very little point, but it is amazing how quickly some players can be persuaded to dig their own graves

BRIDGE

Passes to show the values for an opening bid, or a specific range such as 8–12, have become common in the tournament world. Whatever the technical merit, they create problems for opponents who have not spent many hours working out a defence The World Bridge Federation has got to the stage of appointing a committee to examine the permissibility of such systems, at any rate in pairs or multiple team events Mind you, this committee will probably take as long as the average government commission to make a report, and then it will be ignored on the grounds that such methods are becoming more familiar.

One thing I am quite sure of is that Australian teams have been flattered by the uncommon use of an unfamiliar style On this deal from the Epson tournament in Japan two Australian pairs [illegible] were East West

THIS INDIA

SHRIRAMPUR: In keeping with the times, tape-recorders have replaced priests in performing nuptials during the busy marriage season in this prosperous sugar town. The immediate cause for introducing this novel method, however, is a dearth of purohits. In many wedding pandals, tape-recorded mangalastakas are played to unite couples in holy matrimony. Such tapes are available in plenty in view of the rush season. In many villages in the district, marriages are being postponed but for a different reason. The drought has put a premium on water and guests are unwilling to attend wedding receptions if there is no guarantee of water supply—The Times of India (Hari Agrawal, Muzaffarpur)

NEW DELHI: Amazing and incredible though it may sound, a young researcher on international relations at Jawaharlal Nehru University here can discharge electricity from his body. Mr Satyaprakash, studying for a doctorate in Asean-China relations, can make a bulb (60 watts, or even 200 watts) feebly glow, and even light an electricity-tester with any part of his body, including the head. Demonstrating his prowess, Mr Satyaprakash, 28, first gets closeted in a room for about two minutes and performs some breath-control—Searchlight (Minhajus Salam Rizvi, Aurangabad)

GUDALUR: The primary health centre at Pandalur, near here, which was upgraded and declared open on 10 May, was closed the very next day. Dr H. V. Hande, the health minister, declared the health centre open on 10 May, which had a bed strength of 24 and was constructed at a cost of Rs 5.89 lakhs. The residents of Pandalur felt happy that the long-pending demand to upgrade the health centre had been fulfilled at last. But to their utter dismay they found that the centre was not functioning on the next day and the reason given for the same was that there was no adequate water supply. The beds brought from Udagamandalam to Pandalur for the inaugural function were also taken back—Indian Express (R. Vasudevan, Udagamandalam)

BHARATPUR: A 'made in heaven' marriage in village Aoo in this district turned out to be a 'made in hell' one when the bride's side realised that the groom, who came to marry, was not the Tom they had settled the marriage with, but was Dick. When the word went round the tiny village that Tom was not Tom but Dick, the villagers decided to deal with the groom's party 'properly' and what followed was a virtual stampede. The irate bride's side relieved the groom's party of all the ornaments and garments they had brought all the way from Mathura and they also treated the visitors with utter disdain. Dick's father and other members of the party were beaten up while Harry, the middleman who settled the marriage, was tied to a chestnut tree for his efforts and his scooter was also 'seized.' The appearance of the groom's party soon became most unbecoming of such a ceremonial occasion: torn clothes and swollen faces all black and blue. Soon, the bride's aides, sitting back with the satisfaction of a job well done, realised that the bride was anointed and a groom had to be found. No problem—they knew of a foodgrain dealer's son in Deeg who was of marriageable age and they promptly united him in wedlock. One groom's loss is another's gain but then all's well that ends well—Rajasthan Patrika (P S. Walker, Jaipur)

BIJAPUR: An assistant executive engineer of the public works department, who set out on a treasure hunt following a dream his servant had, is now having his "find" investigated by the police. According to a complaint filed by the servant, he dreamt two months ago of a pot of gold buried beneath a tree, and took to performing poojas to help him identify the spot. Soon after, he was dismissed for negligence. Coming to know of the dream, the engineer launched a search in his garden, unearthed the pot, and was in illegal possession of the gold, the complaint said. The police have seized a copper pot from the engineer who told them that it only contained coal—Indian Express (B.K. Salwan, 99 APO)

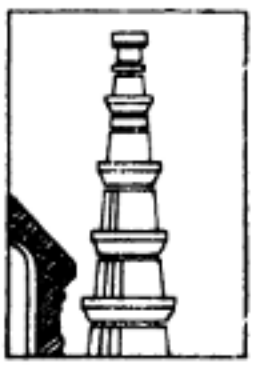
How not to grow a lamp-post from a friend's head and a few tips on good composition.

Composition is one of the most elusive and individual aspects of photography. While everyone agrees it's an absolute necessity, they all have their own concept of what it is! There is the modernistic school of thought, the traditionalist, the static and dynamic style and many more. But you don't have to bother about all that. Here are a few simple guidelines that can make your photography so much better ... compositionally speaking.

dia Photographic Company Limited – a Kodak affiliate

Composition and organisation



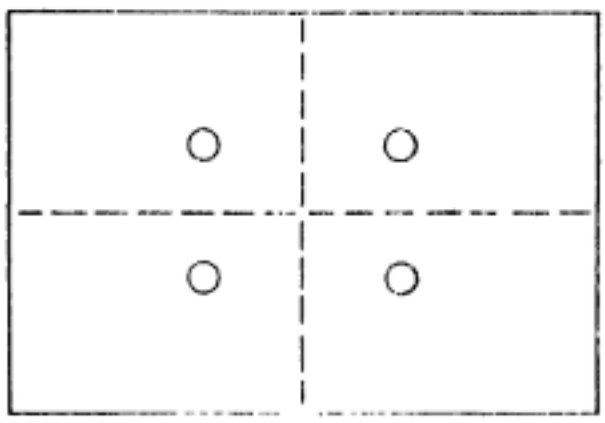
Simply put, composition is visual organisation. It includes, but is not limited to how you place your subject in the frame – and the effect that it will have on all the other elements in the picture. Compose carefully and you can emphasize your subject (which is what you want to do) while keeping all unnecessary and distracting things out of the picture (which is where they should be).

Good composition involves the choice of vertical or horizontal framing, the position of the camera subject placement, contrasts and isolating details.

This isn't as difficult as it may sound, and with a little practice, it will become very easy ... and your pictures better.

Vertical or horizontal

Simple. A palm tree, the Qutab Minar and Amitabh Bachchan need vertical frames. A mountain range or a seascape need a horizontal frame. In both cases, you've added to the height and the width. For portraits, use the vertical format, it adds character.



Static or dynamic

A balanced picture makes for a Static composition. It would probably be a picture shot on a quiet, calm day. A Dynamic composition is one in which the picture seems to 'move' – a picture tilted, placed at a slant or distorted would be 'dynamic'. Work out your 'response' before you shoot. And shoot.

Framing

While there's nothing wrong with putting your subject squarely in the centre of the frame, you can change your pictures dramatically by placing your subject to the left or right of the centre or a bit higher or lower than usual. One peek through the view-finder should be enough to decide.

Framing action

The ground rule for shooting action: anticipate. Try to set your focus first, try to get to the best shooting point, and get there in time. Not too difficult at all. Fill the frame; get all the action. Pick a shooting distance that lets you fill at least one quarter to one third of the picture area with significant action. And please keep a safe distance if the action is dangerous!

Framing the outdoors

A basic point for shooting the outdoors: find a dominant feature of the landscape and concentrate on it. Filling the frame with the principal subject is vitally important. Frame your scenics with a person or object in the foreground and you'll add interest and depth and that important sense of scale. Remember: a foreground feature that contrasts in colour and/or tone with distant areas is more effective in creating the illusion of depth than one that looks similar

Contrast and shock

Contrasting elements are the building blocks of intelligent composition. Almost any kind of contrast helps structure a photograph. Contrasts of tone, colour, sharpness, size and subjects are fair game. Like a white flower in a bunch of red roses ... a child in a crowd of grown-ups ... a crow among doves . . just be careful not to overdo it.

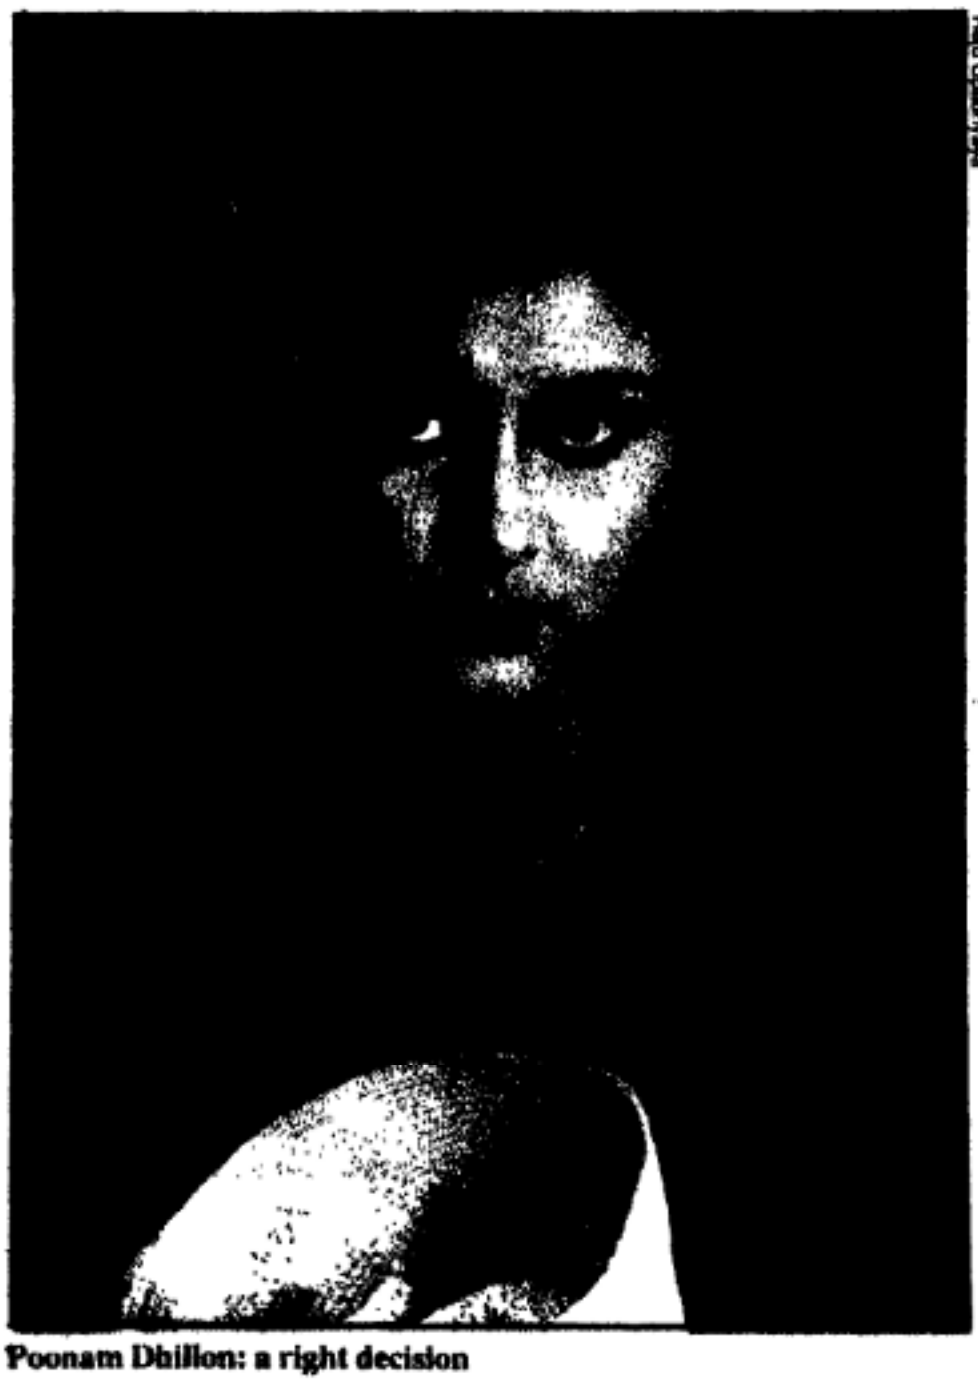
Three days before Arjun was released Dharmendra was a very nervous man. He cancelled all shootings, got drunk and snubbed people at the slightest excuse. "I don't know what is happening to me. Everytime one of my son's films is about to be released, I get such fits," Dharmendra confided to a friend. This time he was more worried because two of Sunny's films had fared badly and a lot depended on Arjun. However, the father was relieved to learn that the audience had shown a favourable response. Dharmendra even celebrated the occasion by throwing a couple of parties.

It took just one photograph to start the love story all over again. Smita Patil wore a Kanjeevaram sari and with a mangalsutra round her neck and sindoor in her maang, she clung on to Raj Babbar and posed for a leading film weekly. After that gossip magazines, friends and enemies took over. Every day the two have been receiving scores of calls wishing them a happy married life.

Poonam Dhillon has at last learnt lessons the bitter way. For years she wasted most of her time in the dreamworld of Ramesh Talwar till one day Ramesh walked out of her life to marry the girl her mother chose. It took quite some time for Poonam to recover but as soon as she did she swore not to get involved with any man in future. Her decision is paying rich dividends as directors and producers are queueing up to sign her.

The last time Padmini Kolhapure went on a holiday abroad she became part of a controversy that was reported in all leading dailies: the actress was linked to a young executive of a leading airline. Just when scribes were resting their pens, Padmini has once again taken a flight to America and Europe. The tinsel city is agog with rumours that she has gone out with her elusive friend from the airline.



Simi: enemies around

Suddenly Simi is back into the limelight not because she has turned director and churned out her first movie, Rukshat starring Mithun Chakraborty, Marc Zuber and Anooradha among others. Insiders in the industry are talking of how Simi had mesmerised her producers with her charm and taken them for a ride. They are sure of the fate of the film but Simi is banking on her ultimate judges: the audience.

With the release of Boxer, good times are back again for Parikshat Sahni. His wife, who had left him with the children when he was going through a crisis, both financially and career-wise, has finally come back to him. Prior to the film's release, Parikshat was in dire straits. Films were not coming his way and consequently there was no money trickling in. He took to drinking to ward off the frustration. Boxer changed all that. His performance in the film was widely appreciated, with the result that more offers started coming his way. The film even changed his lifestyle: he cut down on drinking and started taking his career more seriously. "Loneliness can be like living in hell. I am happy the bad times are over. I am now free to concentrate on my career," says Parikshat.

After a rather long period of absence, Silk Smitha is back to titillate her audiences. Her next Malayalam film awaiting release is CID in which she has been shot in a rare posture: with a lot of clothes on. The producers are waiting with bated breath as to how the audience will react.

Poonam Dhillon: a right decision

DELHI DIARY

Capital Stars

Kamia Malhotra

Bombay's filmworld and Delhi's elite seem to have begun an exchange programme. While film stars from Bombay—Amitabh Bachchan, Sunil Dutt and Vyjyanthimala—have joined Delhi's elite after winning the Lok Sabha elections, the children of Delhi's elite are joining films in a big way. The first to make it to the glamour world was Amrita Singh, the daughter of the Emergency heroine, Ruksana Sultana. Now authoress Uma Vasudev's daughter, Kamia Malhotra, has signed up for Vishwaas, in which she will act along with Shashi Kapoor, Raj Babbar, Smita Patil and Raj Kiran. Kamia has been seen occasionally in the television soap opera, Humlog, in which she plays Kamia, the spoilt, rich girlfriend of Nanhe. Apart from Amrita and Kamia, Asish Chanana, son of former union minister of state for industry (and a Sanjay Gandhi favourite, who has now been dropped), Charanjit Chanana, has joined films. He is acting in Aag aur Shola, which also stars Jeetendra. Things indeed have changed in the capital over the past decade. The first occasion when Delhi's elite interacted with Bombay's filmdom was when Gautam Sarin, son of the distinguished civil servant, Harish Chandra Sarin (presently India's ambassador to Nepal) joined films in the mid-Seventies.

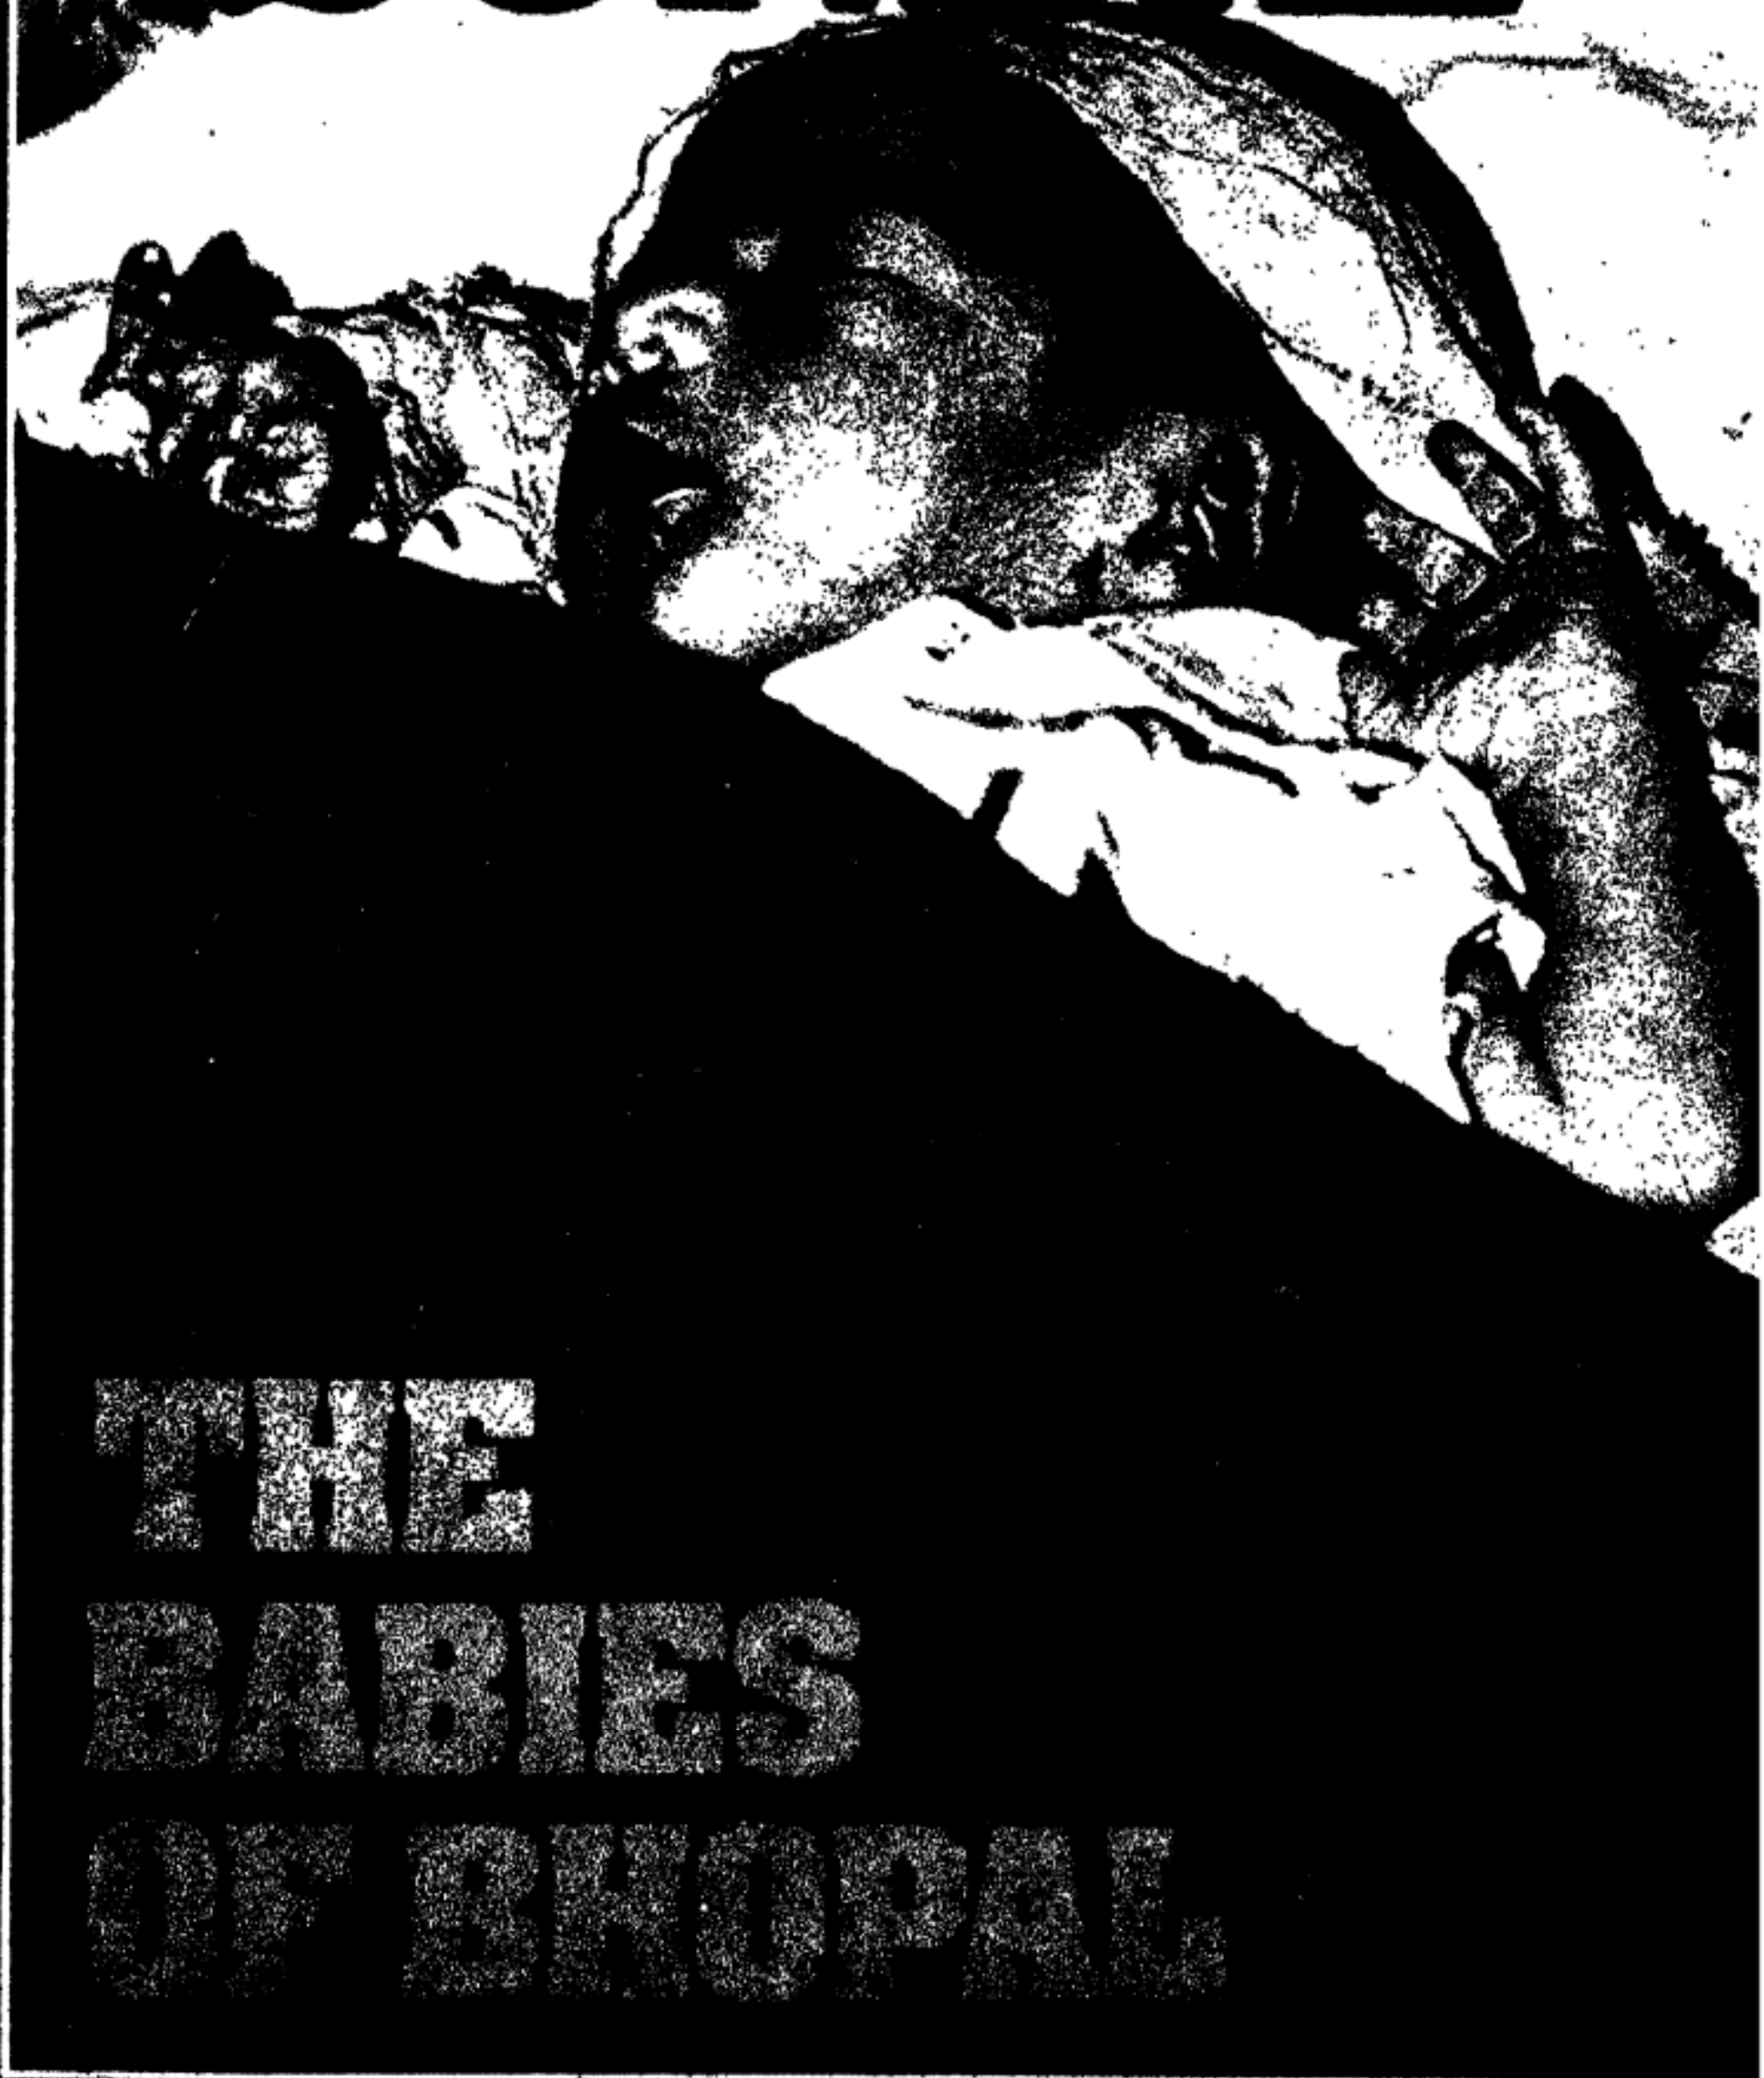
Arun Nehru's Nominee

The Indian Youth Congress National Council has now been freed of ministerial clutches. Till recently, all the young ministers in the centre were members of the council. In the reconstituted body, only Gulam Nabi Azad, by virtue of being a former IYC president has been retained (Azad was the president before Tariq Anwar). While many new faces have been inducted, one name which stands out is that of Ashok Singh of Rae Bareili. Till recently, he was a general secretary of the UP unit. He is the son of Dhunni Singh, a contractor in Rae Bareili, who is known as Arun Nehru's man in the constituency. Arun Nehru is not totally out of favour.

One-time Hero, Now Foe

The opposition has not learnt any lessons from the crushing defeat in the last Lok Sabha polls. Pulling each other down still seems to be the favourite game. A recent example is the length to which the BJP has gone to harass their one-time hero and now deadly foe Dr Subramaniam Swamy. After his defeat at the polls, Dr Swamy accepted a visiting professorship in economics at Harvard University. The BJP vice-president Mr Ram Jethmalani then inspired his son Mahesh and his law junior Mr Jaisinghani to move an application in the Metropolitan Court in Bombay to restrain Dr Swamy from leaving the country. Mr Jethmalani used the argument that a defamation case filed by the former BJP mayor of Bombay, Mr Prabhakar Pai against Dr Swamy in 1982 would be jeopardised if Dr Swamy left the country. Recently the Additional Chief Metropolitan Magistrate, Mr Mahulkar, ruled that no such jeopardy was likely and Dr Swamy has been allowed to go abroad.

The defamation case took a dramatic turn when Dr Swamy (who is conducting his case without lawyers and appearing in person) made Mr Pai admit under cross-examination that although he (Mr Pai) has been practising medicine and dispensing drugs, he did not hold any degree in medicine nor is he registered as a practitioner with the Indian Medical Council as is required under the law. The magistrate then advised Dr Swamy to file a counter case under section 420 of the IPC against Mr Pai if he wanted to pursue the matter. It remains to be seen what Dr Swamy will do when he returns from abroad



Pawar's Power Game

Sharad Pawar's courtship with the Congress(I) has created strange problems. While the Maharashtra chief minister, Vasantdada Patil, has been making critical statements about the state of the party organisation, opposition leaders like George Fernandes of the Janata Party and K. P Unnikrishnan of Sharad Pawar's own party, Indian Congress (Socialist), have been going to the press with statements regarding Pawar's intentions. Unnikrishnan has been categorically denying that his president is leaving the sinking ship. Fernandes, on the other hand, has been making it public that the leader of the Maharashtra Progressive Democratic Front (PDF) of which the Janata Party is a partner has been holding parleys with the ruling party and will soon quit the opposition ranks. Sharad Pawar himself has not made any public statement on this subject so far. The lack of affirmation or denial from him has added to the confusion. Meanwhile, Pawar's associate, Suresh Kalmadi, has of late been seen in the company of important ruling party functionaries. A dinner hosted by Kalmadi in Delhi recently has become the envy of the ruling party circles. The Prime Minister's closest aide, Arun Singh, attended the dinner. He has not been seen in the houses of many ruling party MPs so far. His presence at Kalmadi's dinner, therefore, has raised the latters stock among Delhi's elite. Incidentally, Sharad Pawar was in Delhi the day Kalmadi hosted the dinner. Pawar, however, chose to fly back to Bombay without attending the feast. Was he trying to ward off embarrassing questions about his future

Who can do this better than Novopan?

It's the only prelaminated particle board in the country. Perfectly laminated on both the surfaces.
And just right for your kind of life style.
It is quick to install because it doesn't need planing, cutting and pasting like the old plywood/laminate combinations. And once its up, it stays on for a long long time.
Without warping, delaminating or getting 'wavy'.
So you don't have to bother about maintenance at all!

Novopan can be used just about everywhere. Panelling, partitions, cabinets, furniture, doors... and anywhere else you fancy!
And should that be outdoors, there's phenol bonded Novopan Exterior specially designed for outdoor applications.

Novopan comes in such attractive colours and a range of wood finishes — teak, rosewood, oak...
It is made in convenient sizes and thicknesses to minimise wastage. And best of all it doesn't send your budget sky rocketing.

In fact, Novopan works out far more economical than those one sided plywood/laminate combinations.

Novopan —
Sets off your life style in the best possible way!

'Disciplining' the Press

The Tamil Nadu government is known for its unkindness to the press. Not surprisingly then, the privilege motion against Paul Raj, the editor of the Tamil monthly Vaniga Ottrumai (Business Unity), was revived in the new Assembly, and without initiating fresh proceedings the editor was sentenced to two weeks' imprisonment. To add insult to injury, the state's finance minister and leader of the House, V.R. Nedunchezhiyan, said that the punishment awarded to Raj should be a lesson for other newspapers and journals.

This smacks of vindictiveness because the privilege alleged to have been breached was of a particular House and should have ended with the Assembly's dissolution. Besides, the second Press Commission has stated that a "limitation of one year should be prescribed for taking cognizance of publication of offending material in the newspapers on the ground of breach of privilege."

However, it was more disturbing to learn that the case against Paul Raj was resurrected to take "revenge" on Cho Ramaswamy, editor of the Tamil satirical fortnightly, Tughlak, against whom two privilege motions are pending before the Privileges Committee of the Assembly. This was revealed by the Speaker of the Assembly, P.H. Pandian, to his long-time friend Paul Raj. A call to Cho confirmed the disclosure. Cho also asserted that the state government had given an indirect warning that his writings were "too dangerous" to be allowed.

In the hands of the government the privilege motion seems to have become an effective tool for punishing bold writers and editors.

When Arun Shourie wrote under the caption, "Pretty little lies in Parliament" in Indian Express, H. R. Hidayatullah, the then Rajya Sabha chairman, observed: "The newspapers are the eyes and ears of the public and if every citizen has a right to criticise the actions of others, so also the newspapers whose profession is to turn the light of publicity on the irregularities of public actions." The 1966-67 British House of Commons Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege states specifically that penal jurisdiction should be exercised "sparingly" and "the power to commit for contempt should not be used as a deterrent against a person."

Imprisonment for breach of privilege or contempt of the House is very rare. For instance, in Goa, Daman and Diu, when a newspaper editor was sentenced to imprisonment and refused to express any regret the committee of privileges recommended that it would be sufficient to admonish the editor. In fact, "reprimand," "admonition" or cancellation of press cards are the usual modes of punishment. In a well-known case the editor of Blitz was summoned to the bar of the House and reprimanded. The Committee had even suggested a lighter punishment like cancellation of the correspondent's Lok Sabha press gallery card and Central Hall pass.

It is the responsibility of the press to inform the public about the decisions of the government, debates held in Parliament and Assembly or the statements of ministers and other members. Already on many occasions the press, heeding the requests of the Speakers in Parliament and Assemblies, has abstained from publishing certain remarks of various members. Even this is a denial of the people's right to know what their elected representatives say. But when members behave in an obscene manner, as has happened in the Tamil Nadu Assembly, is the press to be blamed for reporting it?

In fact, to prove a breach of privilege against a newspaper, malice has to be proved. In 1958, Jagran of Indore was hauled up for breach of privilege for criticising the conduct of a member of the Madhya Pradesh Assembly. The privileges committee ruled against it saying that the editorial in question did not contain "any false statement deliberately made or any words indicating malice of the writer."

The Tamil Nadu government is bent on taking "revenge" on Cho, it is not a question of what he has written but one of disciplining him. There is no clear dichotomy between legislative privileges and freedom of the press. But when the party in power tries to use a privilege motion to pick on independent writers, the democratic structure is indeed in danger.

Legislative privilege exists to help the House conduct its business and maintain its authority. But in a democracy, as was revealed in the case against Ramoji Rao, editor of Eenadu, freedom of the press is extremely vital; it cannot be tampered with in the name of privileges, which, in any case, should have been codified by now for pressmen.

Freedom of press, pronounced in a Supreme Court judgement, is the Ark of the Covenant of Democracy because public criticism is essential for the working of its institutions. The role of dissent has become more vital now to counter official propaganda. Cho's case is a challenge to the press and should be taken up with as much zest as the Bihar Press Bill which was ultimately withdrawn. If left unchallenged, the privilege motions might become a convenient weapon with which to muzzle the press.

Not only the press, but anyone who dissents runs a risk. It is a frightening thought that if chief ministers like M. G. Ramachandran were to have their way, the child who sees the Emperor wearing no clothes and says so may be served with a breach of privilege.

In a democracy, freedom of the press is extremely vital; it cannot be tampered with in the name of privileges, which in any case, should have been codified by now for pressmen.

A Flight to Death

The solemn mood of Sudden Death (7—13 July) still haunts me. Callous terrorism has resulted in the tragic death of 329 innocent passengers and crew. While investigations are still underway I have no doubts that the disaster was caused by a bomb explosion on board since the possibility of structural defects and engine failure is very remote. I was shocked to learn that the United States permits schools, like the one run by Frank Camper, which train terrorists to thrive on its soil. As Shubhabrata Bhattacharya points out, the Kanishka crash should serve as an eye-opener to the US government.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• The world was shocked at the disaster. So many innocent lives were sacrificed for the cause of terrorism. It seems that human life has no value. Why should we become the prey of terrorist activities?
Ingana Paul, Durgapur (West Bengal)

• I was moved to go through the report of Ashis Ray. Apparently the cause of the crash had been a bomb explosion but I failed to understand as to how the aircraft managed to take off with a bomb in its cargo hold. It merely proves that security arrangements at Toronto and Montreal had not been adequate, whatever the concerned authorities might say. Steps should be taken to ensure that no such tragedies occur in future.
Kaushik Sarkar, Calcutta

• It is paradoxical that the US government allows institutions that train terrorists to operate while at the same time cries hoarse over terrorist activities in Nicaragua and Cuba. It would not be unjust to blame the US administration for the tragedy in which hundreds of our countrymen were brutally killed.
Monilal Ghosh, Calcutta

• Most of the experts, investigating the Kanishka crash are of the opinion that there was a powerful explosive hidden in the aircraft's luggage hold. The terrorists trained by Frank Camper played an active part in the sabotage. The US government should ban this type of schools to put an end to international terrorism.
Sanjib Barua, Buxarah (West Bengal)

• Now that the black box and the cockpit voice recorder have been recovered, the reason behind the crash of Air India's flight 182 can be found out. Whatever be the revelations I have one question: Why was the aircraft allowed to leave even when the sniffer dogs "went beserk" at the Toronto airport?
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan (West Bengal)

• The report made painful reading. The tragedy was caused by people bent on destroying India's unity.
Amit Sharangi, Rohini (West Bengal)

• Everyone in India and abroad mourns the disaster. People are filled with hatred towards the dastardly acts of the terrorists. The extremists are fighting the government but a lot of innocent lives are being sacrificed in the process. It is due to the inefficiency of security forces that the terrorists succeed in spelling terror.
Malay Kumar Nandi, Calcutta

Once is Enough

Corruption reigned supreme during the Emergency (Never Again, 23-29 June). Politicians, policemen and government officials minted money. None dared to raise their voice against the culprits. Considering the agony suffered by millions of innocent people during the Emergency, the defeat of Indira Gandhi in the 1977 elections was inevitable.
D. Balakrishna, Tumkur

• The cover story should serve as an eye-opener to those who think that an Emergency is the only antidote to the ills plaguing the country.
Chandra, Madras

• Poverty cannot be fought by evicting the poor from the slums. I was surprised to learn that Khushwant Singh supported the slum-clearance drive of Sanjay Gandhi during the Emergency.
Rakesh Arakere, Pali Marwar (Rajasthan)

• I was not convinced by the arguments put forward by Khushwant Singh in support of the Emergency. Mr Singh often condemns violence and the use of coercion but his support of the coercive methods employed by Sanjay Gandhi was unequivocal. A government which requires an Emergency to enforce law and order must be thoroughly inefficient. Mr Singh's contention that he did not support press censorship although he supported Emergency does not sound convincing. He should bear in mind that the Emergency was clamped with the sole purpose of propping an unpopular government.
Sugato Lahiry, Muzaffarpur (Bihar)

• Shrikant Varma justified the declaration of the Emergency, in A Lesson Forgotten, with the argument that the opposition parties had created an atmosphere where the imposition had become inevitable. But the truth is that the 1974 stir was not originated by the opposition parties. The misrule of the Congress government evoked the anger of the people. The nation's economy was in a shambles. Corruption had become the rule of the day. Thus the people revolted. The government resorted to coercive methods to suppress the people. The final blow to Indira Gandhi came in the form of the Allahabad High Court verdict. Jayaprakash Narain became the prime target of the government because he not only provided leadership to the movement but also gave voice to the people's simmering discontent. But Mr Varma, always busy framing charges against the opposition, refused to admit these facts. Obviously, he himself has forgotten the lesson the people taught his party in the 1977 general elections.
A. Ramachandran, Jamshedpur

Not Innocent

The investigative report on the release of Adil Shahryar (The Case of the VIP's Son, 30 June—6 July) was excellent. Although Rajiv Gandhi returned home from the US without any concrete achievement, he succeeded in releasing Adil, son of Mohammed Yunus, a trusted lieutenant of Nehru-Gandhi family. In view of the number of charges against him, Adil cannot be innocent.
M. Srinivasa, Sambalpur

Down with Terrorism

I was shocked by the unfortunate tragedy that struck Air India. International terrorism is on the rise since a number of foreign governments openly support extremism.
Niraj Kumar, Patna

Humane Convict

I was filled with wonder to read the news item Donor from Death Row (23—29 June). Shashikant Parmar has proved that all condemned prisoners are not brutal. Rishikumar Mittal, the receiver of the kidney, has rightly stated that Paramar is an 'angel' to him. Sadvichar Parivar of Ahmedabad should be lauded for its efforts to reform the prisoners. I would also like to congratulate Haribhai Panchal and his organisation for initiating reformatory activities among the prisoners.
Gopalbandhu Dash, Tomaka (Orissa)

Man of Guts

Sunday has done justice to R. Gundu Rao by publishing his interview (I was Among the Nearest and Dearest to Mrs Gandhi, 23—29 June). Mr Rao is a man of guts and he is committed to his work. As he has said in his interview, he was very near to Mrs Gandhi.
Anil Dubey, Bijapur

Promoting a Party

The Television Games (30 June—6 July) rightly pointed out that the national network is being utilised to project the good image of the Congress(I). The way a number of sponsored programmes are being dropped is unjustified. Moreover, it is common knowledge that Doordarshan authorities illtreat their sponsors. Doordarshan should grow up as a neutral body.
K. Ravichandran, Ahmedabad

• The report was timely and well-researched. The Doordarshan authorities have become highly irresponsible and whimsical in their attitude. Chitrahaar, for instance, never commences on time. Two particular songs, apparently promoting the cause of national integration, are being telecast regularly. Dull and boring films are shown while the foreign lively TV serials are getting a step-motherly treatment One still cannot fathom the reason for discontinuing Different Strokes.
Arvinder Singh Walia, Calcutta

Money from Skeletons

Feeding on the Dead (30 June—3 July) portrayed Indians in a poor light. The sale of pilfered skeletons abroad fetches astronomical sums with the result that many medical colleges are finding it difficult to carry out their day-to-day work. The government should regulate the export of skeletons.
Jayan R, Itanagar

•Ritu Sarin's article contains facts which need clarification. The name of the pioneer of the skeleton business is not Satyanarayan Sen but Sanker Narayan Sen, who is my father. Reknas Limited was a public limited company and he was the managing director and not the proprietor as stated. But it is true, that the shareholders and the directors decided to wind up the business due to unhealthy competition. Reknas Ltd. never compromised on the quality and craftsmanship of the specimens as they were intended purely for medical studies. The business, started by my father in 1937, was neither a 'secretive' nor a 'sordid' affair. His shop was actually a workshop over 20,000 sq. feet in area, employing at least 75 Bengali youths who were taught how to treat and prepare skeletons. These skeletons were used for medical and biological studies all over the world. My father has been honoured several times by medical universities abroad for his craftsmanship. Finally, my father was never in the book publishing business and has definitely not been 'forced to revert to it.'
Diti Sen, Calcutta

Reckless Carbide

The Catastrophe on Screen (16—22 June) pointed out the defects in the safety devices at Bhopal's Union Carbide plant, as revealed by a London TV report. The references to "bad engineering, reckless cost-cutting and a disregard for people's lives" bear ample testimony to the fact that the safety aspect was utterly neglected. Ian Swift suggested that the "three stage safety system in Bhopal was inadequate".

Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan (West Bengal)

We regret that as Khushwant Singh is out of the country it has not been possible to publish his column, Gossip Sweet and Sour, in this issue—Editor.

THE BABIES OF BHOPAL

The nightmare continues. Even seven months after the killer MIC gas leaked out of a tank at Union Carbide's Bhopal plant, its victims continue to suffer and die—or be born dead. Out of every three children born to women who were pregnant on the night of the disaster, finds Ritu Sarin, only one survives. Many are born deformed. And nobody knows if the trauma will end with this generation, or the next.

Left: the twins both called 'Guddu,' who died within a couple of days of being born and right, Rani, a five-day-old victim of the gas leak

A child is born. It is past midnight inside the dank labour room of the Sultania Janana Hospital, Bhopal. Three attendants wash the tiny infant and routinely hold him up to give his mother her first glimpse. "Tumhara ladka paida hua hai (you have given birth to a son)," says one nurse as she pats the child to make him cry. There is no response. In the dim light the skin of the child looks macerated and bluish. Within minutes, a senior doctor is called in. He looks down at the curled figure, asks for the mother's medical record and scrawls in the column for details of the birth: "Stillborn boy weighing four pounds, born to mother." Then he rushes out to the maternity ward to attend to another patient about to deliver. Outside, there is silence as the father looks expectantly at the white-clothed figures washing hands in the waiting room. Then comes the sound of weeping from beyond the green curtains of the labour room. "Yeh bhi gas kand ka baccha paida hua hai (Here is another child of the gas tragedy)," says the nurse as she shows the father the shrivelled face of his newborn

The dead child is the unnamed victim of the holocaust of 3 December in Bhopal when 40 tonnes of lethal gas spewed out of the Union Carbide factory. More than 200 days after the accident, the death toll from the world's worst industrial disaster continues to rise. While official figures are static at 2,500 killed, others estimate that over 15,000 lives were lost because of the 30-minute release of toxic gas into the atmosphere. Whatever the count of victims, Bhopal became the scene of an unimaginable calamity, an incomparable tragedy. The tragedy of entire families being wiped out because the air they breathed that night was laden with choking death, the tragedy of sleeping children who woke up to find themselves orphaned by whiffs of an unknown killer, the tragedy of hundreds of those who could not identify their loved ones among the heap of corpses and simply lost them forever in the death and destruction of that black night. It was, and still is, the tragedy of the thousands who survived the nightmare only to face years of physical disabilities. But the tragedy which is manifesting itself today and which threatens to be the cruel fallout of the Bhopal disaster—the tragedy of a mother who knows she may give birth to a dead or deformed child; a Carbide child whose fate was sealed inside its mother's womb.

Once the deleterious effects of methyl isocyanate exposure were known to have caused serious respiratory, pulmonary and neurological defects, hesitant questions were asked if the grim aftereffects of the exposure would be felt on the progeny of the victims as well. At the time of the disaster there were more than 3,000 pregnant women living in the areas which were declared "gas-affected." What would be the implications for the future generations if teratogenic (damaging to foetuses) and mutagenic (causing genetic changes) effects were discovered in children born to these women? Unfortunately, no awareness was created by the state authorities about the dangers of childbirth even after the effects of MIC exposure on the reproductive system were obvious. Many women complained of abnormalities in menstrual flow, polynorrhoea and suppression of lactation. These complaints were attributed only to the "severe stress and strain" on the female population of Bhopal. Even when in the month of December itself a high rate of infant mortality was recorded in affected areas of old Bhopal and some deformities were noticed among children born to mothers in their third trimester (third month of pregnancy) at the time of the exposure, mere neonatal surveillance recommended by gynaecological experts. The effects of the gas on childbirth would only be apparent among children born after July to mothers who were in their first trimester on 3 December, they said.

Gopal Jain

A prematurely born child which died ten hours after birth

It is now July. The foulness of death and disorder pervades the Sultania Janana Hospital, the largest maternity hospital close to the affected areas, where over 20 children are born every day. The expectant mothers who have been gas affected are suffering from acute abdominal pain, vaginal discharge besides respiratory and other complications. The three maternity wards are full; women lie in corridors and passages and often share beds. In one bed of the maternity ward two affected women who had just delivered were seen sleeping. Shanti Bai and Basanti Bai are sisters. Both were in the initial stages of pregnancy when they fled their homes in Chola Mandi, close to the Union Carbide factory, with thousands of others to escape the death blowing with the wind. One sister described how during that horrific night, she stumbled over dead bodies as she ran, and finally collapsed to find herself in hospital the next morning. After that, she had to be admitted to the same Sultania Janana hospital twice during her pregnancy. Nobody had advised her about the possible effect of the gas on the child she was carrying, about the chance of an unnatural child being born to her.

Gopal Jain

Children with pulmonary and respiratory problems at the MIC ward in Hamidia Hospital

Now both the cribs on either side of the bed shared by the two sisters are vacant. The children died within three days of each other. A daughter was born to Shanti Bai who lived for only four hours. How did she know it was the gas that killed her child? As Shanti Bai sobbed uncontrollably, grieving the loss of her dead child, the nurse says the child was "eaten by the MIC," as is the case with many of those born to victims in the ward over the past six months. The baby was underweight, with blackish skin and club feet. No, she does not have her medical records since she had insisted that the doctors should write her child had died of MIC poisoning.' Instead, they confiscated her papers and issued her discharge slip immediately.

There was more trauma for the unfortunate mother, even after the sorrow of losing her child. Two days later, her sister went into labour. Basanti Bai had completed ten months of pregnancy and when the boy was born it was a barely three-and-a-half pounds. Shanti Bai was rushed in an ambulance to the Hamidia Hospital with the gasping child and put in the intensive care unit in room number 124 there. There are two incubators in the unit for premature or underweight newborns, many born to MIC-affected mothers. Rarely does a child survive at the unit these days. The son of Basanti Bai did not; he was buried at the Chola Road ghat before Basanti Bai could come out of the recovering room of Sultania Hospital. She handed over her medical records (registration number 210/4019 MIC). But again, the cause of death is not stated Kalu Ram, husband of Basanti explains that whenever he wanted that gas poisoning be written on the papers he is clutching, doctors demanded: "Kya tumhe apne mare hue bacche ke liye muawza chahiye? (Do you want compensation for your dead child?)" There can be no compensation for Kalu Ram. But if others are getting Rs 10,000 from the sarkar per person killed by the gas, why should he not get money for his own child which has been killed by the same gas? The doctors will not listen. So he now takes his wife to the collector's office to complain.

There is obvious criminal negligence in this large maternity hospital of Bhopal and other small hospitals where MIC victims are giving birth Both at Sultania Hospital and Hamidia Hospital, watchmen have been posted at the entry gates of maternity wards. Senior doctors have received written instructions from the health department not to discuss MIC cases with any outsider, foreign expert or journalist. Entry into the maternity wards can only be made unobtrusively late at night. And one has to step cautiously into the intensive care unit of Hamidia Hospital, a closely watched chamber of death. Both these places are the focus of serious medical attention and in spite of figures released of a normal rate of congenital malformations and stillbirths, doctors are clearly worried about the high incidence being recorded. Instructions have been pasted outside the labour room at Sultania Hospital for all the placentae of MIC victims to be sent for examination to the Bhopal Medical College, where teratogenic effects of MIC gas are being examined. There are other instructions for the dead children to be taken for post-mortem to the forensic department of the Gandhi Medical College, Bhopal.

While hospital authorities give an "experiments-are-in-progress" reply, attendants and midwives in the hospitals tell the truth about the bizzare observations of childbirth these days. Travelling in the ambulance which carries cord blood samples, placentae and ailing children to Hamidia Hospital, one learns that four to five children are dying every day only at the Sultania Janana Hospital, with more than ten placentae being sent for experiments to the Gandhi Medical College. The register of samples sent for examination shows a sharp increase in the month of July. Said the superintendent of the hospital, Dr (Mrs) Saxena, "While there has been no rise in congenital malformations as yet, we are closely monitoring births to gas victims in the third trimester, for any unusual increase."

There are different versions of whether children being born to MIC victims in Bhopal could indicate disaster epidemiology and reveal congenital malformations that could be scientifically claimed to be a result of the December gas disaster. There are the sorry tales of mothers who have lost their offspring or who are bringing up deformed infants, the shocking accounts given by the junior staff of hospitals, midwives and nurses who insist they have never seen any birth-and-death cycle of this kind before. Against this is the official version of births and deaths and accounts of senior doctors who are under instructions not to talk. There is an attempt to cover up disclosures of the nature of deformities or abnormalities being recorded and an attempt to declare the situation has been normal till date. In spite of the apprehensions being expressed the world over about the likely teratogenic effects on newborn children, no concerted effort has been made to educate pregnant women or inform them about the danger they may face during childbirth. In fact, when some women had approached public hospitals for undergoing medically terminated pregnancies, they were assured normal pregnancies.

On the other hand, some private nursing homes in new Bhopal where expectant women had gone for abortions were saved the sorrows of defective childbirth. Not that unnatural births have not been recorded at any private nursing home and only occurred in hospitals like the Sultania. The Ghoois Nursing Home and Termination of Pregnancy Centre at Karbala Road has recorded a distinct increase in the number of cases of congenital malformations and stillbirths. Said Dr (Mrs) Charanjit Ghoois, who runs the centre and is carefully monitoring all births, "Since December the number of stillbirths have doubled in the cases of women who were exposed to MIC. Spontaneous abortions increased three times among women who were then in their second and third trimester. Some of these children died of asphyxia as foetuses." She showed this reporter photographs of what she calls a "typical malformed foetus" and others of babies born at her clinic who could not live beyond a few hours.

There has been no study of the incidence of neonatal mortality among MIC-affected women delivering in homes, hospitals and nursing homes. The government-sponsored study being conducted by the Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR) is the only scientific examination being conducted of the teratogenic effects of MIC. It has revealed figures of congenital malformations equal to the national average of one to two per cent of all births. The Madhya Pradesh health minister, Balendu Shukla, told the Vidhan Sabha that the ICMR survey would cover 3,000 pregnant women in a population of 88,000 people living in the severely affected areas. Till June, out of the 1,350 newborn babies examined, 16 were found to be physically deformed and there were 60 cases of premature births. The cases of deformities include children suffering from congenital hearts, imperforated arms and impaired eyesight, all of which, Dr Ashwini Sayal, who is working in the ICMR project, explained, could be found in cases of "normal retardation."

Another survey conducted by volunteers of the Friends Medico Circle at the Jayaprakash Nagar, situated opposite the Union Carbide factory, however, revealed an abnormal incidence rate of abortions and premature births. The survey was conducted among 621 families and of the 171 expectant mothers, 94 were pregnant on the fateful day (3 December) and had been receiving treatment for MIC exposure. Out of them, 57 had delivered—34 women had normal babies, 22 had undergone abortions and one premature birth was recorded. Of the children born, one was stillborn and two died immediately after birth. Of the 22 [redacted]en who had abortions, only one had her pregnancy terminated, the rest had aborted spontaneously. A third examination was conducted by the Nagrik Rahat aur Punarvas Committee, a voluntary health organisation. The report presented by the committee concluded that 29 of the 38 patients who were pregnant in December gave a history of first or second trimester abortion.

Now the third trimester births are being anxiously watched for it is in the first three months that the child develops and is most prone to deformity. Though it will be the third trimester births that would be most important to assess the rate of congenital malformations, there is every indication that the situation is graver than the authorities are willing to admit. Therefore, instead of conducting wider medical surveys covering all areas and medical attention being given to newborn children, an attempt is being made to cover up the pathetic plight of these babies. Under the plea of long-term experiments, a separate assessment is being done by the authorities, the results of which may not be known for a long time. By then, hundreds of MIC-exposed mothers will deliver deformed babies.

Of the children who have died, only 47 autopsies have been conducted to examine the cause of death. The results, though closely guarded, are revealing. The autopsy report (Number 1275/MLI/766/85) of a deformed male child born to Saraswati, living in Kenchi Chola, gives the cause of death: "Dead body of child came with a history of gas exposure on the night of 3 December. Death appears to be poisoning as a result of irreparable gases and its complications." The child had been born at the Sultania Hospital, treated later at the Hamidia where it was declared dead.

The autopsies on children born deformed or premature to MIC victims have been conducted under the supervision of Dr Heeresh Chandra, head of the forensic medicine and toxicology department of the Medical College, Bhopal, who had also conducted autopsies on 731 persons killed by MIC till the end of December. Says Dr Chandra: "The results of autopsy on these children give the same picture as the autopsies conducted on the first and second days. There is clotting of the blood and effect of the gas in the liver and lungs, as found in adult victims. It is clear that these children have been severely affected in the embryo stage." He further explained that in some children the cause of death was haemorrhage of the brain and lungs, rare in deaths of newborn children. He added that in the autopsies conducted, a pattern of deformity could be noticed. Many had dilation and liquidisation of the brain cavity, resulting in the softening of the blood tissue which makes it difficult for the child to survive. A similar observation had been reported from other hospitals. The very first child which was called the "freak child of Bhopal" was born at the Vallabhbhai Patel Hospital, Bilaspur. The mother of the child had been present in Bhopal and was living in one of the affected areas when the gas leaked. The child born to her had cavities instead of eyes, a deformed head and scorched skin. Ever since the birth of the deformed child in Bilaspur, there have been many reports in the local press of cases of retarded babies being born to MIC-exposed mothers.

According to Dr Heeresh Chandra, experiments being conducted by the ICMR and other institutions on the placenta and cord blood of children being born will reveal the full ramifications and perpetuating effects on the progeny of the victims. So far, he has found evidence of carbamylation in the cord blood samples which proved that the poison in the gas had affected the child in the womb. There were other autopsies conducted which reveal that serious damage had been done to babies, impairing their faculties. The autopsy conducted on twin boys, both named "Guddu" in the records, provided further evidence. The twins were born in the Bajaria area on 8 March—one of them died within 24 hours of being born and the second boy survived for two-and-a-half days. The examination of the tissue extracted from the limbs of the two children revealed signs of poisoning and their lungs, liver and brain were also badly damaged by the gas.

The continuing calamity of the children of Bhopal is not only the trauma of mothers giving birth to children who die because they are too weak to sustain life, but extends to the children who live on and who will perhaps become the living testimony of the physical horrors and disabilities that ensued after the gas leak. It is estimated that out of every three children born to victims, only one survives. The Madhya Pradesh government is not willing to admit the enormity of the problem but a visit to the room number 123, where infants are receiving treatment, is enough to show that there is something unusual and sinister about the plight of these children. A teacher from Indore, who had brought her two-year-old daughter suffering from meningitis, for treatment at the hospital, described the sad scene in the ward and the intensive care unit next to it. Every day children were dying. Even at that moment, a boy measuring not more than the size of a palm, was lying stiff and silent inside one of the incubators—an innocent lump of flesh and bone, with a blood-stained bandage around its blue-black waist where the umbilical cord had been cut, the precious cord which, instead of giving life and sustenance, had passed on poisonous death. The child was lying unattended. Its father had gone to the Sultania Hospital to fetch its mother Both parents, the junior doctor on duty explained, had been affected by the "killer gas."

While the incidence of stillbirths and deformities is stated to be "few and normal," could it be a coincidence that when one tries to locate the house of a deformed child in Jayaprakash Nagar which is listed in the ICMR survey report and one reaches a wrong address, you discover that a child had died immediately after birth there too? Jayaprakash Nagar, one of the worst affected localities, and its residents have barely recovered from the loss of life and cattle. Their situation was aggravated by the pathetic compensation being given to them. A short distance away is Nechli Chola, Dwarka Nagar, where there were relatively few deaths. There have likewise not been many cases of unnatural births to exposed mothers here. There is, however, Saraswati Bai, wife of Hari Ram, a Union Carbide assistant operator, who gave birth to twins on 14 January. Two of her healthier children stand by her side as she describes her suffering after the gas leak and the painful circumstances in which she delivered twins after a difficult labour. The girl born to her died but the son survived. The medical records of Sultania Hospital (registration number 180/80) state the cause of death as "cardiorespiratory arrest." Saraswati Bai is now worried about the health of her pallid seven-month old son. Since birth, he has already been admitted to the hospital twice for respiratory complications—the child has "MIC lungs" and could suffer from serious ailments throughout life.

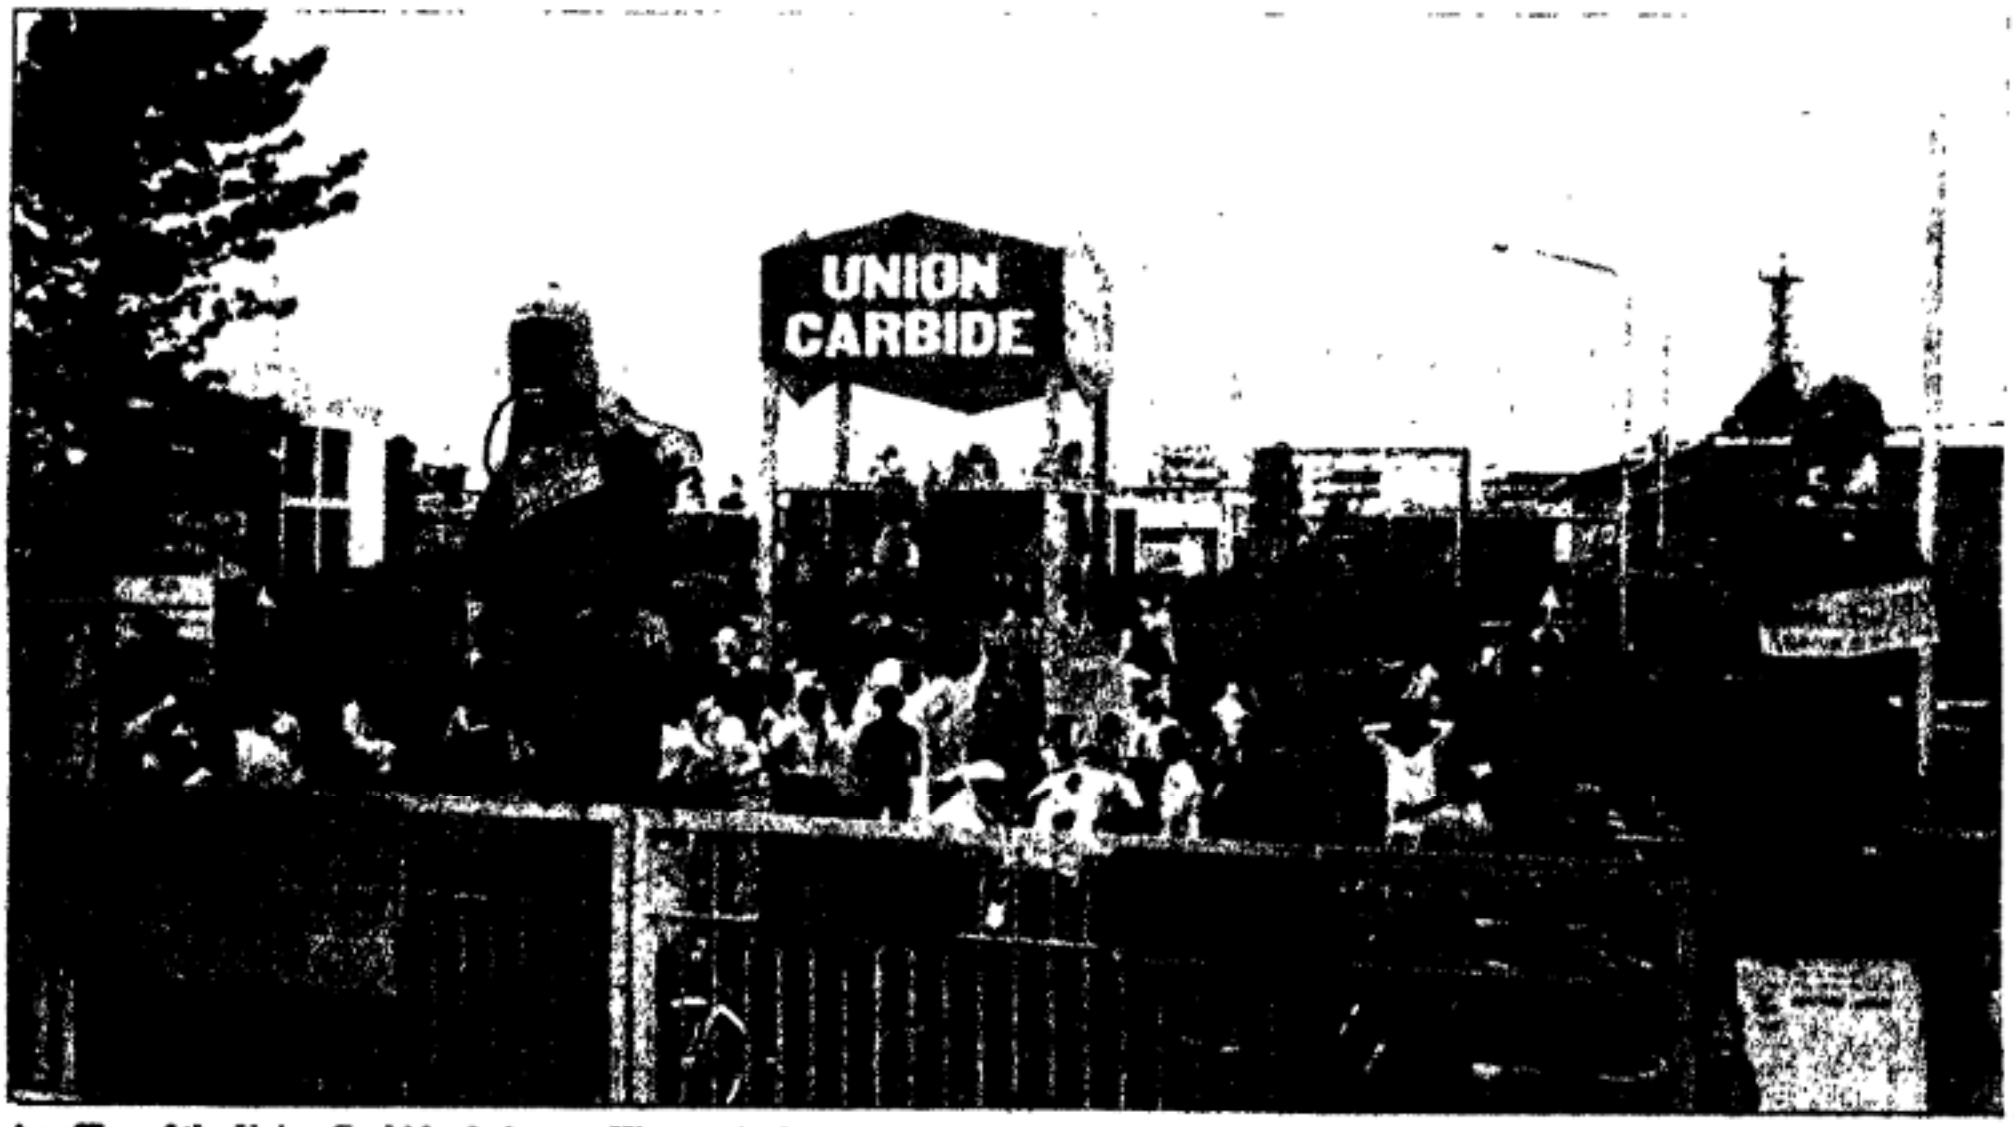
It is only when such children walk, talk and play that the large scale medical effects that still persist in the progeny of the victims would be known. As it is, young children who were themselves exposed to the gas are reported to have developed complications in the summer months. There is an outbreak of jaundice and repeated complaints of children developing boils and blisters all over the body. The general health of the thousands who are being treated symptomatically and the lucky few who are getting the sodium thiosulphate antidote injections (which is in short supply), are deteriorating, and several experts have already declared that exposure to the gas weakened the victims' resistance to disease. With fresh complications, the months of August and September would be most crucial in assessing the state of recovery of the victims. More so because during these months, (approximately) 700 pregnant women who were most susceptible to the influence of the gas in their early stage of pregnancy, would be delivering their babies. Even the authorities have admitted that in the month of July there has been a marked increase in cases of stillbirths, abortions and deformities. Dr Ishwar Das, relief commissioner for the gas tragedy, admitted that the birth of children is being observed with great caution. "We are fearing that if the plight of these newborn babies is extremely serious at present, an ugly situation could develop," he said.

Worse dangers lie ahead: there could be more cases of congenital malformations and infant mortality in Bhopal. Examinations conducted by genetic experts on new-born babies, have concluded that the tragedy would affect not only those children but several forthcoming generations too. These fears have not been scientifically proved and it is possible that the disaster witnessed in Bhopal today might be checked by the first generation deformation. Only the results of tests and experiments on the bodies of the infants who are no more and the close observation of others who are yet to be born, perhaps crippled and impaired, will reveal the fallout on the babies of Bhopal.

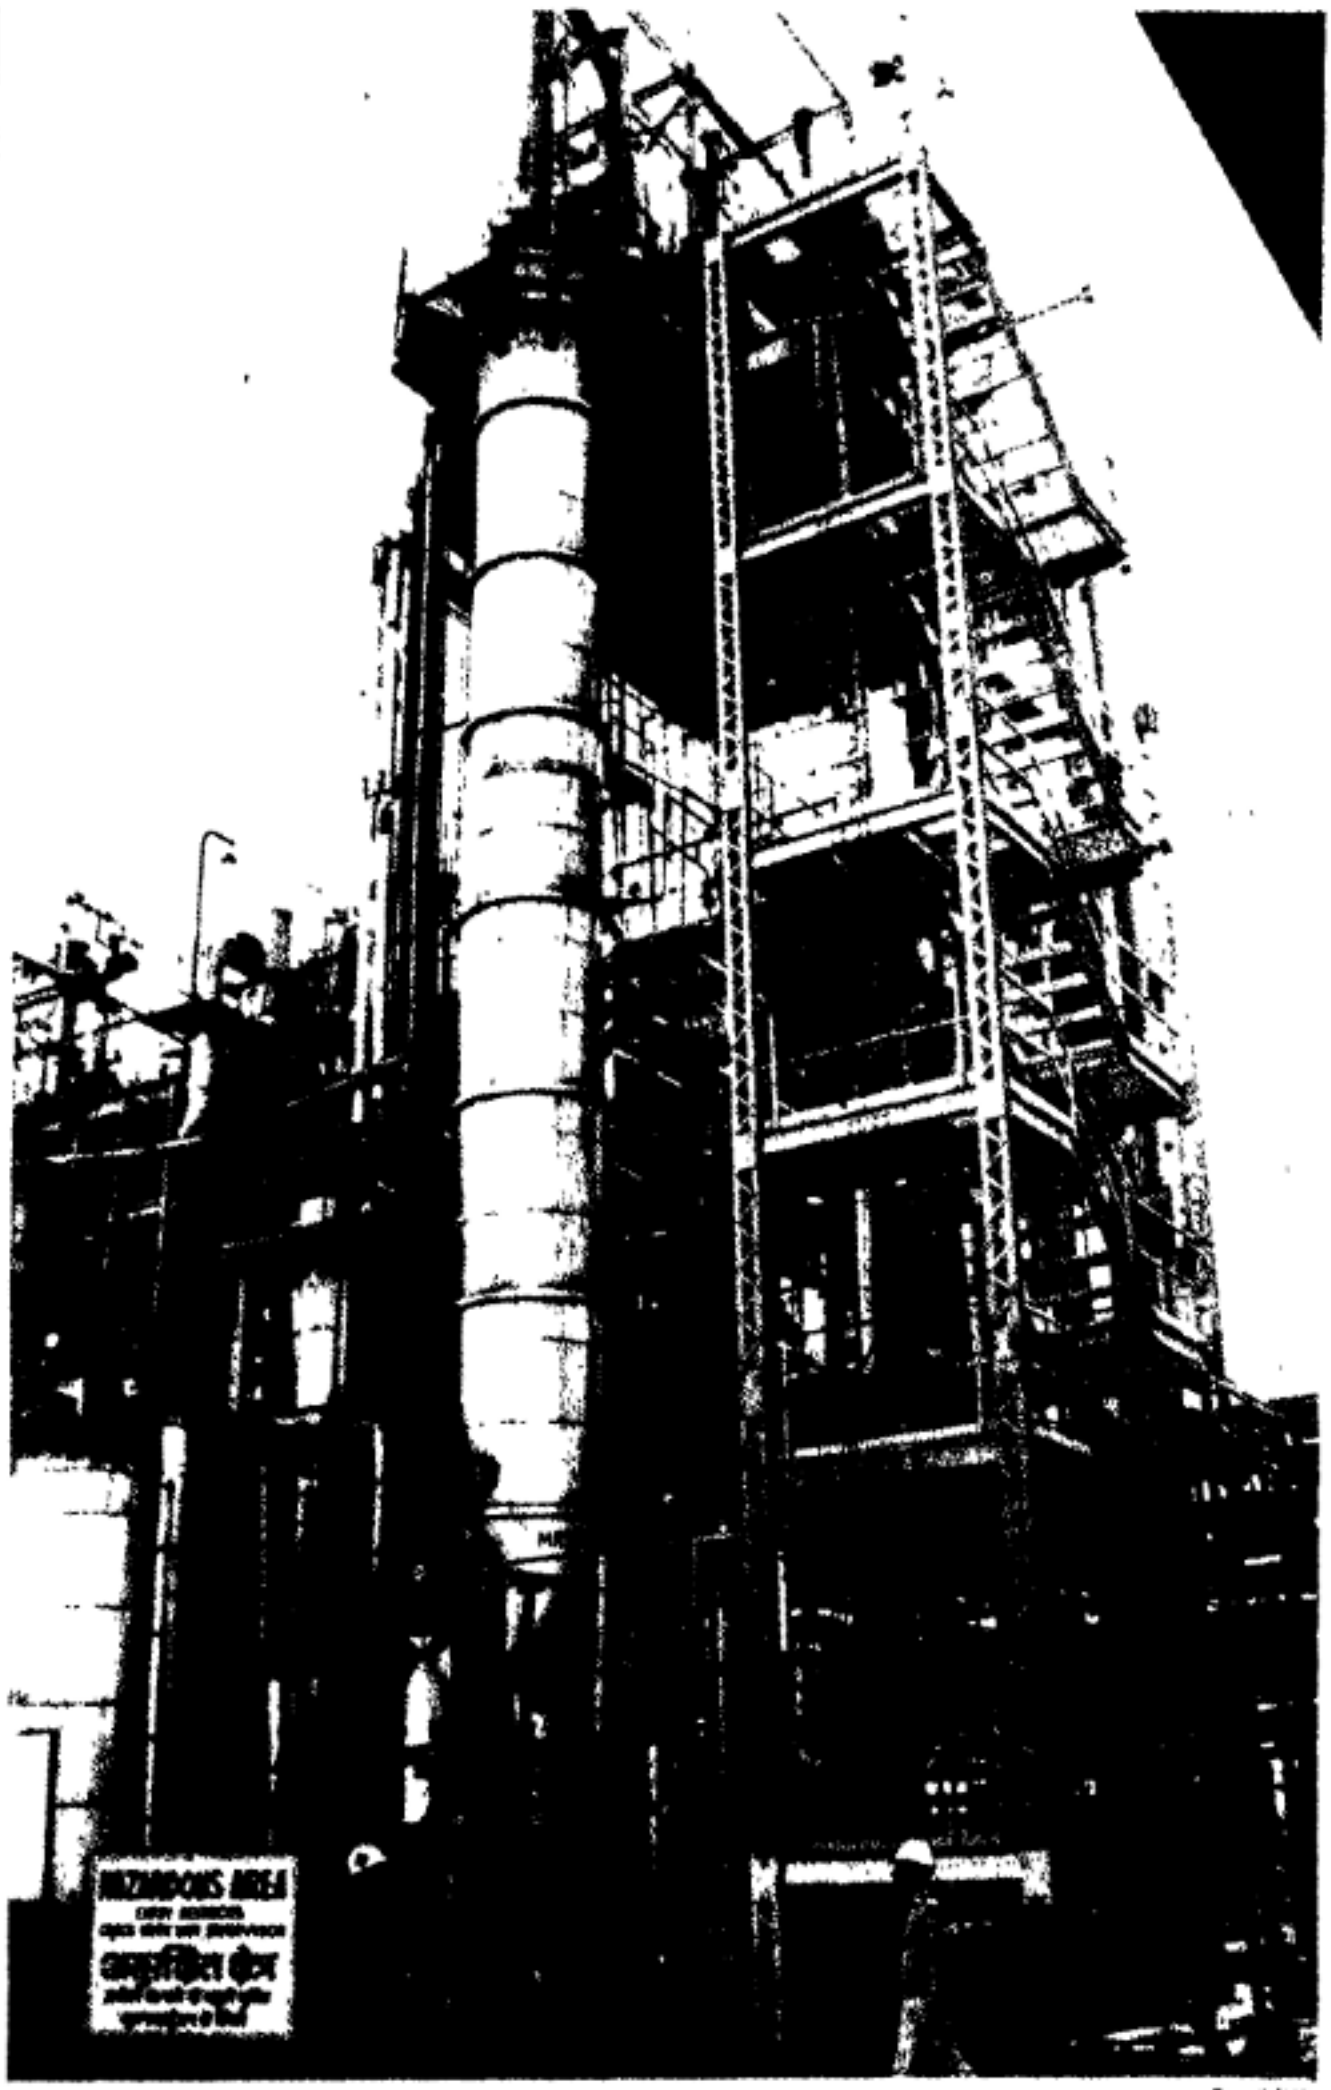


Inside the Poison Gas Plant

Chemicals lying in the compound still pose a danger to the environment

"Safety is everybody's business," read the laminated red-and-yellow stickers pasted outside the offices of senior managers who once manned the Rs 40-crore agricultural products division (APD) of Union Carbide India Limited (UCIL) in Bhopal. What a quirk of fate that the six bosses of this largest Indian private sector pesticide company should now be the prime accused, charged with criminal negligence that led to the death of 2,500 innocent people. Among the most qualified technical personnel in the pesticide industry are all wanted men out on bail. They have been reduced to mere ordinaries who seek permission before stepping into the forbidding iron-and-chemical jungle that is the Union Carbide plant. Even Warren Anderson, the chairman of the parent American multinational, Union Carbide Corporation (UCC) was not spared the wrath of the displaced workers and the agitating victims. The key figure of the American company which had a 50.9 per cent equity shareholding in the Indian subsidiary and the man who ruled the empire which netted sales of 9.5 billion dollars last year has found a place among the effigies put up outside the imposing gates of the plant. "Jeena hai to marna seekho (learn to die if you want to live)," reads the placard hung around the neck of the dummy of Warren Anderson. The chairman cuts a sorry figure in his place at the centrestage of the parade of effigies, dressed as he is in grey dungarees, a hard plastic hat, safety goggles, gum boots and a fake walkie talkie set tucked under his belt.

How the Union Carbide workers pilfered the working outfit and safety accessories with which they dressed Anderson and company is anybody's guess. The plant is at present under siege by employees since 10 July when their services were terminated by a court order. Trade union leaders of the closed pesticide plant sit in dharna at the security guard room, others roam the city in three-wheeler scooters fitted with loudspeakers which blare throughout the day demanding their employment and rehabilitation. The workers are free to walk inside the production and administration blocks of the plant and have remained unrestricted in spite of complaints being registered with the authorities about the Union Carbide workers removing machinery parts, electrical fittings and motor spares from inside the plant. Even after the callousness of the workers and senior officials in allowing the MIC unit to function without its safety prequisites has been exposed, there is further evidence of carelessness of the Madhya Pradesh government and its policing agencies in not guarding the Union Carbide premises.



It is only the ill-fated MIC unit inside the plant that is unapproachable to the workers and striking union leaders. This part of the plant is under the protection of a team of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI) which landed in Bhopal within hours of the leak to investigate its cause. A visit to the MIC plant shows that the production unit which was once the scene of frantic activity, is now a wasteland of nuts and bolts. Six months have passed since production in the unit was banned. Now the MIC enclosure marked "hazardous area" is thick with tall weeds that speak of the inactivity and inertia that set in since the chemical reaction was triggered off from inside somewhere in the 110-foot tall structure, connected to the underground MIC tank area. The carefully maintained rose garden close to the MIC plant which was the pride of Union Carbide for its beautiful blooms has been ruined by the gallons of toxic substances emptied out of containers and tanks. Even the rose plants, it is said, have been dug out by the workers, who seem to be stealing anything of any value from the premises.

Who would be responsible for any security lapse which may occur inside the plant again, vulnerable as it is to disaster? What is shocking is that in spite of announcements that there is no dangerous toxic substance present in the plant now, an inventory demanded by the CBI revealed that there are more than 1100 tonnes of material which the UCIL listed as "toxic/hazardous/flammable." The CBI investigators, themselves are at a loss, about the nature of the toxic substances stored in the plant—carbon monoxide, phosgene, methyl isocynate and Sevin units—demanded this list two months ago. A comparison of the inventory of dangerous substances stored inside the UCIL plant on 20 June and 25 July showed that there had been negligible disposal done by the company. Among the materials stored till July, CBI sources pointed out that some are extremely hazardous if consumed, inflamed or chemically reacted. These include chlorosulphonic acid (20 tonnes), carbon tetrachloride (2.0 tonnes), stored in bulk, aldicarboxime (3.0 tonnes), orthodichlorobenzene (35.9 tonnes), naphthol (9.4 tonnes), BHC (69.0 tonnes) and methylene chloride (2.0 tonnes) stored in bulk in drums and small containers. There are other toxic substances in the processing systems which have not yet been cleaned. They include thermax (12 tonnes), carbon tetrachloride (74 tonnes), sevin carbaryl (5.0 tonnes) and methylene chloride (1.3 tonnes) the most dangerous in the two-month inventory list is 20 metric tonnes of chloroform still inside the processing systems of the plant. In the first month the chloroform is stated to be "dissolved with MIC etc." In the next month's inventory, the other substances mixed with the chloroform including the MIC have disappeared while the quantity of chloroform remains the same at 20 tonnes. In trying to hide the fact of the presence of the dreaded MIC gas from the CBI, Union Carbide officials have been caught lying.

A view of the structural area of the MIC plant

Gopal Jain

Union Carbide officials are divided in their opinion on the dangers of the large quantities of toxic material inside the plant when the entire complex has been left unguarded and is open to a mishap or mischief. The assistant works manager of the plant, R. Chowdhury, one of the accused in the CBI case, is confident that there is not a drop of toxic material inside: "There is nothing in the plant that can cause harm. We have cleared it up," he declared. On the other hand the resident doctor of the Union Carbide plant, Dr Arya Lohya expressed grave doubts about the security lapses that are going unchecked and which could well result in another unprecedented accident. Said he:

The Burden of Bhopal

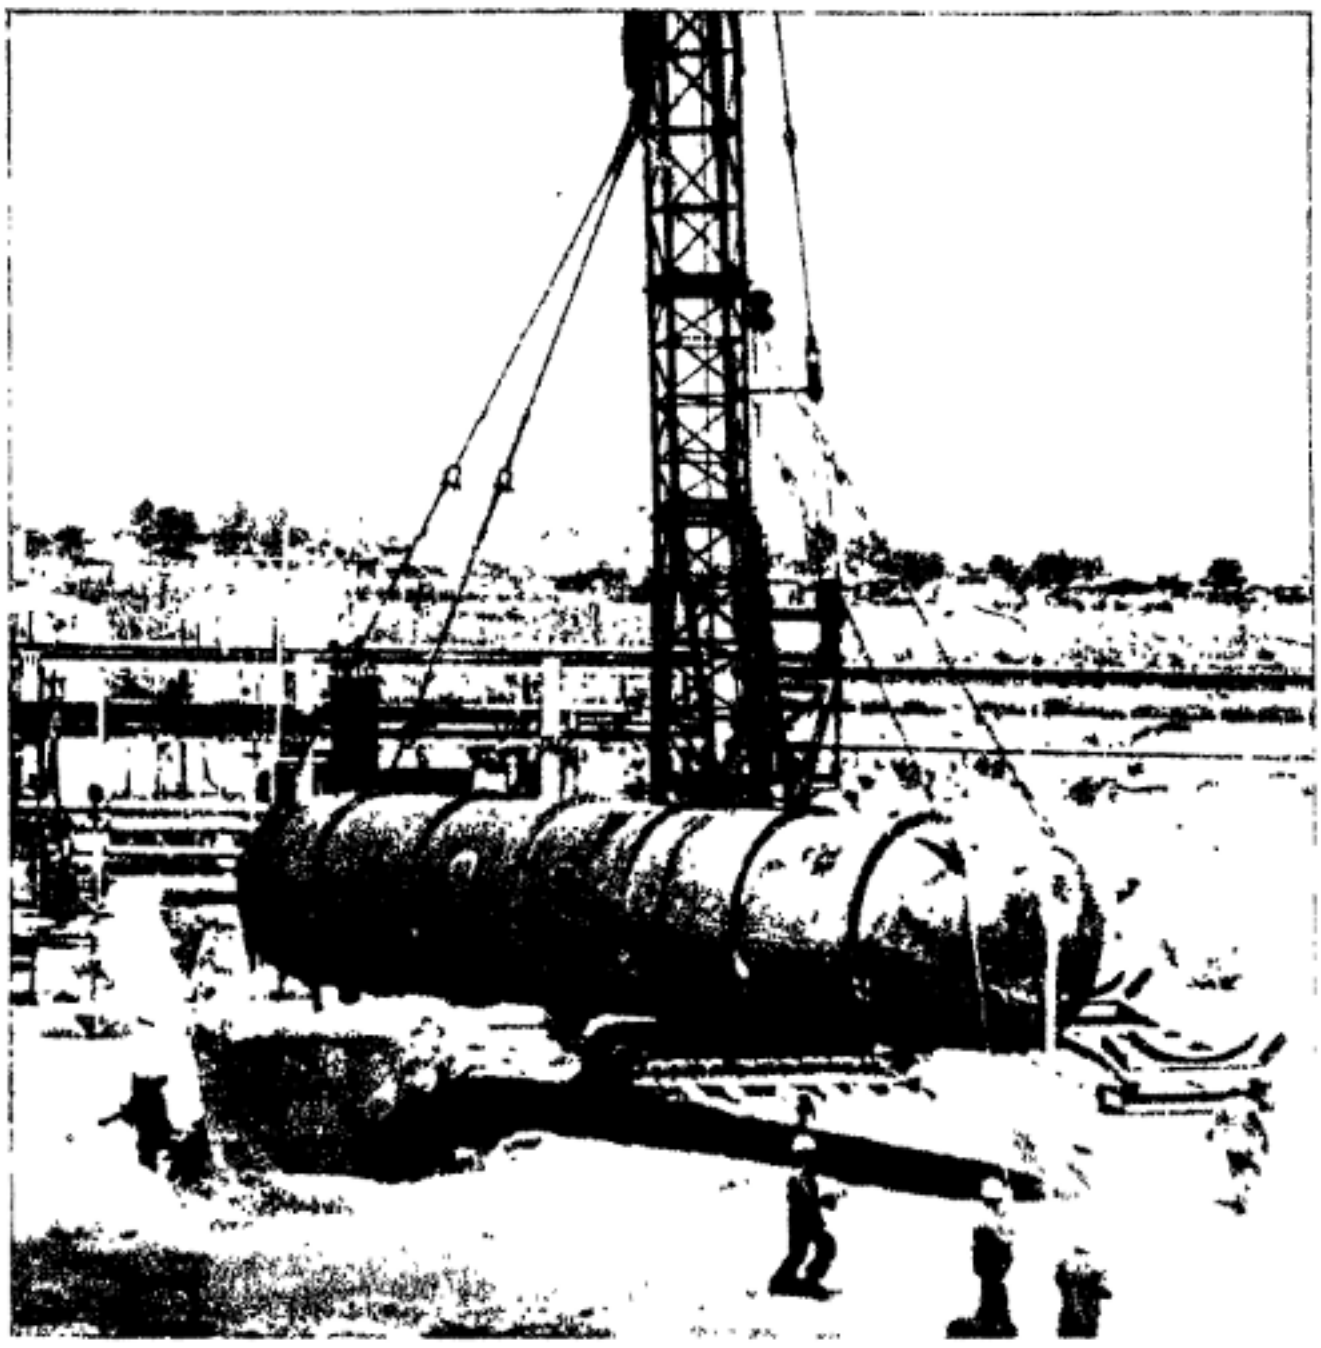
Who will compensate the victims of Bhopal who have given birth to deformed children or who have lost their progeny to the continuing effects of MIC inhalation? The unfortunate parents face an excruciating, lifelong dilemma. Some of the children whose growth is being carefully watched by specialists in Bhopal have severe mental and physical handicaps which may impair their growth forever.

A plea for euthanasia of birth-defective children in Bhopal has been made by some experts who fear that these children, suffering from congenital malformations, would be an unbearable burden to their parents—most of whom are among the poorest in the city. These ill-fated children would also pose an insurmountable problem for the state which would not be able to control the effect of such births on future generations. The state government is at present blissfully oblivious of the larger consequences of these births.

The authorities are not even sure whether the parents of children who were born to exposed mothers or children who did not survive beyond a few days should receive monetary compensation or not. According to Dr Ishwar Das, who is looking into the complicated matter of compensations for Bhopal's victims, the parents would surely get equal compensation if the medical records of the birth state that death was due to MIC exposure. The case of compensation for the death of children who are slowly but surely dying in ones and twos every day in Bhopal's hospitals would only become more complex since doctors attending on the mothers are refusing to state the cause of death. If this continues, the parents would not be entitled even to the Rs 10,000 compensation for the death of every member of the family that is being haphazardly distributed. No check is being maintained on the rate of infant mortality among MIC victims, which would only make the task of compensating the parents impossible.

The state has a moral responsibility towards victims who give birth to incapacitated or deformed children. It is the duty of the government to protect the sanctity of human life of its citizens. Immediate steps should be taken in Bhopal to monitor the birth of all infants and make an urgent assessment from hospitals, nursing homes and affected areas to gauge the enormity of the problem and start discussions on the problem of compensations. If the Bhopal disaster had occurred in some other country in the West where the right to withdraw treatment rests legally with the doctors as in the United States then perhaps the demand for euthanasia would have been more vehement. In India, the trauma of giving life to or sustaining the lives of these children is something that only the victims know themselves.

It will be decades before the genetic effects of MIC exposure are known, after children who had been scientifically declared deformed by the gas grow up and give birth to the third generation MIC victims. Then the perpetuating physical agonies of these children and the worst fears of doom would come true. It is feared that more birth-defective children will be born by the end of the third trimester at the end of September this year when the gory picture of such congenital malformations will be complete. The long-term mental and physical effects of MIC-exposure on the victims has set a unique precedent since it was only the people of Bhopal who became the unwitting preys to the unknown killer. The prospect may not be so macabre as the birth of "thalidomide children" in the early Seventies, but these malformed physical weaklings are a reminder of the thalidomide case which stunned the world years ago into realising the effects of unknown chemicals and drugs on newborns. The children of the victims of thalidomide, a sleep-inducing drug administered to thousands of pregnant women in Europe were grossly deformed. Their hands and feet were worst-affected. Some of the children born to the victims of Bhopal have severe congenital defects, including retardation of organs like the lungs and heart and the softening of the brain tissue—children who may live but will remain only marginally alive.



"The Union Carbide plant is still open to danger. There are hundreds of tonnes of hazardous substances stored inside which could trigger off another explosion or leakage if tight security measures are not adopted. Even a heavy rainfall could result in water entering one of the tanks or storage drums with catastrophic consequences." He suggested that the state police should immediately take control of the situation before there is a second disaster within the plant.

A tour of the Union Carbide plant makes you aware of the various ironies that now mock the events of the night of 3 December. Senior Union Carbide officials reveal that safety standards inside their plant were among the highest and most sophisticated in the country, a fact which members of the investigating team concede. The UCIL plant in Bhopal had only a month before the MIC leak received the UCC safety award for the year 1984. The award was given to the Bhopal plant for foolproof safety measures being used in the plant which had not recorded the loss of a single working day throughout the year. It is obvious that though safety precautions were not observed to the book and there were glaring defects, all facilities of basic crisis management were present in the plant. Pinned up on the notice boards outside the office of J. Mukund, the works manager, are circulars issued to all divisions in early November, listing the duties of safety officers and routines of mock-drills six times a week. In the MIC-control room where the pressure gauges have now been sealed by the CBI, hot line connections and emergency alarms are gathering dust. It was in this chamber that the first indications of the high pressure inside tank 610 were noticed. It was at 10.20 at night when the third shift operator noticed that the pressure of the tank was showing 10 PSIG. In about an hour the temperature shot up to 55 PSIG at the top of the scale. The hot line connection was not used. Outside, there are the large water nozzles which can direct jets of water to any point of explosion or leakage. They were trained on the vent gas scrubber at 1 am after all the contents of the tank 610 had been released into the atmosphere. There are other precautionary facilities still in the plant which cost lakhs of rupees to install, but lay forgotten when they were needed most.

There is also the dire negligence of the Union Carbide officials in allowing the three-stage safety device for the MIC unit to remain inoperative for several months. The vent gas scrubber should have neutralised the toxic methyl isocynate by treating it with caustic soda, which was put in an operating mode that night, but there was not enough caustic soda to treat the amount of gas that was fast escaping. The flare tower of the plant which is supposed to burn any gas released was not in working condition and in any case could have controlled only a small leakage. The refrigeration system, built according to international specifications to cool the MIC in the storage tank, had been rendered non-operational by a written order effective from June 1984. There were also the minor structural changes made by the Indian management of the plant specially in the process vent header (PVH) and relief valve vent header (VVH) which led out from the storage tank to the vent gas scrubber. These modifications played a critical role in causing the reaction inside the MIC tank.

The CBI has impounded all documents and records of the company and are giving their case against the chairman of UCC and officials of UCIL the final touches. They have examined 150 witnesses so far and seized 710 documents and are on the point of filing prosecutions in the case. According to CBI officials they have enough evidence to prove the culpability of both the UCIL and the parent UCC in the disaster. They are only awaiting the report of the scientific team of the Indian Council of Medical Research (ICMR) to complete investigations.

After the proceedings against the erring officials are initiated, the question of what is to be done with the multi-crore APD Union Carbide plant in Bhopal would arise. The government has turned down the UCIL's proposals to continue restricted production of non-toxic materials. The managing director of UCIL, V.P. Gokhale had proposed to set up a rehabilitation centre inside. This request was also turned down. Now, according to the plant's production superintendent K.V. Shetty who is attending office occasionally, another proposal had been mooted for the formulation unit of MIC to be made functional. The MIC itself was to be imported from the Bhopal minor-image plant in Charlston, USA as was the case before production of MIC commenced in Bhopal. This was a proposal that was in fact awaiting the sanction of the UCIL headquarters in Bombay before the accident took place.

Tank no 610 being dug out and lifted by a crane

The CBI has in its custody other plans and proposals sent by the Bhopal APD to Bombay for the MIC unit to be made non-operational and the entire production unit to be shifted, lock, stock and barrel, to Brazil. Both these plans prove without doubt that UCIL was not interested in running the MIC plant in Bhopal any more. The MIC unit was a losing proposition for the company, its capacity utilisation was one-third and the losses of the Sevin unit were multiplying over the past three years. But this was not reason enough for the UCC not to upgrade the security measures at its APD subsidiary at Bhopal as it had done in its own Charlston MIC unit. Financial losses of the MIC division were no excuse for the UCIL to dispense with important safety devices and look the other way when the most critical among them are lying unoperational.

Though the CBI, the ICMR and the UCIL teams have been attempting to discover how exactly the leak occurred, in the six months following the incident, they have not come up with any convincing answers. The complex chain of reactions that took place on the night of 3 December last year may never be known. It may never be known how the gallons of water entered the MIC tank and whether it was water that caused the reaction at all. The sabotage theory hinted at in the UCC report has not been substantiated and the CBI officials complain that all evidence of the stages of reaction were destroyed by the UCC officials in their clumsy attempt to stop the leak after the harm had been done. But what is clear is that it was nothing but criminal negligence and blind disregard for precautions that led to the disaster. The precious Union Carbide Bhopal plant was reduced to scrap the very night the tragic incident occurred. Now it is a huge incapacitated iron monster which will keep gathering dust and rust and continue to be a reminder of the horrors of a rapidly industrialising world; a monument in the city of Bhopal which earned the dubious distinction of causing the death of the largest number of people in such an accident; a relic for posterity at the gates of which curious onlookers stop and take photographs to remember the holocaust.

War and Peace in Gujarat

Even after the announcement of the withdrawal of the anti-reservation stir, violence continues. Tushar Bhatt reports.

"Perhaps my stars are favourable," said the 44-year-old new chief minister of Gujarat, Amarsinh Chaudhary, when asked what it was that led to the accord between the anti-reservation agitators and the state government which resulted in the withdrawal of the five-month stir.

The six-point agreement, arrived at after marathon talks on the night of 18 July, in fact does not have anything substantially more to offer than what the administration had been offering during former CM Madhavsinh Solanki's tenure. Chaudhary may understandably feel luckier than Solanki who himself had earned the unofficial title of a "lucky" man because he was the only CM in Gujarat's history as a separate state to have completed a full term. But, this would mean over-simplifying the matter. The agitation which had over the past 150 days seen the loss of more than 215 lives, led to Solanki's ouster and prolonged disruption of the economy in Gujarat, an industrially prosperous state, had clearly gone on for far too long. For five months, schools and colleges were closed, examinations of lakhs of students had been held up and peace was a remote possibility, what with the situation taking on the colours of communal and casteist strife. The message was loud and clear: enough is enough. And the agitation leaders may have been prodded into making the best of it.

Many people had realised that the government had offered all it could, within the overall framework of the reservation policy of the Congress(I). Solanki had become an embarrassment to the party high command, not because of the policy but because of the ways in which he sought to pursue it, arousing the fears of deepening inter-caste animosity. His 10 January decision to raise the quota of reservations in jobs and education for the other backward classes, known in Gujarat as the Socially and Educationally Backward Classes (SEBC) had come just before the Assembly elections were announced. This was quickly perceived as a political carrot dangled before the poor to get votes for the Congress(I). On top of it all, the decision was actually never implemented.

Apart from the loss of human lives and misery caused to the poor and the lower middle classes, trade and industry, according to the Gujarat Chamber of Commerce and Industry, are estimated to have lost a turnover of more than Rs 2,200 crores. In an interview to SUNDAY a few days ago, the new chief minister himself conceded that in terms of progress in the state, the clock had been turned back by as much as a decade. All this happened in spite of the fact that the Congress(I) had won 149 out of the 182 seats in the state Assembly and 20 out of the 26 seats in the Lok Sabha from Gujarat. Many political observers thought that Solanki's style of functioning had aggravated the situation. In the allotment of tickets for the Assembly elections in March, he had seen to it that all dissidents were dropped. Earlier, he had succeeded in hounding out of the party leaders like Ratubhai Adani, veteran Saurashtra leader. Thus, despite a massive mandate and majority, Solanki virtually stood all alone in his battle against the anti-reservationists.

And, in the eyes of the party high command, the cause of it all, the upward revision of quotas for the SEBC, was not needed at all. Mr Rajiv Gandhi had won the Lok Sabha elections with an unprecedented majority and the result would have been repeated in the Assembly polls, although a little less dazzlingly. Logistically, it was a decision that belonged to the era of the late Indira Gandhi who was not only more pro-reservationist but also followed a policy of confrontation. Her son was beginning with a clean slate and the image of Mr Clean, steering the party back to a position where the Congress represented the country and not just some sections of society. Even then, Rajiv Gandhi gave Solanki as long a rope he could partly because it would be setting a wrong precedent to sack a recently elected popular ministry on account of widespread rioting.

Shubdev Bhadresh

Armymen keeping vigil in Ahmedabad

Thus, when Amarsinh Chaudhary, a chosen successor of Solanki, occupied his mentor's chair, his task was not only unenviable but difficult to boot. A man with a low profile who was completely overshadowed by Solanki in the recent past, Chaudhary had to establish his credentials independently to create an image of his own. Mr Chaudhary, a tribal who studied to become an engineer, is even more keenly aware of the problems of the underprivileged, having been one of them. He never had money, even to get married or pursue higher studies. Again, as home and education minister in the Solanki ministry which lasted 118 days, he was very much a part and parcel of what was being done.

Aware of this, the high command had tried to persuade the Congress(I) legislators in the state to select Natwarlal Shah, Speaker of the Assembly, as their new leader. But Solanki, whose supporters regard Shah, former Praja Socialist and trade union leader as a potential dissident, stood firm and had his way. This was the second time in recent days that an outgoing chief minister had forced the central leadership to stand by his decision to nominate a successor. The first was in Maharashtra. But once Mr Chaudhary was in, it was important to bring him closer to the other faction in the Congress(I) and put some distance between him and Solanki. The centre appears to have assumed a more active role in advising the state government. Julio Rebeiro, the tough police official who had made his name in Bombay, was sent as director general of Gujarat Police.

There was a shake-up in the administration, too, and M. Sivagnanam, chief secretary, was shifted as chairman of the Gujarat Electricity Board in Baroda and some of his lieutenants were reshuffled. The ten members of the new Chaudhary cabinet also represented a change from the past because these included at least three persons—Babubhai Sopariwala, Amarsinh Vaghela and Sushila Sheth—who are closer to the dissident group. The high command is thinking of replacing Mahant Vijaydasji as president of the GPCC(I). The Mahant is a minister in the Chaudhary cabinet. Within a week of Rebeiro's arrival, the army which has been stationed in Ahmedabad since 16 April was withdrawn. It was one of the longest stays by the troops in a civilian area in recent times. It was a matter of concern because not only did it affect the jawans, but the

The CM Who Had to Go

Madhavsinh Solanki, who was toppled from the chief ministership of Gujarat by the anti-reservation stir is, perhaps, the most bitter and furious man in the state. But he does not show it. The accord between the government and the agitationists does not have very much more to offer than the package solution Solanki had been offering all along. There is just one extra point—the delegation of responsibility to a judicial commission to decide the fate of the present ten per cent reservations for the SEBC, when they lapse in the year 1988.

However, such are the political exigencies that the 57-year-old journalist-turned-advocate-turned-politician Mr Solanki said, "It is a matter of happiness that the agitation has been withdrawn as a result of the accord. It is to be hoped that normalcy would be established in Gujarat as soon as possible and the state will resume its march on the path of progress."

Ever since his ouster on 6 July, Solanki has been living quietly in a privately hired bungalow in the state capital, Gandhinagar. He has not attended the state Assembly and spends much of his time reading his vast collection of books, meeting people and "listening to the birds early in the morning."

overall efficacy of the use of the army in such situations rapidly declined.

There was no love lost between the police and the army. The former believed the presence of the latter to be a reminder of their inability to cope with the situation. The lack of coordination was worrying New Delhi a lot. However, the withdrawal of the troops, a courageous step initiated by the new police chief, was not without its consequences. Within less than 48 hours of the withdrawal, communal violence broke out in the walled city areas of Dariyapur and Kalupur. On 17 July, five persons were killed, next day two more died and on 19 July six were killed. The rioting was purely communal in nature and seemed to be part of a process of settling old scores, which had remained unsettled because of the heavyhanded presence of the army. Countrymade bombs too have been used at a number of places in recent weeks. With the withdrawal of the anti-reservation stir, the major task before the government now is to defuse the communal crisis. Chaudhary has promised to smash the supply links of crude bombs, which extend upto Bombay, according to opposition leaders and bring to book the mischief makers.

In the past five months, the agitationists have had a couple of rounds of discusssions with the government. But the contact had grown weak in June owing to Solanki's efforts to mobilise the support of his Kshatriya clansmen. Later, the stir changed into a sort of Solanki hatao campaign, with politicians in the opposition joining in the fray. Their sudden success in removing Solanki was numbing for a while.

The major point of the six-point accord—the 18 per cent hike in the quota for the SEBC—will never be implemented in its original form until a national consensus is arrived at. The present ten per cent reservations due to end in March 1988 will be reviewed by a judicial commission consisting of a sitting judge of the High Court who will head it, and two other retired judges. Its report will be available latest by December 1987. A comprehensive judicial probe headed by a sitting High Court judge nominated by the Chief Justice of India will look into the violence of the past five months. The government agreed to help the probe, make its findings public and take steps on the recommendations in due course. The probe will give its report in six months' time. There are other minor points that remain unresolved, like the release of the arrested workers except those charged with serious offences whose cases would be reviewed. In totality, the accord was only slightly different from the Solanki packages. The difference, however, was vital. According to political observers, the policy in regard to the present reservations for the SEBC is to be reviewed after 1988. The government has decided to entrust the task of reviewing it to a judicial commission. This is very much a job of the elected government of the people. It also meant setting a bad precedent because it was being implied that an elected government could be partisan but a judicial commission was above board. Attractive as it may seem, observers believe that this notion cuts at the root of an elected government.

Despite this, the disgruntled elements in the anti-reservationist camp thought they really had not gained much. Their main demand was for a total abolition of the 18 per cent hike and what has been achieved is a postponement till a national consensus is evolved. This could have been achieved as early as 15 March. This would have saved the lives of most of the 215 who died in the violence over the last five months. These elements, headed by student leaders like Bhaskar Bhatt, announced an Ahmedabad bandh on 22 July and a meeting of anti-reservation leaders from all over Gujarat on the following day to chalk out further programmes. They said the agitation would continue and called upon the people and students to go ahead with their boycott of classes and examinations. Some supporters of Solanki such as Mahendrasinh Chauhan, an MLA, were also not happy with the accord and met Chaudhary to urge him to keep the reservations intact. Although it is too early to say what will happen, this could lead to a new realignment in the Gujarat Congress(I) with the Solanki men drifting farther away from Chaudhary. The dissident faction led by Jinabhai Darji had remained silent on the accord at the time of going to press. Darji had last month set up a Gujarat Anamat Samarthan Samiti to protect the reservation policy.

Opposing the Accord

The diehards among the anti-reservationists as also the staunch protagonists of the reservations were sorely disappointed with the accord. Three independent legislators who had rebelled when they were denied Congress(I) tickets, and got elected, summed up the resentment among the other backward classes neatly. The government had "betrayed the trust reposed in it by the downtrodden."

According to the MLAs Karamshi Makwana, Liladhar Vaghela and Shankerji Thakore, "the accord means that the Congress(I) government which had got elected on the massive votes of the backward classes had now opted to side with the upper castes. Significantly enough, the cabinet sub committee which worked out the agreement, did not have a single member from the other backward groups, known in Gujarat as Bakshi Commission Classes."

Several firebrand youth leaders who were the leading lights of the Akhil Gujarat Navrachna Samiti, on the other hand, accused those leaders who had put their signature on the accord on behalf of the agitators with "misleading and cheating the people." Shankerbhai Patel and Vivek Patel had committed a breach of faith. These dissident youth leaders, including four of the six young men detained in March by the government for actively participating in the stir, called upon the students and the people to continue the agitation till the government announced a complete abolition of the proposed 18 per cent hike in reservation for the SEBC, and pledged not to continue the present ten per cent quota for these groups beyond 1988.

The splinter group has also angrily raised the question of funds. The anti-reservation organisations, they claimed, had an enrollment of 1.25 lakh members and had received funds from various sources, but a full account of their money has not been given.

SPECIAL REPORT

Mischief in Kashmir

While the Congress(I) debated its support to the G.M.Shah ministry, an attempt was made on the life of Dr Farooq Abdullah. SANKARSHAN THAKUR reports on the growing instability in Jammu and Kashmir.

Martyrs Day—13 July—often brings tumult to the Kashmir Valley. It is a day of political rabble-rousing. Rallies are held, declarations made and fresh agitations launched. People come out this day and so do their leaders, in all their hues, flexing their muscles. And, if the political climate in Kashmir is uncertain, 13 July is the day to watch out for. Journalists in Srinagar usually go to bed on the eve of Martyrs Day, expecting a hard day's work ahead. This year, however, they were not even spared the calm of the eve. Late at night on 12 July, they were literally pulled out of their beds and summoned to a hurriedly called press conference by the former chief minister and National Conference (F) chief, Dr Farooq Abdullah. If some of them still felt a bit groggy by the time they reached his house, they were shaken fully awake by what Dr Abdullah had to tell them.

An attempt had been made on his life, he said. About eight people armed with axes and lathis had stopped his vehicle and assaulted him. The attack, according to him, had taken place on a jungle-road near Tangmarg, about 50 kilometres away from Srinagar while he was coming back from the shrine of Baba Rishi, accompanied by two security guards, his private secretary G.M. Rather and Abdus Salaam, an office bearer of the All Jammu and Kashmir Muslim Auqaf Trust. "I would have been killed but for the fact that my security officer began firing and an army-man, travelling the same way, came to my rescue," Farooq Abdullah announced, and, in the same breath, placed the blame for the attack on the Jammu and Kashmir minister for law, Ghulam Hassan Mir. "He was sitting all the time in the Tangmarg dak bungalow, planning this conspiracy to remove me physically from the scene."

The next day, when bombs exploded at a Martyrs Day rally being addressed by Farooq Abdullah and his allies, his allegations were only strengthened. A fresh tirade against the Shah government ensued. But chief minister Ghulam Mohammed Shah, quite unexpectedly announced a high-powered probe into the Tangmarg incident headed by Madan Mohan Khajuria, the director general of the Jammu and Kashmir police. While the announcement of the enquiry scotched all rumours of the attack being a "gimmick" by Farooq Abdullah, initial investigations indicated that Ghulam Hassan Mir could not totally evade responsibility for the incident. The jeep (DLK 5477) in which the alleged assailants were travelling was found to belong to one of Ghulam Hassan Mir's men in the area.

Within a couple of days four persons, including the driver of the jeep, had been taken into custody. Their interrogation revealed that an assault on Farooq Abdullah had, in fact, been made. The Farooq Abdullah group has expressed doubts about the fairness of the enquiry but Khajuria, a man known for his integrity, assured: "We will carry out investigations to the end and there will be no political colour to the findings as long as I am here."

However, Khajuria felt that Farooq Abdullah's case had been blown a bit out of proportion. The general feeling is that some of Abdullah's allegations, including his claim that electricity in the area had been cut off, were exaggerated. There is no electricity on jungle roads, one police officer pointed out. Ghulam Hassan Mir came to his defence saying that there was no conspiracy to kill Dr Farooq Abdullah because the assault on him was part of a tussle for the control of the Auqaf funds at Baba Rishi.

The shrine of Baba Payam-ud-Din Sahib Rishi, a few kilometres away from Tangmarg, is one of the most famous in Jammu and Kashmir, second only to the pious Hazratbal in Srinagar. It receives huge amounts of money every year through donations and this fund is traditionally controlled by the All Jammu and Kashmir Muslim Auqaf Trust of which Farooq Abdullah is presently the chairman. However, Mir alleges that at the local level, there was resentment about the way the Baba Rishi funds were being used by the Central Auqaf Trust. According to him, the locals wanted more money to be spent on Baba Rishi instead of it being taken away to the central Auqaf. So Mir, on his own admission, took out Rs two lakhs from the lockers of Baba Rishi and deposited it in a local account. What is more, Mir's men forced the Auqaf managers out of office at Baba Rishi and replaced them with their own men. Farooq Abdullah says that when the people of Tangmarg came to him and protested about these developments at Baba Rishi he and some Auqaf officials went to the shrine on 12 July to take stock of the situation.

It was while he was returning from Baba Rishi after having counted and taken possession of the funds there that Farooq Abdullah was attacked. Mir has maintained (see interview) that it was the local people's anger which culminated in the assault. But he has not been able to convince anyone about his innocence in the affair. He has no satisfactory explanation, for example, for his presence in the area at the time of the incident. According to Raj Bhawan sources, even when Governor Jagmohan asked him this question, Mr Mir was not able to furnish reasons. And Mir's argument that tempers ran high because Farooq Abdullah had gone there "like a dacoit" do not seem to hold ground, for Farooq Abdullah is the chairman of the Auqaf Trust and is well within his rights to check the accounts. As a senior official in the state remarked: "Even if Farooq Abdullah had taken away the money, there was no reason to obstruct his way and assault him. At the most, people who were supposedly angry could have gone to the police station and reported the matter. Moreover, they would not have had much of a case

The events that occurred on the Baba Rishi-Tangmarg Road on 12 July suggest more of a planned bid to cause injury to the former CM than a spontaneous outburst of anger. Farooq Abdullah's ochre four-wheel drive was first obstructed by the vehicle that carried his assailants. When he bypassed them, they chased him for about 500 yards and then hit him on the left. As soon as Abdullah's vehicle stopped they sprang out, ready to attack and had it not been for his personal security officer (PSO), Abdul Rashid Baba and Major Gambhir, the army officer who happened to be there, and came to his rescue, the story would have been different.

But even as investigations continued, the controversy was pushed into the background as politics in the state suddenly changed gear. In an unexpected move, late on 17 July the

Mufti Mohammad Sayeed addressing a gathering in Srinagar

Congress(I) high command summoned all its legislators and senior party leaders to New Delhi for a review of the political situation in Jammu and Kashmir. Such was the urgency that the first lot of Congress(I) leaders who left Srinagar by the first flight to the capital on 18 July were accommodated by displacing several passengers with confirmed tickets. The scene had shifted to New Delhi.

Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's scheduled meeting with the Jammu and Kashmir Congress(I) leaders was delayed but when he did begin his session with them on the evening of 19 July, it lasted more than two-and-a-half hours. He met them, sometimes in small groups, sometimes individually. Among them were the Jammu and Kashmir PCC(I) president, Mufti Mohammad Sayeed, the leader of the Congress(I) Legislature Party in the state, Maulana Iftiqar Hussain Ansari, the Speaker of the state Assembly, Mangat Ram and other important leaders like Ghulam Rasool Kar. In all, nearly 40 Jammu and Kashmir Congress(I) leaders held discussions with the Prime Minister. But a prominent absentee was Trilochan Dutt, a Congress(I) MLA from the Jammu region who has been spearheading the lobby for the withdrawal of support to the G. M. Shah government. One senior Congress(I) leader, explaining Dutt's absence, said: "There was no need for Trilochan Dutt to come here. His views on the subject are well known to the high command, he is all for the withdrawal of support." And the principal topic of discussion of the Prime Minister and the Jammu and Kashmir leaders, even though they were evasive about the subject, was whether or not to continue support to the Shah government.

There was a flurry of activity in the Jammu and Kashmir House in New Delhi as the leaders filed in one after another, after having met the Prime Minister and settled into suite number three where the PCC(I) chief, Mufti Mohammad Sayeed, had booked himself. The Mufti was evasive. Had his party finally decided to withdraw support from the Gulshah government, already under attack on several fronts? Had the pressure lobby in the Congress(I) succeeded in convincing the centre of the risks of associating itself with the government in Jammu and Kashmir any more? Were talks with Farooq Abdullah under way? Or had they decided to give the disgruntled Congressmen a sop by asking Gulshah to form a coalition government? Why had the centre, out of the blue, sent express summons to Srinagar? Mufti Mohammad Sayeed smiled off all these questions while Iftiqar Hussain Ansari, sitting beside him, kept winking mischievously. "Why are you asking such questions?" he asked "Why do you talk of withdrawal of support...There has been no change in the party's thinking, neither is any move being planned." But was it not true that the Congress(I) itself had become a harsh critic of the Gulshah government and some of its leaders had warned that further support was only eroding whatever bases the Congress(I) had in the state? "Yes, yes," Mufti comforted, "there has been some dissatisfaction among the Congress(I) leaders and the Prime Minister has been told about this. You can say we are just reviewing the situation now, but no change."

The next day, after the Jammu and Kashmir leaders had had further discussions with Arun Nehru and Makhan Lal Fotedar, two important advisers of the Prime Minister on Jammu and Kashmir, they were still not ready to disclose anything further. The same evening came the "final word" of the Congress(I) high command on the situation in Kashmir. General secretary Rajendra Kumari Bajpai stated that there was no question of withdrawing support from the G.M. Shah government, neither was the Congress(I) thinking in terms of joining the Shah ministry. Status quo. The two-day stay of the Jammu and Kashmir leaders in New Delhi and the political climate in Srinagar, however, indicated otherwise. Hinted a senior Congress(I) leader who had come from Srinagar: "It is not for nothing that the Prime Minister called all of us so suddenly and spent nearly three hours discussing the matter in the midst of his busy schedule."

Talk of withdrawal of support from the Gulshah government had, in the last few months, become the most popular political rumour in Srinagar. Since the last parliamentary elections it has often been said that the Congress(I) was preparing to pull the rug from under Ghulam Mohammed Shah's feet. The expected change never took place, despite the oft-repeated recommendations of Governor Jagmohan for imposition of Governor's Rule as a first step towards fresh elections in the state. The Congress(I)'s Kashmir policy has been bogged down with indecision because of wide-ranging differences within the Kashmir unit of the Congress(I). One lobby led by top leaders of the Valley has been advocating a collaboration with the Shah ministry while the other one, comprising mostly leaders from the Jammu region, wants an independent presence of the Congress(I) in the state Legislature. The centre has consistently ruled out joining the ministry for it thinks that would be too much of a risk. It would not mind having a share of the spoils, but it is not willing to take any responsibility. And as things stand today, Congress(I) leaders both in the state and at the centre are beginning to feel that even supporting the Shah government now would mean inviting trouble in the future.

At the Aharbal conference of the Jammu and Kashmir Congress(I) in

'There is a Lot of Resentment Against Farooq's Men at the Local Level'

Ghulam Hassan Mir, Jammu and Kashmir law minister, told SUNDAY

Q: What were you doing in Tangmarg the day the attack on Farooq Abdullah took place?*

A: It is my constituency and I was addressing meetings in the interior, in Watalpora and Gulbandanpora villages.

Q: But you were in the Tangmarg dak bungalow when the attack took place...

A: Yes, yes. I had gone there for a cup of tea.

Q: Were your men involved in the assault?

A: Look, there are two things about this that I have already made clear. First, it was a matter of the auqaf trust. The people of the local auqaf trust at Baba Rishi were dissatisfied about the way the funds were being used. Most of it was being taken to the central auqaf. The locals had protested. Some days before the incident there had been an agreement between the central and the local auqaf that 90 per cent of the funds would remain at Baba Rishi and only ten per cent would go to the central auqaf. Even Farooq Abdullah's men had agreed to it. Earlier, Farooq Abdullah and his men had been running Baba Rishi like their personal fief but after this agreement, I was made the chairman of the local auqaf and Farooq Abdullah could do nothing. After I came in control, I took stern measures...

Q: You took out Rs two lakhs from the auqaf and submitted it into your account...

A: Yes, but not in my account. In an account of the auqaf which is in my name.

Q: What happened after that?

A: After the agreement, Farooq's men had some complaints... they wanted more representation in the local committee. They also went to the chief minister but he said he would not interfere in the matter. But Farooq's men actually had no case because there is a lot of resentment against them at the local level. Allegations ka ambar laga tha unke khilaf (There was a load of allegations against them). So when Farooq Abdullah went there like a dacoit and began counting the money, the people were naturally very angry. But I had no part in the attack on him.

Q: So you agree there was an attack...

A: Some local people might have got very angry and done that I did not know because I was not even aware of Farooq's presence in Tangmarg that day.

Q: But why would your chief minister condemn the attack and order an enquiry if this were not a serious matter?

A: Because he did not know the truth then. He reacted only to press reports which were exaggerated. So was the case with the party president, Khalida Shah.

Q: You are an MLA from Tangmarg where the assault took place. You were also there when the incident took place. Furthermore, as you said, tempers among your people were running high. Was it not your duty to see to it that nothing untoward took place? You did not even react after the incident...

A: As I said, I did not know Farooq Abdullah was coming there. What can you do if people decide to beat up somebody?

June, most leaders had spoken openly of the hazards of supporting Gulshah. Speakers at the conference blasted the government's performance during the last year and said in no uncertain terms that if the Congress(I) wanted to build any credibility in the state it should not have anything to do with the Ghulam Mohammed Shah government—a performance that would have come as an embarrassment to the AICC(I) general secretary, Rajendra Kumari Bajpai and the union health minister, Mohsina Kidwai, both of whom had gone to Aharbal as central observers. Even though it was said after the conference that it was in the interest of the nation and party to continue support to the Shah government, the reports of the central observers to the high command seem to have set New Delhi thinking about its posture in Jammu and Kashmir.

The Shah government's performance, by any scale of measurement, has not been encouraging. The reason given for the change—or the toppling—on 2 July last year was that the Farooq Abdullah government had failed to deliver the goods. Gulshah was brought in and was accorded the aura of a great administrator who would treat all ills in a matter of months and set Jammu and Kashmir on the path of progress. What has happened during the last year is exactly the opposite. The law and order situation has deteriorated, the anti-India, pro-Pakistan elements continue to operate as freely as ever, the administration has been lackadaisical and corruption has become more rampant—"Scandal Shah" is how people have begun to call G.M. Shah today.

To top it all, Shah's is an unpopular government, every member of which is a defector. Under the uncertainty and political ineffectiveness of his regime, the forces of instability in the Valley have prospered. And what is more, New Delhi's support to the G.M. Shah government has provided fodder to those who make the most of such situations. People like Abdul Ghani Lone of the People's Conference, a man who commands little political support but is capable of mischief, is according to political observers, the man to watch now. Given the opportunity, he could spring a few surprises.

On several occasions, Farooq Abdullah and Maulvi Mirwaiz Farooq have had to prevent him from making provocative remarks, while speaking on the same platform. And notably, while both Farooq Abdullah and Mirwaiz have become red rags for the Jamaat-i-Islami, Lone continues to be their hero. Recently, during the Koran agitation, they carried him on their shoulders while demonstrating in Srinagar's Lal Chowk. It is Lone who is making the most of the existing situation in Kashmir, telling the people that New Delhi wants to keep the people "enslaved" by perpetuating its own regime in the state. Inflammatory language comes to Lone quite easily; he is prone to saying that the question of Kashmir's accession to Pakistan is still open.

In comparison, Maulvi Mirwaiz Farooq is a mellowed man today. His passport was recently impounded by the government but he is now happy that it has been restored to him. "They called me anti-national. How could I be anti-national? I have an Indian passport," he said. Uncharacteristically chastened, the Maulvi said that he saw a change for the better in New Delhi's mood and that he was not in favour of launching any agitation that could degenerate into violence: "What is the hurry, ...sometime or the other, the peoples' will has to be accepted." Mirwaiz perhaps knows the mind of his partner who is more powerful, Farooq Abdullah.

The former chief minister who, at one time, was radically opposed to New Delhi, now says he would be the last man to adopt an uncooperative attitude towards the centre. He is "hopeful" that the centre's point of view regarding Jammu and Kashmir will "soon change." Of late, there has also been talk that he had tried to meet the Prime Minister. Even though the meeting has not yet materialised, they have started communicating with each other.

It is not without reason that Gulshah has suddenly begun talking of a rapprochement with Begum Akbar Jehan Abdullah, Farooq's mother, who is known as 'madre-meharban' in the Valley. These are signs of nervousness and there have been moves for a patch-up within the family. Gulshah's wife Khalida has had some meetings with her sister Suraiya who is on the other side of the fence and Tariq Abdullah has also been approached to arrange talks between Shah and the Begum. But it is Farooq Abdullah who is standing in the way of a family reunion. According to sources in the National Conference (F), he has been advised not to have any truck with Gulshah in order to come to power, as that would affect his credibility in the Valley. Others suggest that Gulshah has his own way of doing things.

Both Governor Jagmohan and Farooq Abdullah have been recommending Governor's Rule in the state but the suggestion, it seems, is unpalatable to the centre. At the same time the Congress(I) camp is not in favour of supporting the Shah government. If Mufti Mohammad Sayeed is to be believed, the Congress(I) in Jammu and Kashmir could not be in a happier position. Both Shah and Farooq Abdullah are seeking its support. But where does the Congress(I) go from such a "sound position?" That might be a question for time to decide. But in the present political situation there is an important lesson for Kashmiris: New Delhi still remains the master of the game.

"It was

Repeated failures of his agitations for the "restoration of democracy" in Jammu and Kashmir have created doubts about the ability of Dr Farooq Abdullah for consistent political work. People of the state as well as those from outside have begun to say that the National Conference (Farooq) is not led by a man capable of leading a sustained struggle. Even political allies like Abdul Ghani Lone have openly spoken of the need for "stronger public action" against G.M. Shah. Dr Abdullah, he says, is not providing the thrust that the movement against the Shah government needs. "Complacent" is the word they use to describe his attitude. The assault on Dr Abdullah near Tangmarg on 12 July did bring forth some of that latent aggression in him but then he did not react the way associates and followers had expected him to. Political observers in the Valley feel Dr Abdullah is becoming increasingly indecisive. He says he would fight back like a tiger and then goes low-key, he launches an agitation and then recedes into the background. In short, there is no more 'kick' in him. But is this because of his political ineptitude and indecision or is it part of the subtle chessplay in Jammu and Kashmir? Is Dr Abdullah biding his time, deliberately lying low? Is he waiting for New Delhi to make the next move? He spoke to SUNDAY at his posh Gupkar Road bungalow in Srinagar. Excerpts:

Q: Why was there an attack on you?

A: It was a conspiracy to kill me. It is so clear. These people had just planned to remove me physically from the scene.

Q: Some people have made out a case that it was essentially a quarrel over auqaf funds...

A: That is the plea they are making. How can there be a quarrel on auqaf funds? I am the chairman of the auqaf trust and if there was any quarrel why did they not stop me at Baba Rishi itself? Why such an attack in the middle of a jungle, in the dark of the night? I was just going down for some tea at my brother's place and there they were in the middle of the road. They tried to stop us and for a moment I did slow down but then Abdus Salaam, one of the auqaf trust officials, asked me to drive through because he had guessed their intentions were not good. We bypassed them but they came after us and 50 yards further down, hit us on the left, denting my vehicle and breaking its windowpane. Then they came down with axes and sticks. Luckily, my personal security officer began firing and there was this army officer who was behind us. He really saved us. Otherwise I would have been no more. It was all well planned, they had even put off the electricity in the area—in Tangmarg as well as in Baba Rishi. How did the lights go off at the same time?

Farooq Abdullah

Q: What is the basis for your allegation that the law minister, Ghulam Hassan Mir, was behind this conspiracy?

A: They were all his men and Mir was masterminding the entire operation sitting in the dak bungalow in Tangmarg. What was he doing there sitting so late in the evening? Does he have an explanation? In fact my younger brother had warned me, several days before the incident took place, about a conspiracy being hatched but I paid no heed to it. I did not think they would stoop so low.

Q: The state government has ordered an enquiry into the affair. Are you satisfied with the way it is going?

A: After so many days they have been able to catch only four men even though they have the names of all persons concerned. Why are they not able to trace the real people behind the conspiracy?

Q: Switching subjects, Dr Abdullah, the political situation in the state is rather fluid, isn't it?

A: You have seen the performance of the Shah government. The raging corruption, the slack administration, the deteriorating law and order situation. How has the situation improved? Shah has not been able to come to grips with the situation at all.

Q: There is talk of a change in the air...

A: Well, I hope the centre is doing some rethinking on the subject. The Congress(I) has called all its state leaders to New Delhi, where they might be reassessing the situation. The time has come when they should do some rethinking on their support to such a government. But some state leaders of the Congress(I) want to continue the alliance for their own petty interests, for small things that they stand to gain from their support to Shah.

Q: If there is a change, what kind of change do you foresee?

A: Well, we have demanded Governor's Rule in the state for some time to be followed by Assembly elections. I think that would be the best way to change things in Kashmir for the better. The Governor has also been recommending the same thing for quite sometime now.

Q: Why is New Delhi not taking any action then?

A: One never quite knows. There are differences within the Congress(I) itself on the issue. But now certainly, the political climate has changed. The Congress(I), too, has realised that the Shah government has not delivered the goods.

Q: You too have changed your stance suitably of late. When you were chief minister you were not ready to have anything to do with the centre. Now you say you want friendship with them...

A: I am the last man who would want confrontation with the centre. I never said that. I will, as always, cooperate with the centre.

Q: But people say that you have deliberately kept your agitation on a low key because you want to convince the centre...

A: No, we are going to intensify our struggle for the restoration of democracy but let me tell you that I will not allow any agitation to be violent. It is easy for people like Ghani Lone to say that the struggle should have more thrust but I don't want to repeat a Punjab here, where you do something and then it goes completely out of hand. I don't want to lose hold on the reins.

Q: But do you think a rapprochement with the Congress(I) or the centre is on the way? Would you go in for it?

A: That is yet to be seen. A lot will depend on the centre too, but I hope there is a change in their attitude because Kashmir is a very sensitive state.

Q: And this talk of an agreement between G.M. Shah and you: Is it true?

A: No.

Q: But there have been some moves recently in this direction...

A: Yes, they have been trying for a settlement but I am not interested. This is not a family battle, this is a struggle for the restoration of democracy in Jammu and Kashmir. I am not in favour of any such agreement with Gulshah or his men.

Hunger in Jhabua

A picture report by Sondeep Shankar on the devastating drought in this predominantly tribal district of Madhya Pradesh.

Driving through the devastated wasteland in the western Madhya Pradesh district of Jhabua, it is possible to travel hundreds of kilometres without seeing even a blade of grass. The very same area once had small hillocks which were densely forested

A predominantly tribal district (85 per cent tribal), Jhabua today, is in the grip of an acute drought resulting in fodder crisis. Thousands of cattle-head have perished due to starvation.

The land has lost most of its top soil and yields only one crop of maize or corn. This is the outcome of sheer lack of awareness and foresight. Fodder is being imported from the neighbouring Gujarat districts and sold to the tribals at the rate of Rs 150 per bale. Each bale of fodder lasts for just about three days when four animals feed on them. This is far too expensive even by city standards. Naturally, the tribals cannot till their land and are being forced to sell the meagre silver jewellery that they have, to feed the cattle. There have been instances of tribals organising themselves and looting the village markets and also a train carrying fodder.

The Prime Minister's visit to the district raised high hopes among the tribals who saw an overnight development in the form of electricity connections to their villages and fodder distributions on the eve of the PM's visit. The tribals showed him the empty grain storage tanks and told him of the dying cattle. It can only be hoped that the government will not hesitate to initiate steps to alleviate these people's sufferings when the Prime Minister's visit has left them hopeful and within sight of an end to their miseries. ■

The struggle finally ended. After battling for over 220 hours, Mahua Roychoudhury, the prima donna of the Bengali screen, succumbed to the severe burn injuries she received on the fateful night of 12 July. In a rare display of spontaneous emotion, the whole of Calcutta seemed to have turned up at the Calcutta Hospital and Research Centre to pay their last respects to a woman whose name had become synonymous with commercial Bengali cinema. All the big names in the industry were there as well as common people, crying and mourning the death of their beloved star one who had struggled against the odds to become Bengal's leading actress. But she could not withstand the most crucial test of her life. Bathing her countless fans in tears and with crores at stake in an industry which had shown signs of looking up, she made an uncere monious exit on 22 July.

Mahua Roychoudhury was brought to the Calcutta Hospital with "second and third degree burns" and admitted at around 2 am on 13 July.

Mahua (she was known as Shipra and later Sonali) was the youngest of three children As a child she knew hunger—life was always a struggle against grinding poverty. Her father, who was once a dancer, was almost perpetually unemployed and lived separately in Dum Dum. Her mother, an employee of the post and telegraphs department brought her up. But Nilanjan, who saw his three children occasionally, was quick to notice that her daughter had talent. Realising that show business was the only escape for his daughter from a life of abject poverty, he encouraged Sonali to participate in the local "functions" and often took her round the film studios of Tollygunge, introducing her to producers. But the movie-moguls remained unimpressed—an average looking girl who was too shy to speak up was not star material, they felt. Sonali's perseverance and her determination to make it to the top, finally paid off. During one of her rounds, she met Jamaal, the make-up man of Suchitra Sen, the reigning queen of the Bengali silver screen. And Jamaal introduced her to Tarun Majumdar, the noted film maker who was looking for a vivacious, young heroine for his film Sreeman Prithviraj.

Of the nine aspirants who came for the screen test, Sonali was perhaps the most nervous. But she had a distinct screen presence—the shy gawky teenager coming across as a bubbly and attractive young lady. A very impressed Tarun Majumdar (who named her Mahua) signed her on immediately. Sreeman Prithviraj, released in 1976, was a runaway hit and Mahua, as she was now called was innundated with offers almost overnight. But her next release, Je Jekhane Dariye ("it was one of my most memorable roles," she said later) and a few more that followed flopped badly. Suddenly, the "rising star" was reduced to a bit player. It was the legendary Uttam Kumar who pulled her out of the rut. Again, her performance in Sei Chokh, opposite Uttam Kumar won applause, but the film sank without a trace.

More successful was her screen romance with new find Sontu Mukherjee and Seshraksha gave Mahua a new lease of life. Other films followed, but only the occasional one like Sabitri Satyaban and Pipasa did well.

If the late Seventies had been a disappointing time for Mahua, the early Eighties were even worse. The Bengali film industry was in a shambles and the few films that were being released were running to empty houses. Mahua hung on, signing any film that came her way for it was a question of her survival. Then came a bit of good fortune. Godfather Tarun Majumdar was planning to make a "low budget" film and he chose a number of newcomers including Tapas Paul, Debashree Roy and Mahua. The film was a box-office blockbuster, and ran for over 50 weeks in Calcutta, a feat unprecedented in recent times. With success came critical acclaim and awards, including the prestigious Filmfare award and the Film Critics Award. Said Ram Gupta, the producer-distributor of Dadar Kirti, who still sits in his office surrounded by the numerous awards the film has won, "It was only due to the inspired acting of Mahua that the film celebrated its golden jubilee.Tapas Paul, now a much sought-after star,was equally effusive, "Shewas a very mature actress...someone who would go out of her way to help others." After Dadar Kirti, Mahua became a celebrity. Then came Lal Golap, directed by Jahar Biswas. It was another super hit. Now only national recognition awaited her. And Tapan Sinha's Aadmi aur Aurat a television film gave her the opportunity. "It was one of my most memorable experiences," said Tapan Sinha. "The girl's conception of the character s far clearer than mine," he adde Mahua along with Shabana Azmi and Smita Patil were the contenders for the national award for best actress. "The only reason why Mahua lost out was because Aadmi aur Aurat was a short film, while Paar being a full scale feature film allowed Shabana more scope," said Tapan Sinha. Just when Mahua had reached the peak of her career —she was working in three shifts since 1983 to complete the 29 films that were on the floors— she made her exit.

There are a number of conflicting versions as to how disaster struck Mahua. According to the actress' father. Nilanjan Roychoudhury, "Mahua and Tilak had come down from director Anjan Choudhury's flat around midnight. Tilak had retired for the night when they heard a shriek from the kitchen. We rushed there, and found Mahua in flames. We somehow succeeded in dousing the fire by covering her with blankets but by then most of Mahua's body was burnt. Later she was rushed to the hospital." But why did it take nearly two hours to reach the hospital which was just a few minutes drive from the flat? "We were busy nursing Mahua with whatever we had," was Mr Roychoudhury's explanation. Moreover, what has struck many, including the sleuths of the C I D is that the police was kept in the dark about the incident. Only later that night did the officer-in-charge of the Behala police station come to know of the incident through local thana officials. In his report to K. K. Kaliya, the superintendent of police, 24 Parganas, the OC observed that he started investigations without any complaint being lodged. The OC added that he had been told by Mahua's family members that the incident occurred when a stove burst. But the OC, after inspecting the flat and the kitchen, found no sign of splinters which are found when a stove has burst. Moreover, Mr Kaliya gathered from the hospital reports that Mahua's back was the most severely burnt and that her face remained unharmed. In addition, the doctors admitted that when Mahua was brought to the hospital she was smelling very strongly of kerosene. "It was as if she had been bathed in oil." Suspicions were raised as to whether the actress had attempted suicide. The police even did not rule out the possibility of homicide. On 14 July, 72 hours after the incident, Mr Kaliya advised the director general of police to hand over investigations to the Criminal Investigation Department.

The family members of Mahua are extremely tight-lipped about the incident. Tilak Chakraborty's behaviour all through was baffling to many, including the police. On the plea that he was injured in trying to save his wife, he shut himself up in the house when thousands of people were gathering at the hospital premises. It was only at the insistence of some friends that he made a brief appearance in Mahua's cabin on July 14. Mahua's father and brother too were avoiding people, journalists in particular, like the plague. A defence lawyer sat in their flat throughout the day and whoever wanted news was directed to him. The fortunate few who succeeded in coercing Tilak or his father-in-law to speak were fed with the stove burst theory.

The CID officials too complained of a "total lack of cooperation from the family members of Mahua." The police officials too refused to divulge anything "as this was an extremely sensitive issue." They seized the bank accounts of Mahua and began questioning the people who carried out financial transactions on behalf of Mahua. The CID initially suspected that at the root of the problem may be money. And they had reasons to believe that. Tilak was an ordinary bank employee while Nilanjan Roychoudhury was without a job all through his life.

At the Calcutta Hospital the CID sleuths kept a strict watch on all the people who came to meet Mahua. They were sure that the actress would come out with something startling and so they pressed the doctors for permission to interrogate Mahua. But her condition being "critical," the doctors did not oblige the police

Bengali Films: Then and Now

For the Bengali film industry, Sir Cyril Radcliffe's stab through the map of Bengal in 1947 was perhaps the unkindest of cuts. At one stroke, the partition of Bengal into East Pakistan (now Bangladesh) and West Bengal deprived the flourishing Bengali film industry of more than half of its market. It was a big jolt, which was temporarily cushioned because East Pakistan in the late Forties and early Fifties had no industry to speak of and had to depend on films made in Calcutta. From the Fifties, restrictions began to be imposed on the entry of films made in Calcutta and later, it tapered off to a total ban.

The strongest challenge, however, came from Hindi films. They had begun infiltrating into the traditional stronghold of the Bengali film industry—the mofussil areas of West Bengal.

Even though shrinking markets and the onslaught from Bombay have played a part in the decline in the industry's fortunes, the major factor remains the industry's inherent drawbacks. Even in the early Sixties, the industry survived mainly because there were directors like Ajoy Kar, Sushil Mazumdar, Sukumar Dasgupta and Manu Lahiri, who could make wholesome entertaining and technically competent films. They were not master filmmakers like Mrinal Sen or Satyajit Ray whose Pather Panchali was released in 1954. Besides Ray never made films for the masses and they were never big hits.

By the early Seventies, there were fewer filmmakers of mediocre rating who could tell decent stories well. There was the occasional Charulata, Bhuvan Shome or Goopi Gyne Bagha Byne, but most films, because of their poor quality did badly.

The continual lack of success at the box office and the lack of money and glamour in the industry has also led to a drain of talent from Bengal. There is no successor to the Uttam Kumar-Suchitra Sen combination which held audiences in Bengal spellbound in the late-Fifties and Sixties. There are also fewer salable stars in the industry today. And while the number of directors like Utpalendu Chakravarty (Chokh) Gautam Ghosh (Dakhal and Paar) and Buddhadev Dasgupta (Dooratwa) who have made "art films, there are fewer Tapan Sinhas (Baidurja Rahasya) and Tarun Majumdars (Dadar Kirti) to make commercial films with finesse, competence and box-office success.

Equally badly affected are the studios. In the Fifties, there were 14 studios in Calcutta: there are only five which are still running and most of them are in very poor shape. Many others have been closed down while some have been converted into motor garages, bakeries, housing estates and godowns. An old studio now houses the local Doordarshan station. The recent trend of shooting on location and in residences has made matters worse.

With the drastic decline in the number of films, most of the film till 17 July. On 18 July the CID was allowed to record her statement. In her statement, recorded in the presence of two witnesses, Mahua said that "she was injured when the stove on which she was cooking, burst." The CID dropped the case but the report to the director general of police, by Kamal Majumdar, DIG CID, raises doubts on a number of counts:

- Initial reports rule out a stove burst since in that case splinters would have been found scattered;
- The incident may not have taken place in the kitchen at all since initial investigations suggested that things were in order in the kitchen whereas the bedroom was full of burnt clothes. Nilanjan Roychoudhury's explanation is that he had dragged his daughter from the kitchen to the bedroom. But in that case the door curtains dividing the bedroom and the kitchen would have been at least partially burnt;
- Why did it take almost two hours to rush Mahua to the hospital?
- The doctors reported that Mahua's back was severely affected by the fire whereas in the case of stove burst, her front, especially her face should have been severely burnt:
- When Mahua was brought to the hospital she was smelling very strongly of kerosene;

Mahua's husband Tilak Chakraborty with their son

In view of these doubts, though the CID has closed the case, "they are willing to open it if anyone comes forward with a complaint."

Most of the people this correspondent spoke to felt that Mahua's deposition before the police was more of a public statement meant to avoid embarrassment than the truth. There is a section which believes that Mahua could never have come out with the real story as she was under pressure. Most of her financial transactions were carried out on Mahua's behalf by her father Nilanjan Roychoudhury and her husband Tilak Chakraborty. It is said that most of her money was invested or kept in various banks in her father's and husband's name. Ever since Mahua was admitted to hospital, the police have kept a strict vigilance, scanning every visitor who came to see her so that Mahua was not forced to change her mind.

What really drove Mahua to her death? According to her husband, she had recently been very depressed because her shooting schedules in Bangladesh were held up because he had not got her visa. "I am Mahua Roychoudhury and the Bangladesh government has not given me a visa?" she is alleged to have told her husband. But would a fun-loving, friendly woman whose life had been an endless struggle agains' failure, poverty and despair have been so despondent about the delay in getting a visa as to attempt suicide? Would an ambitious actress, enjoying a successful career, shaped by sheer hard work throw it all away in a fit of pique?

That Mahua had something on her mind recently, is fairly clear. Said an insider, "Something was troubling her. She was drinking a lot and even during her outdoor shootings, she never joined her colleagues for dinner (a normal practice) but preferred to lock herself up in her room and drink." What made her tell the criminal investigation department on her death bed that her burns were due to a stove burst even when it was obvious that they were not? Who was Mohua trying to protect? Was the death of this talented performer the end result of a sordid conspiracy? With Mahua Roychoudhury dead, the truth may never be known.

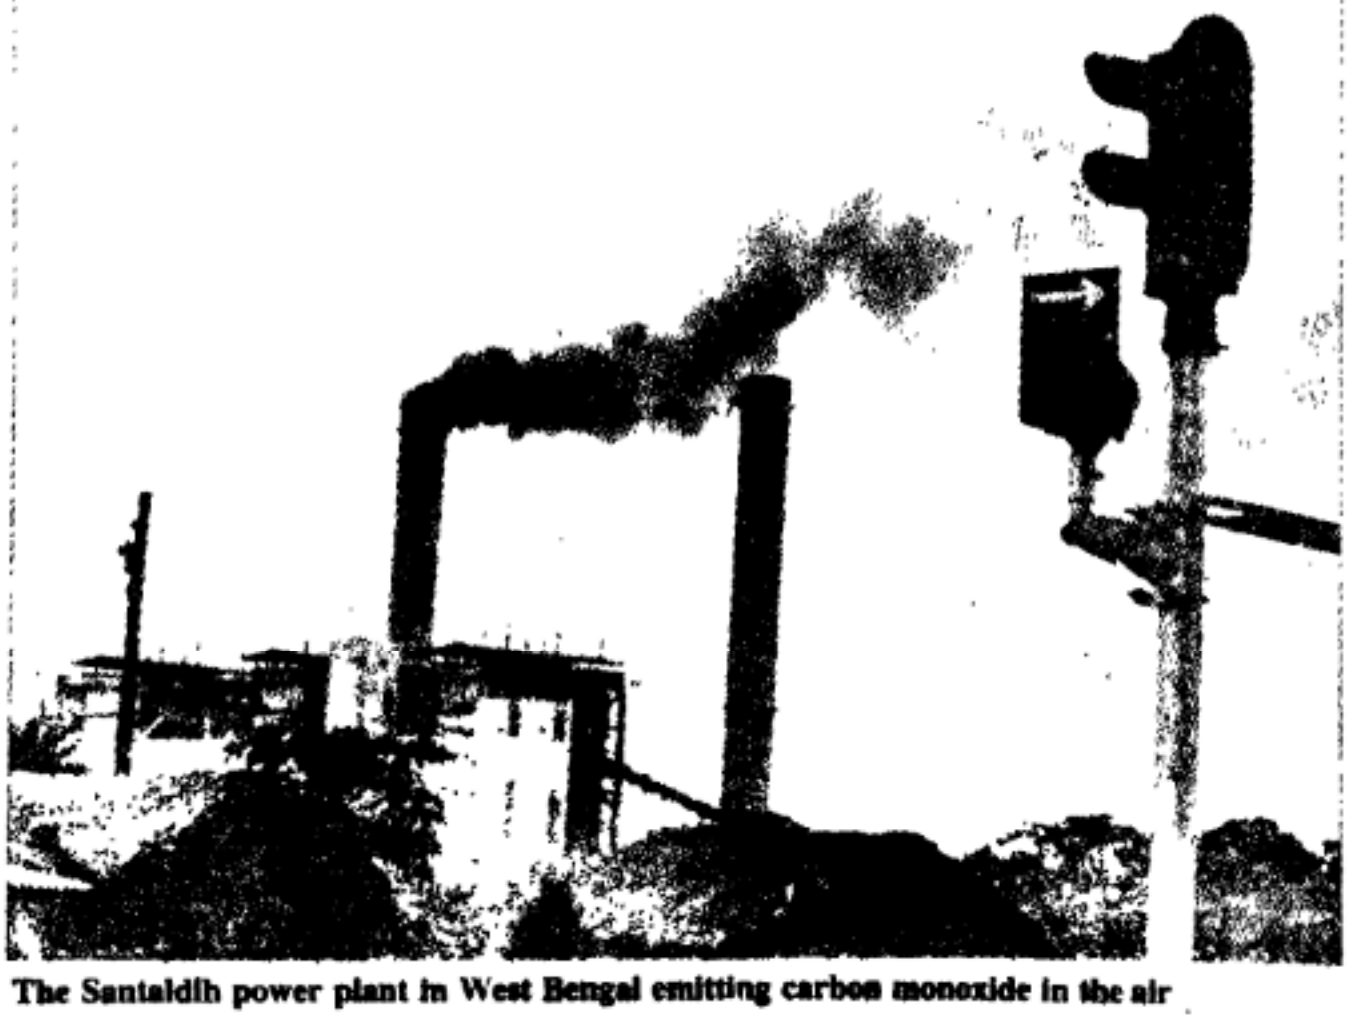
stars, including the leading actors and actresses are left with very little work. Most of them including Aparna Sen (36 Chowringhee Lane) and Soumitra Chatterjee, who has acted in many of Satyajit Ray's films as well as the younger crop of artistes have been regularly performing on the stage.

But there are signs that the industry has made a minor recovery. With the success of Shatru (directed by Anjan Chowdhury) and Lal Golap, the studio floors are no longer deserted. Both Tapas Paul and Moon Moon Sen, two of the busiest stars in Tollygunge, agree that the industry is in better shape than it was sometime back. Said Moon Moon Sen, "The industry was in very bad shape a few years ago, but things are picking up because of some recent super-hits and more producers have been approaching me." Tapas Paul agrees: "The situation compared to the time I joined has improved," he said. But whether the industry starved of finances and talent, will survive the crisis and perhaps even thrive, remains to be seen.

SPECIAL REPORT

The Curse of Pollution

The lesson of Bhopal is clear: India is fast becoming a hunting ground of industries which are playing havoc with the environment. The list of the most hazardous units recently brought out by the government should serve as a basis for action. Ritu Sarin reports.



Corrective measures seldom precede the catastrophe. It took the death of 2,500 people and the maiming of 50,000 others in the Bhopal disaster to make the authorities aware of the danger clouds that remain permanently suspended over industries like the Union Carbide which produce toxic substances. But if the questions that the world's worst industrial accident threw up following the gas leak in Bhopal are disturbing, then the results of investigations into further dangers from similar plants are positively shocking. The Bhopal disaster revealed the culpability of the parent Union Carbide Corporation, USA, in the maintenance of its subsidy in India, the gross negligence of the Madhya Pradesh government in its failure to enforce safety regulations in case of an exigency, and exposed the vulnerability of persons living around such industrial units.

Seven months after the Bhopal tragedy, the danger signs are up for all to see. The government has identified between 6,000 and 7,000 chemical units as hazardous. Findings of the state governments and also of the foreign experts, who have been attracted to India and are using it as an experiment ground for evaluating international industrial safety standards, have exposed the disregard that many of these plants have shown towards adopting safety measures.

The hazardous units constitute industries which produce toxic, highly reactive, flammable or explosive substances. A series of high-level consultations have taken place to evaluate the existing system of enforcing safety measures. The subject of safety and occupational hazards in chemical industries was taken up during the meeting of the labour secretaries on 10 May and the labour ministers' conference on 11 May in New Delhi. Of the industries identified as potential sources of danger, a large number include units producing pesticides and insecticides, drugs, acids and alkalies, sodium and potassium cyanide and rubber synthetics. Nearly 70 per cent of the hazardous units are situated in Gujarat, West Bengal, Karnataka and Maharashtra, as there is no strong criticism about the inadequate safety measures. Special nominees of the Central Pollution Control Board would be appointed to examine the dangers posed by chemical units.

The potential dangers from such hazardous industries and the closure of units which are found lacking in inbuilt safety measures are being examined by the state governments. The Safety and Health Accident Reduction Action Plan (SAHARA) has been formulated to provide guidelines to the state labour organisation to identify such units and investigate into the threats posed by them. The setting up of the SAHARA is a first step for pinpointing the "danger areas" which would lead to fatalities in case of an accident. Surveys conducted by some of the state governments have revealed that there is not only largescale negligence in the maintenance of some units, the owners of the units have ignored the warnings issued by the enforcement agencies. In Gujarat, for example, in spite of eight minor accidents in chemical and allied units in the past year, the state government has failed to take deterrent steps against the industrialists and officials who have permitted flagrant violations of the labour laws. The task force of the Gujarat government has identified 25 hazardous chemical plants, producing hydrocynic acid, chlorine, carbon monoxide, ammonia, nitrobenzene and phosphorus components. After scrutinising the conditions under which these chemicals are produced, some industries were termed "extremely hazardous for surrounding population and environment." Among the industries being examined for their inbuilt safety measures are the Indian Petrochemicals Limited and the Indian Oil Corporation refinery in Baroda, Tata Chemicals Limited in Jamnagar, Cyanides and Chemical Company in Surat and the Gujarat Insecticides in Ankleshwar.

In spite of the urgent directive

from the government, other states are dragging their feet in preparing the lists of hazardous units and thereby delaying effective implementation of the SAHARA plan. The Maharashtra government has now appointed a team of seven experts to visit the factories emitting hazardous gas and enforce safety rules in their premises. One of the large chemical units situated in Chembur, Bombay, the Rashtriya Chemical and Fertiliser plant, has been shut down following complaints about leakages. In Rajasthan, a committee appointed to look into the subject has named three chemical units—the Pesticides India Limited in Udaipur, Modi Alkalies and Chemicals and Bharat Allums Limited, both located in Alwar—which present dangers to life and property. In Punjab, an exhaustive survey was carried out on 810 units, most of which were hydrogenated oil (ghee), pesticide, fertiliser, chemicals and liquidised petroleum gas (LPG) plants. The Punjab state government is contemplating the closure of some 20 plants which have been found lacking in safety controls.

While the first step of improving safety standards in hazardous units is to identify the sources of dangers, a positive move to eliminate the possibility of an accident would only be taken when the government announces its decision to make the owning of such a hazardous unit a cognisable offence. Following recommendations of the labour secretaries and labour ministries, a decision has been taken to substantially increase the penalty for violating safety regulations in units identified as hazardous. An amendment of the Factories Act of 1948 is soontobeeffectedbythe passing of a bill in Parliament which would make labour laws more stringent. At present, the penalties imposed for violations of the Factories Act are imprisonment to a maximum period of three months or a fine between Rs 500-Rs 2,000. Though no separate records are maintained for fines and penalty imposed for infringement of safety status, a recent survey showed that the average fine imposed for violation of safety regulations was as low as Rs 56 per unit and the highest fine imposed was Rs 517. Such fines were levied after the penalty under the Factories Act was enhanced in 1976 to over Rs 2,000.

In the wake of the Union Carbide tragedy and the increased awareness of the threat of a similar catastrophe, a comprehensive legislation is being worked out to cover all aspects of prevention of accidents in hazardous units. The proposals for amendments in the Factories Act are to be examined by the cabinet subcommittee before the legislation can be made into a law. The guidelines before the committee looking into the amendment are clear: "The amended law should provide for stringent penalties for all types of violations and give powers to chief inspectors of factories for the suspension of operation of processes wherever there is evidence of danger to the lives of the employees and members of the general public living in and around the working place. For continued violation of safety and health provisions, the penalties would include compulsory imprisonment." The amended Factories Act would strengthen the hands of the enforcement agencies to ensure that there is no violation of safety regulations. What is more, it would empower the inspector of factories to announce the closure of a hazardous unit. In the capital, in spite of questions being raised in Parliament on the imminent danger from the DCM chemical plant, no decisions of closure could be taken under the present legislations. Besides, a provision in the act would ensure that the recommendation of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), that for every establishment employing more than 1,000 persons there should be a security officer and there should be one inspector for every 100 factories is followed. At present, investigations have shown that there is not even one inspecting officer for every 200 units, many of which have been listed as hazardous. Again, it is in Gujarat, Maharashtra and West Bengal where most of the safety violations have been detected.

The Bhopal tragedy is not the only reason why the government has shown interest in industrial safety. There has been a record rise in accidents and incidence of disease from occupational hazards in these units even before December, 1984. Figures of two previous years of accidents in the chemical and chemical product industry clearly indicate this rising trend. In 1980 there were 10,823 injury cases (with an incidence rate of 32.76 per 1000 workers) in the chemical industry. The number increased to 12,328 the following year (with an incidence rate 37.04 per 1000 workers). Though figures for the subsequent years have not yet been tabulated by the authorities, there has been a further increase between 1982 and 1984, the largest number of accidents occurring in 1983.

Accidents in hazardous industrial units have also been rising in other parts of the world. While about nine million people were injured in 1984 as a result of on-the-job accidents in 64 countries and 24,000 of these injuries were fatal, the situation is much worse in the third world countries than in the industrial north because of the attitude of the Multi-National Enterprises (MNE). In India, the investment of MNE is among the highest in the developing countries. The Union Carbide MIC gas leak has exposed the dire consequence of an accident in such a MNE. Highlighting the plight of hazardous units in India and other countries a report of the ILO pointed out that human beings are being exposed to more and more chemical substances: from 1.6 million in 1970 to over five million today. Among the 60,000 chemicals in common use, exposure limits have been adopted for only a fraction of the agents known to be toxic for the workers and dangerous for persons living around the area of production.

Will India become a playground for the multi-nationals to carry out their dangerous chemical experiments? What is the safeguard for the thousands who live close to the 6,000 chemical units which have been identified as potential sources of danger? Dr A.F. Ellis, consultant ILO and Dr D.H.Slater,toxicologistandmemberof the advisory committee on major hazards in the United Kingdom have suggested that a qualified chemical inspector be appointed to inspect every 100 chemical factories and that stringent labour legislations be immediately passed.

A Potential Killer

The Shriram Food and Fertiliser factory in New Delhi

Will the direction in which the winds blow determine their life or death in case of a disaster? This is a question which 1,500 residents within the one kilometre radius and 9,500 more within the two kilometre radius of the sprawling Shriram Food and Fertilizers Ltd. plant in Delhi are asking. The plant, a chemical unit of the private sector Delhi Cloth Mills (DCM) situated at Najafgarh Road, has been identified as one of the "most hazardous" industrial units in the capital. A recent survey showed that the DCM plant topped the list of 1,500 such units in Delhi which could be possible sources of industrial accidents. Following the Union Carbide Methyl Isocynate (MIC) leak, the Delhi administration has been under pressure to announce the closure of the DCM plant, which produces large quantities of chlorine and other toxic chemicals and is situated in a densely populated area. Restricted by labour laws which prohibit the closure of any plant without substantial evidence of malfunctioning, the Delhi administration has set up an expert committee of toxicologists and environmentalists to investigate into the potential threat posed by the DCM chemical unit and other such hazardous plants.

Any explosion or leakage in such a chlorine plant situated within the metropolis would undoubtedly spell catastrophe for the thousands living around it. The DCM plant was made operational in 1949 and inspite of warnings, its production and storage capacity have increased over the years. Today, the chemical unit, which employs 1,777 persons produces 124 tonnes of caustic soda and 105 tonnes of chlorine every day. Usually about 180 tonnes of chlorine is stored in its two huge 100-tonne tanks and two 20-tonne tanks. Eighty tonnes of the chlorine is utilised for production of hydrochloric acid (HCL) and 30 tonnes transported to the neighbouring plant of Hindustan Insecticides, for production of dichloro diethyl trichloro ethane (DDT) through a pipeline. This has been considered an extremely dangerous mode of transportation.

The Hindustan Insecticides unit has itself been listed as a potential environmentel and industrial hazard. There have been strong protests in Parliament that both these chemical units should be shut down because they "might any day explode and cause extensive damage to life and property."

The DCM chemical plant, its officials have been at pains to point out, has all the inbuilt safety measures prescribed by the Society of Chemical Institute, United Kingdom. The utilisation capacity is a high 99.9 per cent as against the national average utilisation capacity of 86 per cent. Only a few weeks ago in view of fresh directives issued by the government, the storage of chlorine in one of the 100-tonne tanks was discontinued and various other precautionary measures adopted. A detailed project report on the various points of danger located within the plant has been prepared by the labour commissioner of Delhi. It has been pointed out in the report, that the security safeguards in the DCM plant are far from satisfactory, let alone foolproof. The expert committee set up should now examine the imminent threat posed by the plant.

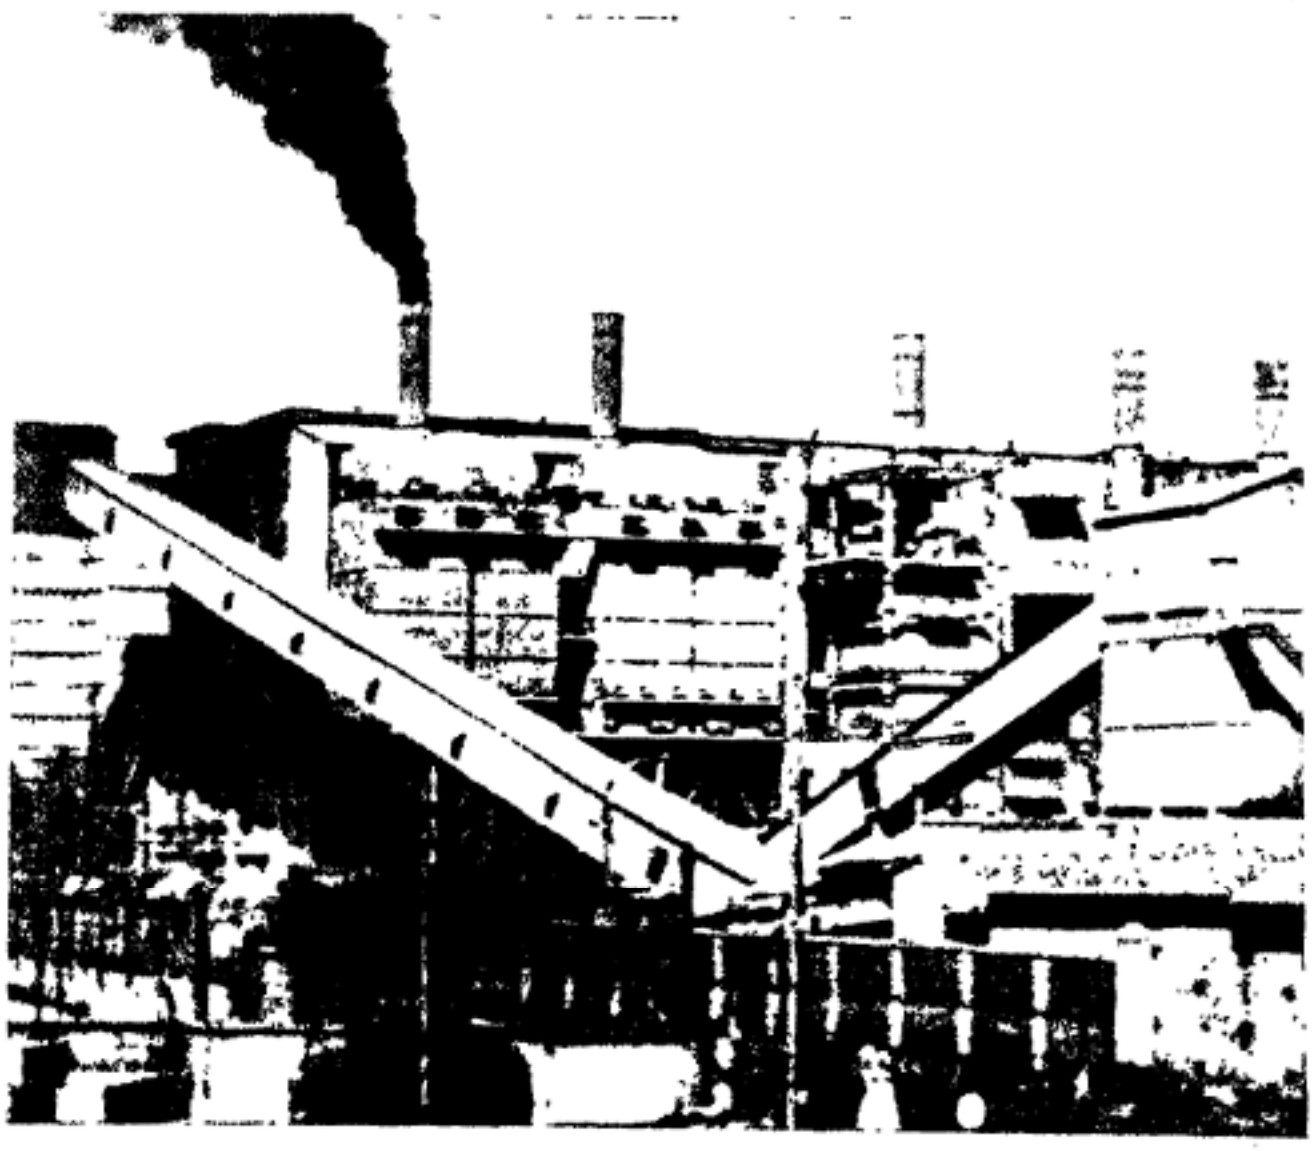
SPECIAL REPORT

Madras' Poisoned Air

Weary passengers travelling by train breathe a sigh of relief on spotting the three gigantic funnels of the BasinBridge thermal power station as Madras is just minutes away. But for the slum dwellers who have the misfortune of living in the Basin Bridge Junction, the thermal station is the cause of their concern. The plant has caused such extensive atmospheric pollution that almost every person residing in the area suffers from respiratory problems. No biological tests are required to gauge the extent of the pollution. Throughout the day the entire area remains covered with coal dust.

Over the years there have been agitations for the closure of the thermal plant as it ceaselessly spewed pollutants into the air. But the power situation in the state is so acute that the state government finds it impossible to shut down the unit. Any plant that uses fossil, fuel and coal emits toxic sulphur dioxide. In the case of this thermal station the suspended particulate matter (SPM) dust in common parlance—is very high, far exceeding the tolerance limits set by the pollution control authorities. Apart from contamination,SPM also causes serious respiratory ailments. The SPM can be treated and made harmless but unfortunately in the case of the Basin Bridge Thermal Station, the introduction of an effluent treatment process is not cost effective. The authorities feel it is better to replace the existing system with gas turbines. But the [illegible] decision has been taken.

While the Ennore thermal station near Madras is marginally better than the Basin Bridge station, it is also guilty of causing atmospheric pollution. The SPM in the case of the Ennore station too,has been found to be high. The foundries in Ennore also contribute to the pollution.



However, the most hazardous industrial units in Tamil Nadu and Madras in particular are the leather tanneries. Of the 430 tanneries in the state about 40 of them are located in Pallavaram, an industrial suburb of Madras. Effluents from these tanneries pollute surface and underground waters. Effluents from leather tanneries have been found to have a high bio-chemical oxygen demand—that is,it depletes the oxygen content in the water making it difficult for the aerobic organisms to survive. Salt (sodium chloride) is also found in large quantities in these effluents. The increased salinity reduces soil fertility: the yield is diminished and finally the land can become barren one day. A lot of chromium is found in the effluents of units using the chrome tanning process. While chromium is not lethal to human beings it kills aquatic life.

Industrial units manufacturing caustic soda, a chemical used for manufacturing rayons,can be hazardous if the effluent treatment or control systems goes faulty. Recently the caustic soda unit of the Kotharis in Madras created panic. Chlorine gas leaked causing eye irritation, congestion in the chest and nausea and several people had to be admitted to hospitals. The incident coming as it did in the wake of the Bhopal tragedy, sent the people running helter skelter.

Cyanide is a deadly chemical present in the liquid effluents of certain engineering units, particularly the plating plants. In Madras there is a large network of automobile ancillary units and hence the plating industry is a thriving one. While some of the major units treat the effluents containing cyanide, by the alkali chlorination method, there are small ones who are not particularly concernedabout pollution.

Oxides of nitrogen emitted by the fertiliser manufacturing plants can be lethal if it comes in contact with hydrocarbons released by refineries and heavy vehicles plying on the road. The effect of the pressure of mercury in industrial effluents can be deadly. Numerous mercury compounds are in wide-spread use in the agricultural, explosives, pigments and pharmaceutical industries. Mercury is also used in large quantities by factories producing chlorine. Only recently has it been discovered that mercury dissolved in water is converted into the deadly methyl mercury by an organic process. Moreover, there are many textile dyeing units in and around Madras which discharge waste into the river with a high saline content. Add to that the zinc released by the galvanising units and the river water is a potential source of health hazard.

Most of the rivers and estuaries in Tamil Nadu are heavily polluted by the discharge of effluents from fertilizer units, chemical industries, steel plants, coal washeries and thermal power plants. In Madras, a number of industrial units are located in the Adayar and Cooum estuaries. Industries like the Kothari and Chemicals, Alkali Chemicals, Madras Refineries, Madras Fertilisers and many

Bengal: Callousness and Neglect

The environment and pollution control department of West Bengal has never been too vigilant in its efforts to ensure industrial security. The recent chlorine gas leaks from two units in Calcutta within a span of 24 hours, laid bare the state's slackness in implementing safety measures. One person died and 32 others, including fire brigade personnel, fell ill after chlorine gas leaked from the Mullickghat pumping station of the Calcutta Municipal Corporation (CMC).

A spate of allegations and counter-allegations followed the incident. The CMC officials claimed that the cylinder from which the gas leaked, was defective and the suppliers, Durgapur Chemicals Ltd (DCL) are to be held responsible. However, Mr P. Chakravarti of DCL refuted such a charge. Instead, he claimed that the experts team which was sent by the DCL to investigate into the causes of the leak, had found that the cylinder had been tampered with by the local staff. Another senior official of the DCL also alleged that the Mullickghat staff had been repeatedly cautioned about adopting safety measures as stipulated under the Gas Cylinder Rules 1981 but in vain.

The minister for urban development and local self-government, Mr Prasanta Sur said that the leak could have resulted in a "disaster." The following day, on 12 June, another similar leakage occurred at the Calcutta Metropolitan Development Authority's (CMDA) booster pumping station at Auckland Place in south Calcutta. Once again a major catastrophe was averted as DCL experts and fire brigade staff rushed to the spot to plug the leak.

The commissioning of yet another potentially dangerous unit, a new zinc smelting plant of the Posts and Telegraphs department, was stopped after a furore was created by a voluntary organisation, Concern for Calcutta (CC). The group objected to the site of this plant, which was to be commissioned near the P & T's telecom factory in the heart of the city. Though Mr H.S. Sodhi, general manager of the telecom factory insists that it is actually a "galvanising plant," informed sources point out that the unit had been set up without prior sanction from the state environment department and the CMC.

The hazards that industrial units using toxic chemicals can pose to the population around it cannot be overemphasised. After the Bhopal gas disaster, the environment and pollution control department of the state, in a flurry of activity, set about investigating into the potentially hazardous industries in West Bengal. As the minister for environment Bhabani Mukherjee put it: "We do not have any units here which use toxic chemicals and gases of the scale used by the Union Carbide in Bhopal." However, the experts are looking into various aspects of industrial safety. the chemicals that the industries plan to use, the design and safety measures and also the mode of storage. Sources at the state pollution control board say that the state of affairs in the fertiliser, pesticides, acid, and chlor-alkaline manufacturing factories are being looked into, as these come under the purview of "hazardous" units. The board has already started legal proceedings against six industrial units in 1983-84 for discharging effluents without adequate treatment. These are: Dunbar Mills, Bengal Distillery (run by Shaw and Wallace Company, which was later withdrawn after they construced an effluent treatment plant), Standard Pharmaceuticals Limited, Chloride India Limited, East End Paper Mills and Everest Paper Mills. Besides, letters of warning have already been sent to Shaw and Wallace Company Ltd. (Haldia), Associated Chemical Industrial Corporation, Durgapur Chemical Ltd, Hindustan Heavy Chemicals, Bengal Chemicals and Fertilisers Ltd, Kesoram Rayons Ltd, Jayshree Chemicals and Fertilisers Company Ltd. The Phosphate and Company Ltd, Fertiliser Corporation of India (plants at Durgapur and Haldia), Hindustan Lever (chemical plant at Haldia). The chief inspector of factories has also booked units like the B.D. Khaitan and Company, Bharat Minerals and Chemicals, Shaw Wallace and Company Ltd, Tata Fison India Ltd, New Industrial Chemical Private Ltd, Coalite Chemicals Private Ltd and SGN Synthetic Private Ltd.

others are located around the Ennore estuary just off Madras. SUNDAY learns from reliable sources that an estimated 7,75,000 litres per day, 2,52,000 litres per day and 4,49,000 litres per day of industrial waste with metallic elements are released into the Adayar, Cooum and Ennore estuaries respectively.

A study of the amount of the pollution along the Madras coast from Pulicat to Kalpakkam revealed that the sea off Ennore has a greater concentration of metallic concentration due to the effluents discharged into the sea. A large number of fish die every year around the Ennore estuary due to water contamination. The sea here is also affected by organic pollution due to the discharge of sewage water. The BOD was also relatively higher in the area according to a CIFRI report published in 1984.

The Water and Air (Prevention and Control) Act enacted by the central government was enforced in Tamil Nadu in 1981. In 1982, the Pollution Control Board was set up and the next year the government stipulated that all existing units as well as new ones being commissioned required the "consent" of the board. This was a means to check whether the units were properly treating toxic effluents. From August 1984 the board has begun prosecuting offending industries. So far action has been initiated against 249 units under the Water (Pollution and Control) Act and against 120 units under the Air (Pollution and Control) Act. The units against which action has been taken are thermal units, iron and steel plants, tanneries, cement, paper and pulp, chemical textile and dyeing and starch-making units. Laws relating to the contravention of the Water Pollution Act are more stringent than the laws of the Air (Pollution and Control) Act. While the former provides for imprisonment for a term not less than six months, which may be extended up to six years and a fine, the latter provides for imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months with fine which in some cases may be as high as Rs 10,000. So far, the courts have penalised five industrial units in Tamil Nadu with fines of Rs 10,000 for violating the provisions of the Air (Pollution and Control) Act.

Many industries have not incorporated systems to process industrial effluents because of the high cost of effluent processing plants. In fact, this is an area where a lot of research is needed. The waste disposal problems are enormous and ought to be solved through effective techniques.

SPECIAL REPORT

Bombay's Factories of Filth

"I was going home from the airport around 9.30 last night (19 July) and along the road I could smell ammonia, even though I was a mile away from the Rashtriya Chemicals and Fertiliser (RCF) plant. I can well imagine what the people in the area were going through. What is strange is that the next day's newspapers did not carry a word about the leak and there was obviously a leak of ammonia from the area," insisted P. Abraham, a scientist working with the Society for Clean Cities (SOCLEEN). Abraham who has been running a crusade against the phenomena of the ruinous "acid rain" in the Chembur area is pessimistic about the situation being rectified, despite the hectic activities of the Maharashtra Pollution Control Board (MPCB) and the two other organisations, namely an environmental safety committee and a sub-committee which the MPCB has spawned. "Everything looks good on paper," said Abraham. "It is in the implementation that everything is wrong, because very little actually changes."

The three-member Evironmental Safety Committee (ESC) formed in January 1985 after the tragedy ot Bhopal and the fears about the effects of hazardous, dangerous chemicals among the local population, has already submitted a list of 15 industries which it has surveyed and has given recommendations on. Said Dr R.K. Garg, director of the chemical engineering group of the Bhabha Atomic Research Centre, Bombay, and chairman of the ESC, "We have finished a survey of 40 companies manufacturing or dealing with chemicals, pesticides, and hazardous chemicals, gas and other incendiary substances. We have submitted this to the MPCB which in turn has to submit it to the government of Maharashtra." C.D. Oomachen, chairman of the Maharashtra Pollution Control Board, who has been trying to make the Thane-Belapur and the Bombay region safe from a tragedy like Bhopal, has to work within the confines of the Water (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act, 1974 and the Air (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act, 1981. He said he had appointed a high-powered committee, including the chief inspector of factories, additional director of industries, chief inspector of licences, and deputy director of explosives etc., as they have the powers to literally ransack an industry to get the requisite information. "It was like a marriage between a pauper and a princess," he said. "We have very limited powers, but with these other people with us, we do have more powers."

In March this year, following the report of the environmental safety committee, the MPCB created a standing monitoring committee (SMC) to check the industries surveyed by the ESC maintained the set standands. The committee include Dr V.V. Kale, additional director of industries, Bombay, who is the chairman of this committee, V.R. Damle, executive engineer, Bombay Municipal Corporation, V.N. Kholkute, chief inspector factories and S.K. Patil, member secretary of the MPCB. This committee is supposed to have visited the factories on a regular basis and also examines the reports of compliance received from the above industries at periodic intervals and sends their assessment to this board with any further recommendations for necessary action as may be required. This report is expected to be given next week. For some reason the reports are not disclosed to the press though the people have the right to be informed about a matter concerning their health and survival.

Despite the fact that high-powered committees are trying to control pollution, the people are cynical about the callous managements and connivance of the factory inspector who is the main culprit behind the pollution.

The reports on the 15 factories given in the first instalment were scary. What makes it worse was that it seemed the committee had tried to play down the dangers. Note this paragraph pertaining to the RCF: "During the earlier visit, the committee had noted that the loading and unloading of sulphur was being done manually. The committee was informed that this was not the normal practice and that mechanical equipment was used for the purpose. At the time of the earlier visit, the dumpers were not in working condition. RCF agreed to ensure mechanical handling of sulphur at all times." (Why is the committee shy to say whether mechanical dumpers were being used during its current visit or not?)

In the case of Bombay Soap Factory in the heart of central Bombay Grant Road, the committee said, "There is a casual approach to safety aspects. The company deals with a dangerous chemical called hexane which is stored in large amounts even when the plant is not in operation. It has suggested that the present plant location is contrary to the provisions of the Maharashtra factory rules and it should be shifted to a suitable area immediately. This was in March and till today that company still exists there and is owned by a politically very powerful group, Ahmed Oil Mills.

Indian Explosives Ltd was found to be storing butanol and methanol in a non-flame proof area in the factory in the Sewri industrial belt. In fact, butanol is stored near the cyanide handling unit which is highly dangerous.

These are just a few of the 15 mentioned industries. The other 11 companies for which the reports are ready are powerful multinationals and private sector units like Sandoz, Bayers, Indophil, Rallis India, National Fluoride, National Organic Chemicals, Century Chemicals, Indian Dyestuff Industries, Deepak Fertilisers, Hindustan Insecticides, Century Rayon, Siddheshwari Sulphur, Tata Thermal, and Herdillia Chemicals.

Despite the fact that high-powered committees are involved in trying to control pollution and health hazards from the chemical based industries in the Bombay-Thane-Belapur area, the people in these areas are cynical about the callous managements and connivance of the factory inspector who is the main culprit behind the pollution. One resident of Kalyan said he would like to invite any member of the environmental committee to come and have a bath or wash his clothes like the people do in the Ulhas river which flows via Kalyan into the Thane creek. The river has multi-coloured water from the effluents of Indian Dyestuffs, National Rayon, Century Rayon and other companies.

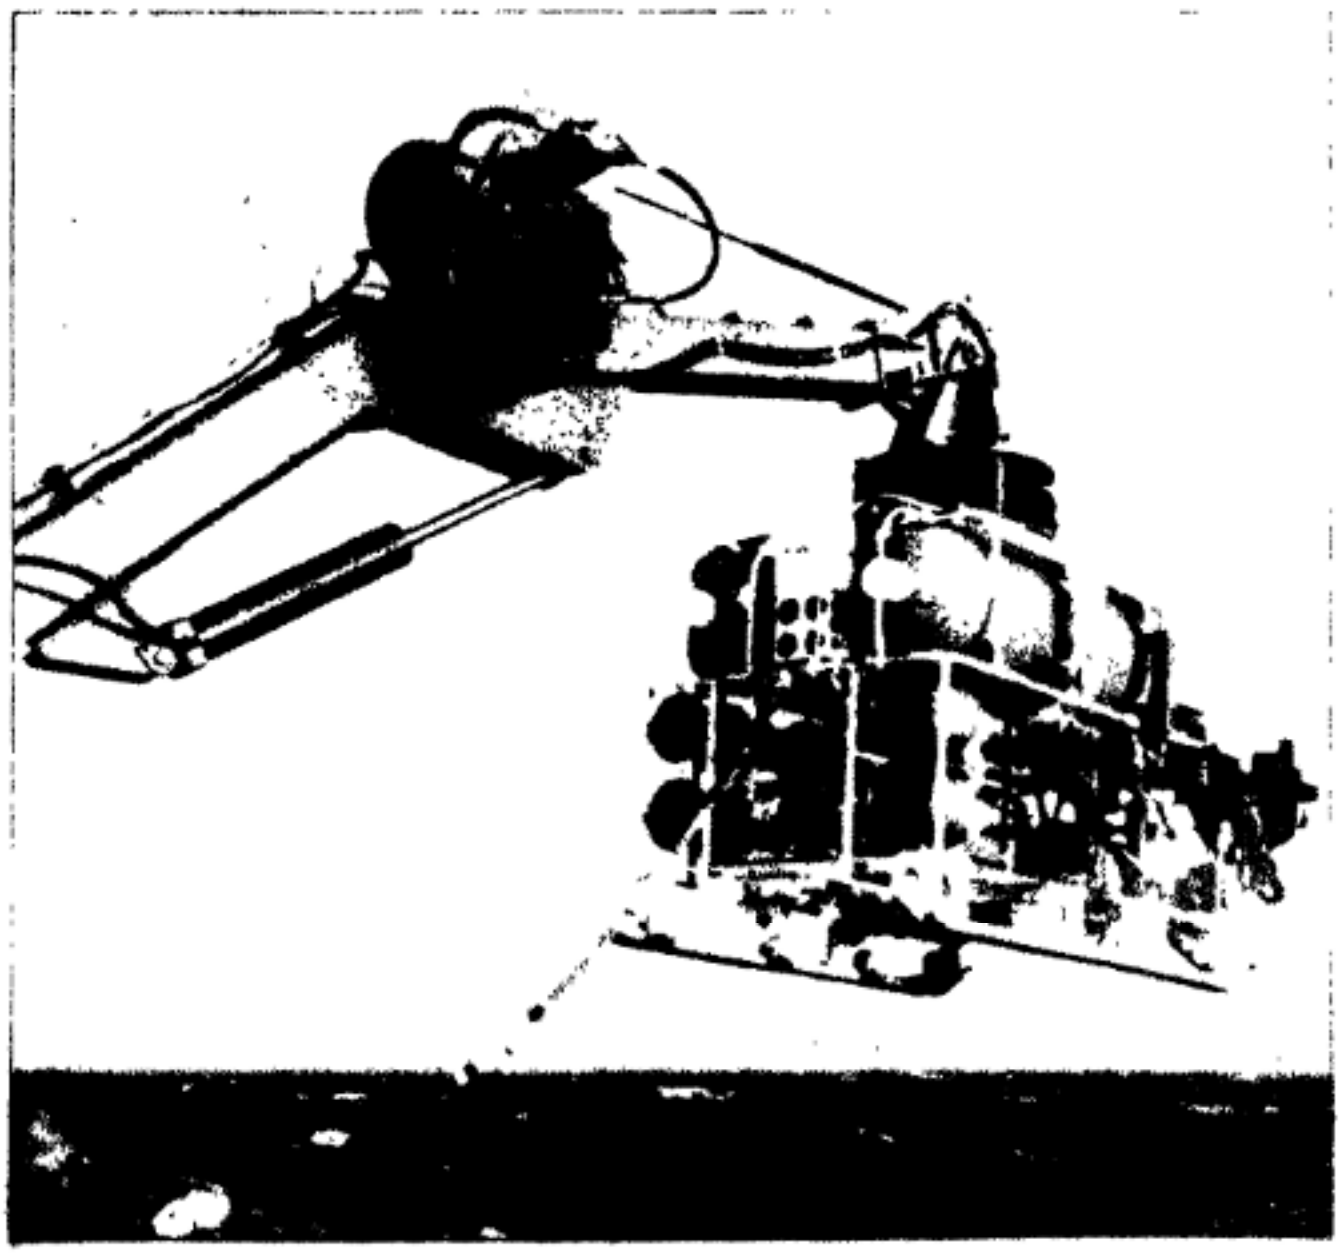
AIR INDIA CRASH

Evidence from the Deep

The explosion theory remains the most likely explanation

"Cruising at 31,000 feet. Speed: 850 kilometres. Direction: Heathrow. Everything normal." This was the last message that Captain H.S. Narendra of Kanishka the Air India Boeing 747, transmitted to the Shannon air control tower before it plunged into the Atlantic Ocean killing the 329 people on board. A split-second after the message was received, Flight 180 disappeared from the Shannon airport radar and only its fuselage was recovered from the ocean bed about 180 kms off the coast of Ireland. The 45 million dollar Jumbo Jet which had completed 23,600 hours of flying time disappeared within seconds and there is every indication that the aircraft went down with its engines running, after an explosion on board. However, the possibility of a structural defect or mechanical failure having caused the crash cannot be ruled out—at least till such time the decoding of the aircraft's "heart and lung," the cockpit voice recorder (CVR) and digital flight data recorder (DFDR) is completed.



The two critical instruments of the ill-fated Boeing, called "black boxes" though they are yellow-orange in colour, are the most vital pieces of evidence with the investigators who are reconstructing the events that led to the crash. The CVR and DFDR were recovered after a miraculous million dollar operation conducted for the first time at a depth of 6,700 feet below the sea. The instruments were successfully recovered from the seabed by the robot submersible named Scarab lowered by a French ship, Leon Thevenin The black boxes were brought to India on 13 July. Decoding of the data has begun in Bombay at the Bhabha Atomic Research Centre (BARC) and the Tata Institute of Fundamental Research (TIFR). Decoding of a similar nature was done after the air crashes of 1976 and 1978. The CVR and the DFDR are likely to provide invaluable assistance to the enquiry commission headed by Justice D.N. Kirpal in discovering the nature of the crash.

In 1978, when another Air India Jumbo had crashed off the Bombay coast, it had taken searchers 27 days to regain the black boxes from a depth of no more than 70 feet. In this case, the salvage team was scouring the seabed 6,700 feet below the surface Never in the history of civil aviation had such an ambitious venture been embarked upon by any airline to recapture the vital recorders. In fact, both in financial and technological terms,this attempt was quite unprecedented. And the diligence was rewarded. In the early hours of Wednesday, 10 July, Scarab I spotted the CVR and in another few hours, had successfully hauled it on to the mother ship. The robot was lowered once more and by the following morning, the DFDR too had been lifted on board the Leon Thevenin

The Scarab is an incredible machine, and an unqualified compliment to Man's ingenuity. It is designed to assist firms like Britain's Cable and Wireless and the United States' A.T. and T to lay communication networks below the sea. Armed with a powerful searchlight, aided by television cameras and equipped with manipulator arms, Scarab I identified the black boxes, picked them up and delivered them safely on to the Leon Tivinen, being monitored manually at all times from this vessel.

Thereafter, and in view of the water pressure exerted on these recorders for two and a half weeks, the CVR and the DFDR were placed in water cans to simulate the earlier prevailing conditions, and prevent any possible shocks on the systems. It was in this state that the black boxes were brought to Cork, put on an Aer Lingus flight to London en route to the Air India flight to Bombay.

After the Kanishka crash, the "black boxes" which are present inside every aircraft have suddenly become household words. The decoding of the electronic messages inside the two small instruments (which will be complete by September this year) is being anxiously watched by aviation experts across the world. The CVR is basically a small microphone mounted in an overhead panel in the cockpit of the aircraft and is electronically controlled to pick up any sound or warning. It is expected that the transcription of the magnetic tape inside the CVR would contain the voice of the pilot, instructions to the air control tower and the sound of explusion, if any.

The submersible robot Scarab, being lowered from its mother ship Leon Thevenin

When a Lockheed Electra broke up in the air in a similar fashion and crashed over Pennsylvania in the United States, the CVR recorded the sounds of the plane breaking up. The DFDR records the operation of the actual systems existing in the aircraft like the power setting of the engine and records the course of the aircraft, its altitude and airspeed to give evidence of any structural failure in the aircraft. There are about 300 parameters present in the DFDR. Till the end of July the computerised decoding of 40 parameters of Kanishka's DFDR had been completed.

While it would be too premature to assess the cause of the Kanishka accident, there is sufficient evidence to make one believe that a sudden explosion had taken place in the aircraft. For one, the aircraft disappeared suddenly from the radar screens and dropped like a stone into the sea. Its wreckage was spread over 20 square kilometres and its fuselage had disintegrated into tiny bits. Secondly, it must be remembered that there were as many as five safety controls in the Boeing that would have guided the aircraft to safety in the case of an engine failure. There were alternate, electronic, manual, and hydraulic controls and the Kanishka, flying at 31,000 ft had the capacity to glide for 50 miles in case of an engine failure. Another vital piece of evidence to support the explosion and sabotage theory is the autopsy report of the 130 victims of the tragedy, whose bodies were recovered from the seabed and taken to Cork for examination. The autopsy reports show that victims did not die from drowning but were killed in the air in less than half a minute after being sucked violently from the rear to the front of the aircraft. The force that caused their death was so strong that the victims had smashed their heads against the seats of the aircraft. The final evidence to support the explosion theory would be confirmed with the discovery of even a small particle of explosive substance from the 350 tonnes of debris of Kanishka still lying at the bottom of the sea.

The fact that Air India has chosen to consign the recorders back to India has been criticised by a few Western airlines. These companies and other vested interests are yet to reconcile themselves to India's technological progress and feel that the Indian authorities lack the capability to decipher the contents of the CVR and the DFDR.

The two black boxes in Kanishka were the latest and most sophisticated among those that are used on Jumbos, and may have a lot to tell if the last few seconds of this aircraft's airborne journey have not been missed due to the alleged total electrical failure. But there is some validity in the charge that Air India might have prematurely concluded about there having been an explosion in the forward luggage hold of the plane, which caused the tragedy.

Air India personnel unloading a box containing the black box at London airport

This, in fact, was confirmed to SUNDAY by an Air India official after Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi had said that that a bomb blast was behind the crash in a television interview on Britain's Channel No. four. Said the official, "It is still too early to pass a final judgment on the affair."

There are various lobbies operating to guide the progress of investigation. The Canadian authorities are supporting the theory that structural failure or mechanical defects had caused the explosion in an effort to prove that the lax security measures at Montreal airport did not cause the catastrophe. Any argument to support the theory of structural defect in the Air India Jumbo Jet is unfavourable for the American Boeing company whose business would suffer a major setback if it is proved so. The whole story of Flight 182 and the vital clues to the cause of the crash are still hidden in the two 40 pound black boxes which are being decoded under tight security.

water. Rayalaseema was also the scene of an important agitation last year, which NTR has just managed to control. It is therefore, imperative for NTR to fight for the fruition of the revised Telugu-Ganga Project, to prevent any more agitations in the area.

Karnataka's position is equally piquant. On the face of it, it would appear churlish to refuse water to Andhra Pradesh, especially since it has not utilised its own quota. But Deve Gowda claimed that the state has already "committed" the 700 tmc of water to various projects even when the projects themselves are in the doldrums for lack of funds. The Karnataka government believes that if it gives up its share today, it will suffer in the long run when its projects are completed. As Gowda remarked sarcastically: "They (Andhra Pradesh) are not spending 540 crores on the revised Telugu-Ganga Project as a temporary measure." What he meant was that once Karnataka leased out the water, Andhra Pradesh would demand it as a permanent right and since the water tribunal award can be revised after 2000 AD, it may even succeed in acquiring permanent rights, leaving Karnataka in the lurch. But it is apparent that the stances of both the state governments are controlled by political necessities rather than humanitarian considerations.

The complexities of the dispute apart, the controversy is hotting up every day. NTR on his part has sought to prove that the excess water rightfully belonged to Andhra Pradesh. At a press conference he quoted the clause 5HC of the Bachawat Award: "The state of Andhra Pradesh will be at liberty to use in any water year the remaining water that may be flowing in river Krishna..." But Deve Gowda bounced back with another press conference where he accused NTR of misquoting or not quoting the clause in full. Gowda said the same clause went on to read "...but thereby it shall not acquire any right whatsoever to use in any water year, nor be deemed to have been allocated in any water year, water of river Krishna in excess of quantities specified hereunder: 800 tmc to Andhra Pradesh, 700 tmc to Karnataka and 560 tmc to Maharashtra.

However, what has worsened the situation is the emotional response of NTR and the hawkish stance of Deve Gowda. NTR, in his inimitable style, declared that the work on the revised Telugu-Ganga Project, already underway, would go on no matter what objections were raised. Deve

Courtesy R.K. Laxman, Times of India

Gowda, on his part, declared that he would fight till the end to see that the spirit of the tribunal award was not violated and warned of serious repercussions if Andhra Pradesh violated the agreement. At the last count, the dispute was brought to the notice of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. In reply to newsmen's questions during his recent visit to Madras the Prime Minister indicated that he would personally talk to the chief ministers of the two states in a bid to resolve the dispute. All the same, for the time being, the Krishna water dispute joins the long list of interstate squabbles in the country.

KERALA

Merger Move

The Muslim Leagues to unite

The Muslim League which split in 1974 is now on the verge of a merger, proving that political ideologies come only after the needs of the community. At the time of going to press, the All India Muslim League (AIML) which has four MLAs, has decided to sever its alliance with the CPI(M) led Left Democratic Front (LDF) while the Indian Union Muslim League (IUML) with its ten MLAs is still with the ruling United Democratic Front (UDF). Ironically, it was the CPI(M) which served as a catalyst for the merger by attacking the Shariat or the Muslim personal law. The CPI(M) general secretary, E.M.S. Namboodripad had recently suggested that the Shariat aimed tosuppress womenand, he said, the CPI(M) cared more for the problems of the people than the support of the AIML. Naturally the AIML leaders have accepted the IUML resolution supporting the Shariat.

An IUML leader, Seethi Hajimla who said in the Assembly that any hand which is raised against the Shariat will be chopped off, told SUNDAY that EMS has been trying to woo women voters among the Muslims. "Shariat is a law given to us by Prophet and all Muslims have to live by that. Why should there be a common civil code? The Shariat is very clear on issues like marriage and divorce and gives utmost respect to women. The Shariat does not encourage polygamy either," she added.

That the united Muslim League will remain with the UDF is clear but there is a section in the AIML which feels that it should stay away from both the fronts. The United Muslim League will have 14 MLAs in the Assembly making it a strong pressure group within the UDF much to the discomfort of the Congress(I) which is watching with dismay the rise of small but powerful communal parties. Early this year, the two factions of the Kerala Congress (the Mani and the Joseph group) also merged, sparking off a unification trend in the state's political set-up which till recently has been characterised by fissiparous tendencies.

After the exit of the AIML the LDF will become "leftist" in the true sense of the term. A truly leftist front has always been the dream of EMS Namboodiripad but the state's communal politics has forced him to compromise.

The constituents of the UDF, especially the Kerala Congress are not happy with the Congress(I) especially after the incidents which forced their senior minister Balakrishna Pillai to resign. While the Congress(I) continues its campaign for one party rule, there are chances of the communal parties—the Kerala Congress, the Muslim League and the National Democratic Party (now two factions) uniting to form a communal front. Such a situation will only help the CPI(M) led LDF.

People in Kerala are quite disgusted with the policy of bargaining with communal parties, something which has characterised the three year rule of the UDF. And chief minister Karunakaran's rule-at-any-cost attitude is the main reason for such compromises. The state is also passing through a financial crisis.

The National Democratic Party of the high caste Nair Hindus is the only regional party which is now split. Their nominee in the ministry, Ramachandran Nair, the health minister, had to quit as the other faction wanted their nominee to be minister. The ruling front liaison committee has now asked the NDP factions to unite and then nominate a minister.

CONGRESS(I)

No Entry for Now

Sharad Pawar keeps his options open

Will Congress(S) leader Sharad Pawar, who has been asked to postpone his entry into Congress(I) for the moment, hit back at the volte face by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi? Politically it had been a slur on Pawar's image when Rajiv Gandhi answering a question about Sharad Pawar joining the Congress(I), in a televised press conference, said, "not for the moment." But sources close to Pawar said that he had been given to understand that after former chief minister Vasantdada Patil was eased out, he would be given the chief minister's chair. Rajiv Gandhi's decision to defer Pawar's entry following Vasantdada Patil's resignation has only added to the former CM's strength at the cost of Mr Pawar's image. But a section of his followers feel that Patil's resignation has affected Pawar's course of entry into the ruling party, though it is clear that Vasantdada Patil timed his exit to queer the pitch for Mr Pawar. Vasantdada Patil also made "self respect" an issue so that it was difficult for Mr Pawar to enter the Congress(I).

That Sharad Pawar was hurt by Vasantdada Patil's action was obvious when he chose to attack the former chief minister in his speech in reply to the budget proposals. In a scathing attack on Mr Patil in the state Legislative Assembly, Pawar said that those who have resigned on the issue of self-respect of the state, should have done it on some concrete issues rather than on personal grounds. He added that the state leadership has failed to protest against the proposals of the union government which were not in the interest of the state. Mr Pawar also said that there were three CM;s who spoke about taking up the 'no industry district' issue with the centre and though they have gone, the policy continues at the expense of the state.

Sharad Pawar: minor setback

Mr Pawar has several political options.He can wait till Rajiv Gandhi invites him to join the party. He can also work towards toppling the government of Shivajirao Patil-Nilangekar . There is tremendous discontent in the party as Mr Patil's cabinet is still very heavily loaded in favour of one section of the Congress(I). There are various sections that are dissatisfied because they are not represented in the cabinet and till today, the chief minister has not been able to clear his five nominees for membersip in the Legislative Council.

The party's functioning in the state still seems to be dictated by the whims of the AICC(I) observers. For instance, G.K. Moopanar, AICC(I) general secretary, recently wrote to the MPCC(I) president Mrs Prabha Rao, recommending the name of a person for the seat for minorities in the council. Mr Moopanar, with or without the consent of the Prime Minister, wrote that Mr Rajiv Gandhi was among the MLAs, MPs and other party members who wanted Mr S. Khan to get the seat.

Mr Patil-Nilangekar's ministry seems a stable one but its moment of truth will come after the monsoon session of the Assembly ends in early August. He will then have to expand his cabinet which he has been promising for some months, and it will be a moment when his troubles will begin anew. Sharad Pawar who believes in manipulative politics is waiting for this opportunity. It is believed that many legislators have been meeting him and he needs about 54 persons to walk out of the Congress(I). According to sources close to him, such a situation may arise and that, they conclude, would be the best way of paying back Rajiv Gandhi.

Pawar has no love lost for the Patil-Nilangekar government,a fact obvious from the way he supported the Shiv Sena in the mayoral elections in Bombay. Members of his party have asserted that they shared their first and second preference votes with the Janata Party and Bharatiya Janata Party in the recent elections to the Legislative Council and gave their third preference votes to the Shiv Sena which enabled Sudhir Joshi to be elected after Congress(I)'s Satish Pednekar was eliminated in the third round of voting.

TAMIL NADU

All Set for a Comeback

Rajiv Gandhi's visit boosts Congress(I)'s image

The massive Congress rally in Madras on 15 July might lead to the resurrection of the party in Tamil Nadu. For 18 years the Congress had been confined to political wilderness by the Tamils who were bitten by the Dravida bug. Under Mrs Gandhi's leadership the party adopted a strategy of political expediences, marrying and divorcing one of the Dravida parties without any qualms. The Congress(I)'s alliance with the AIADMK in 1977 was broken and a new relationship established with the DMK in 1980. As the DMK's fortunes began to sag, Mrs Gandhi with characteristic insouciance, veered close to the AIADMK that was soaring to new realms of popularity under MGR. The Congress(I) AIADMK alliance was a resounding success in the 1984 Lok Sabha and Assembly elections.

All along, the Congress leaders in Tamil Nadu were puppets in the hands of the Delhi based bigwigs of the party. The party fell into utter bad times with no local support, no credibility, total inertness in the party's rank and file, rampant factionalism and above all no local leaders of stature.

On 13 July one saw a new, revitalised and exuberant Congress in the state. The sheer high spirits of the party cadre talks about an upswing in the party's fortunes in the years to come. The Congress rally was held to mark the centenary celebrations. It was held on 15 July to coincide with the 83rd birth anniversary of the late Congress stalwart K. Kamaraj. The procession was ten kms long with Congress volunteers packed like sardines. In between the thick surge of people were the vans and gaudy floats depicting the various landmarks in the history of the Congress. Apart from the staggering size of the rally, what was noteworthy was the excitement that generated about having a darshan of Rajiv Gandhi.

All credit for the thundering success of the rally goes to G.K. Moopanar the AICC(I) general secretary. His men were given the charge to conduct the rally. Mr Palaniyandi, Mr Ramamoorthy and others belonging to the Moopanar clique, attended to the arrangements with zeal and meticulous care.

The security that was provided for the PM was unprecedented. The entire area was sealed so that the public was not allowed to witness the procession from where the special dias was erected for the PM to watch the colourful pageantry. The dias was shielded on three sides and from the top with 15 mm steel plates thick enough to stop a bullet fired from a powerful rifle from a distance of 100 metres.

At the press conference, when he was asked if the massive rally led him to believe that the Congress could now stand on its own feet and stage a comeback in Tamil Nadu, the PM said, "I hope so. I have always said, even when I was a general secretary of the AICC(I), that the Congress should stand on its own feet. That policy has not changed." However, he hastened to add that it did not imply that the arrangement with the AIADMK would be terminated.

Concert for Ethiopia

More than 160,000 people crowded into the Wembley and JFK stadiums at London and Philadelphia respectively on 13 July for the Live Aid rock concert organised to raise $50 million for the victims of the famine in Ethiopia. The Soviet Union was among the hundred countries which participated in the 16-hour telecast and Poland paid $20 per minute for live television coverage. The picture above shows participants David Bowie and Paul McCartney (left and centre) and right, Tina Turner with Mick Jagger. Others who took part include Joan Baez, Santana, The Who and Crosby, Stills and Nash. The show was organised by Irish rock star Bob Geldof (above right).

TENNIS

Indian Summer at Wimbledon

Vijay Amritraj and Ramesh Krishnan enthrall tennis-lovers

Like two kites in a summer wind, Vijay Amritraj and Ramesh Krishnan soared high in the Wimbledon skies belying the void that exists in Indian tennis. As always, they did India proud. As always, they fell when greater success seemed within their grasp.

Vijay Amritraj, flashing his captivating smile provided welcome relief to spectators whose senses continue to be assaulted by the behaviour and utterances of some of the top stars. His victory over the talented 11th seeded Frenchman Yannick Noah was the piece de resistance of his Wimbledon journey. The dusky Frenchman, an exciting physical player who moves magnificently and flings himself acrobatically to retrieve impossible shots, seemed to be handicapped by an injury to his left thigh. A Frenchman sitting next to me in the press box confided that Noah is afflicted by an unidentifiable virus. I can still see him virus and all, chasing an Amritraj dropshot, bounding from behind the baseline like a gazelle, getting his racket to the ball before it died, but hitting it into the net, then vaulting the net, and confronting a surprised Amritraj "eye-ball" to "eye-ball." Ever since he won the French Championships in 1983, Noah has slipped into a valley, pinned down by niggling injuries and mental pressures, imprisoned in the demanding pressures of an over enthusiastic French public.

Vijay Amritraj, in sharp contrast, with his back strapped in a support, conserved his stamina, measured his effort in short bursts of powerful serve and decisive volley. Vijay made the breakthroughs by chipping his opponent's service on the rise and moving rapidly to the net, hustling his opponent and putting pressure on him to produce a winning volley out of Vijay's telescopic reach. It was a tactic that paid rich dividends and could have also got him past Heinz Guenthardt of Switzerland for a place in the last eight. But Vijay had drawn deeply on his limited reservoir of stamina and the wiry, wily Guenthardt, an expert doubles player, found the correct angles and openings once too often. Noah had taken the sting out of Vijay's game.

For Vijay the vintage years are fading away, the sleek deadly breathtaking winners which stunned the greatest players in the game, are few and far between. It is sad that his rich talent could not blossom into a victory in one of the Grand Slam tournaments. It seems he lacked the perseverance and the all consuming effort to reach the summit. Having said that, one wonders if a few lucky breaks in some of the epic matches he lost at Wimbledon, would have catapulted him to the top of the tennis world.

Ramesh Krishnan, who unlike Vijay, has less behind, and more ahead of him, had his best Wimbledon ever. To the cognisant the Krishnan magic is like a magnet. They enjoy the cool inscrutable facial mask with the smooth, silent but deadly counterpunch which is the hallmark of Ramesh's game. One of the rungs to the very top, is an additional demolishing shot, like Lendl's forehand, or Connors' doublehander, or McEnroe's service. This, it seems, is what he lacked, when he had Connors by the jugular—a set each and 5 games to 2 in the third. Connors moved into an audibly higher gear, as he pulled out an extra step from his 33-year-old limbs, to chase Krishnan's shots like a predator making a kill. He broke loose from Krishnan's grasp and hammered his way to a decisive victory. A total fifteen service breaks in this match were the statistics which highlighted the very high quality service return of both players and a need for Ramesh to develop more penetration and variation on his serve. By Spartan training and dedication, he has built up his stamina and sharpened his game and reflexes, under the watchful eye of his father and Harry Hopman, to top international level. Hopman was enthusiastic and optimistic about Ramesh's chances of climbing higher and did not rule out hopes of success in some of the major tournaments.

Where would Indian tennis have been but for the Krishnan and Amritraj families? In a very tough world, they have overcome the shortcomings in the Indian tennis scene, with amazing dedication and enterprise and total family support so rare in modern tennis.

INDO-PAK RELATIONS

The Big Chill

Good neighbourliness gives way to bad blood

Relations between India and Pakistan have recently touched a new low. While there have been many sweet words and gestures of friendship and of good neighbourliness during the recent Indo-Pakistan joint commission meeting held during the first week of July in New Delhi, relations soured thereafter. Although the report made by American Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) of Pakistan's successful testing last month of US-made Krytron electronic triggers for nuclear bombs, may not have come as a big surprise to the India government, this report as well as Pakistan President Zia-ul Haq's recent references to Kashmir just two weeks before Pakistan foreign secretary Niaz Naik's visit to India have worsened relations between the two countries considerably.

Moreover, reports of the special court trial in Lahore of the 14 persons who highjacked the two Indian Airlines planes to Lahore (1981 and 1984) have increased tension between India and Pakistan. On 11 July, Harminder Singh, one of those on trial for the 1984 highjacking, is reported to have said in court: "Has not India highjacked an entire state with millions of people in retaining its control over the territory in Jammu and Kashmir?" Harminder Singh, as reported in the Pakistani papers on 12 July is said to have told the court that the two objectives of the highjacking were to draw the attention of the world to the "determination of the Sikh community to set up an independent homeland and to bring India's illegal detention of Kashmir to an end."

The trial is being seen here as an attempt by the Pakistan government to politicise the proceedings in order to use the special court as a platform for propaganda against India. The inclusion of Ganga Singh Dhillon, an American citizen, in the list of defence witnesses (this list has not yet been sent to India) has also provoked sharp reactions in New Delhi. G.S. Dhillon (whose wife is a close friend of President Zia's wife—the two women grew up in Kenya) made a few provocative statements when he visited Nankana Saheb in Pakistan last November. The Nawai Waqt of 6 November 1984 quoted G.S. Dhillon as saying that "the persons who had murdered Indira Gandhi were held in the same esteem as was Alamdin in the eyes of the Muslims." In the 23 November issue of Jasarat Dhillon said, "Indira Gandhi's assassins are heroes for us." Dhillon is also reported to have said in Nawai Waqt that Sikh troops in the Indian army would not remain silent anymore Nor would Sikh employees working in the Indian government remain silent spectators.

Ironically, the holding of the trial was initially seen an indication of Pakistan's sincere efforts to improve its relations with India. It can be recalled that 1984 was a bad year for Indo Pak relations: with the Indian government accusing the government of Pakistan of encouraging terrorism in India. The two foreign secretaries had met in Islamabad last May and were scheduled to meet again in New Delhi later in the year to discuss bilateralism, but the meeting was called off because the Indian government believed that Pakistan was training pro-Khalistan elements

In April this year, after the announcement of the trial of the hijackers of the two Indian Airlines planes, foreign secretary Romesh Bhandari went to Islamabad. In July, the Indo-Pakistan joint commission met in New Delhi and at the end of the month the two foreign secretaries were supposed to meet once again in New Delhi. But the olive branches soon withered and old suspicions re-surfaced. When the two foreign secretaries met in Islamabad in April, the Pakistani officials led the Indians to believe that the trial of the highjackers would be over in three months. The trial is far from over.

Trade was the biggest stumbling block during the joint commission meeting Interestingly enough, President Zia in July 1978, in his first import policy announcement after he took over, banned trade with India and in January 1980, President Zia compared Kashmir to Palestine and Namibia during the Islamic foreign minister's press conference The question now doing the rounds in South Block must be: 'What does the General next door really want: war or peace?"

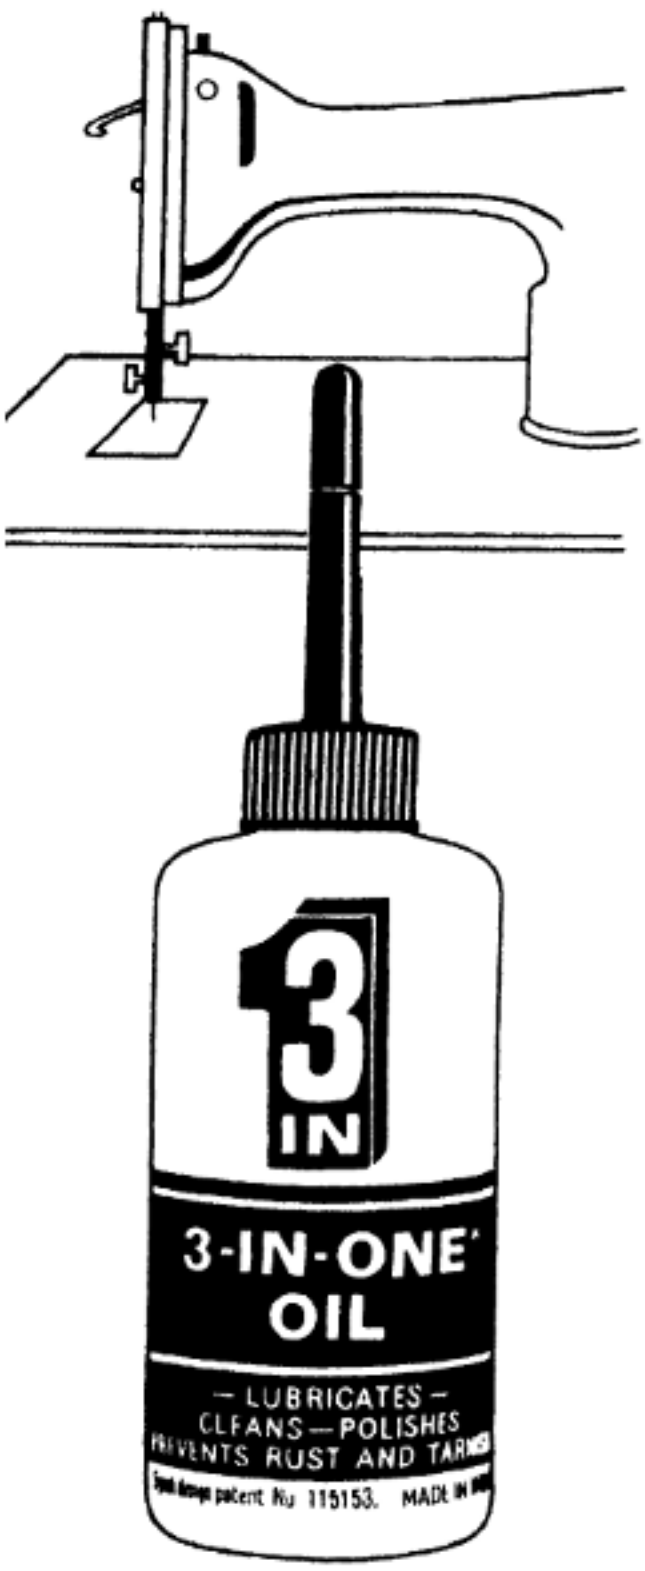
THIMPHU TALKS

Slow Progress



The negotiations are adjourned till 12 August

The most significant outcome of the peace talks arranged by India in Thimphu between the Tamils and the representatives of the Sri Lanka government is that the Tamil militants have been dragged from the battlefield into the negotiating table. Since the racial holocaust of 1983, the militants have emerged as a force to reckon with and in the circumstances, any settlement arrived at without the participation of the militants would be futile. But for the first time, the militants were recognised as a political force by the Sri Lanka government. This is a moral victory for the guerillas.

The militants, unfortunately, reacted negatively and at first, boycotted the talks in protest against the "serious violations" of the cease-fire agreement by the Sri Lankan armed forces. It was difficult for the militants to overcome their fear that the Sri Lanka government was out to cheat them. They felt that the Thimphu talks would meet with the same fate as the All Party Conference (APC) of 1984 when the TULF lost face. The militants maintained that they could be brought to the negotiating table only if the Sri Lanka government first submitted to the demands for regional autonomy.

They felt their participation in the talks would equate them with the TULF in the eyes of their people. One can understand the government of India's problem. It had taken a considerable amount of pressure to get the Sri Lanka government to agree to negotiate with the militants whom they had described as terrorists. But just when they had persuaded the Sri Lanka government, the Tamil militants proved to be intransigent.

The centre summoned the leaders of the four main militant groups that have formed the Eelam National Liberation Front. Stressing the imperative need to attend the talks, India impresed upon the militants certain inevitable advantages of the Thimphu talks. First by negotiating with the militants, the Sri Lanka government has agreed to recognise them as freedom fighters who represent political aspirations of the Tamil people. The political legitimacy given to the militants by the Sri Lanka government has made India's position easier. India can no longer be accused of harbouring Tamil 'terrorists.' But the militants' total rejection of the TULF was unreasonable in the context of the negotiations. The TULF had an advantage because of their sheer experience in this sphere as the militants are novices in the art of negotiations and need a 'guiding force.' Regarding the militants' fear about the insincerity of the Sri Lanka government it has been said that if the Sri Lanka government again failed to put forward a proposal that met the legitimate aspirations of the Tamils it would stand indicted in the eyes of the world. If the Sri Lankan government is insincere, then the Indian government would have the moral sanction to take appropriate steps to solve the problems of the Tamils.

With India's persuasion, the Thimphu talks got going from 8 July. The Sri Lankan delegation was led by the President's brother and legal expert Hector Jayewardene. The Tamils were represented by the TULF, the PLOT and the ENLF that comprises LTTE, EROS, EPRLE and TELO. The talks which were restricted to violations of ceasefire began under high security and total secrecy. Even at Thimphu, one of the world's most geographically isolated places, elaborate care was taken to ensure that the participants were cordoned off and no information was given out to journalists.

The talks which began on a cordial note progressed well as long as it focused upon the strict implementation of ceasefire. The Sri Lanka delegation announced the release of 643 Tamil political detenus (according to official figures there are 1197 prisoners while the Tamils claim that 2500 persons are under arrest). However, the talks ran into rough weather over the question of regional autonomy. Mr Jayewardene's offer of the district councils was in principle identical to what was presented to the TULF at the time of the All Party Conference in December 1984 and was totally rejected by the Tamils. As Mr Balasingham, official spokesman of the LTTE told SUNDAY "How can they expect the militants to accept proposals which even the moderates (the TULF) rejected?" As the talks threatened to break down with the Tamils rejecting the proposals which did not in any way fulfil the aspirations of their people and the Sri Lankans inclined to adopt a 'take it or leave it' attitude Romesh Bhandari, the Indian foreign secretary rushed to Thimphu to resume the talks which were then adjourned till 12 August. Significantly it is the first time that the Tamils have been able to put up a strong united front. This itself is half the battle won because the Sri Lankan government had quite previously capitalised on the internal dissensions among the Tamils.

Mr Balasingham made it clear that the Thimphu talks could be resumed only if the Sri Lanka government first puts forward fresh proposals for regional autonomy. They would require a new set of proposals as a basis for negotiations. However, at a press conference in Madras on 15 July, Rajiv Gandhi indicated that it would not be proper for the Tamils to establish these sort of preconditions. Mr Balasingham emphasised that the militants could not afford to extend the ceasefire in view of the arms purchases by the Sri Lanka government. The government has been shopping for guns, ammunition, gunboats and aircraft from Pakistan and China while the ceasefire is in force. Moreover, men are being sent for commando training in Pakistan. In the circumstances it would be suicidal for the militants to extend the ceasefire.

The Tamil militants deny reports that India is favouring them. They have claimed that India is exerting pressure both on the Tamils as well as the Sri Lanka government. However, the militants have urged India not to force them to accept proposals that do not meet the legitimate aspirations of the Tamils unless the Sri Lanka government's proposals are meaningful and effective.

SRI LANKA

The Plot to Kill Jayewardene

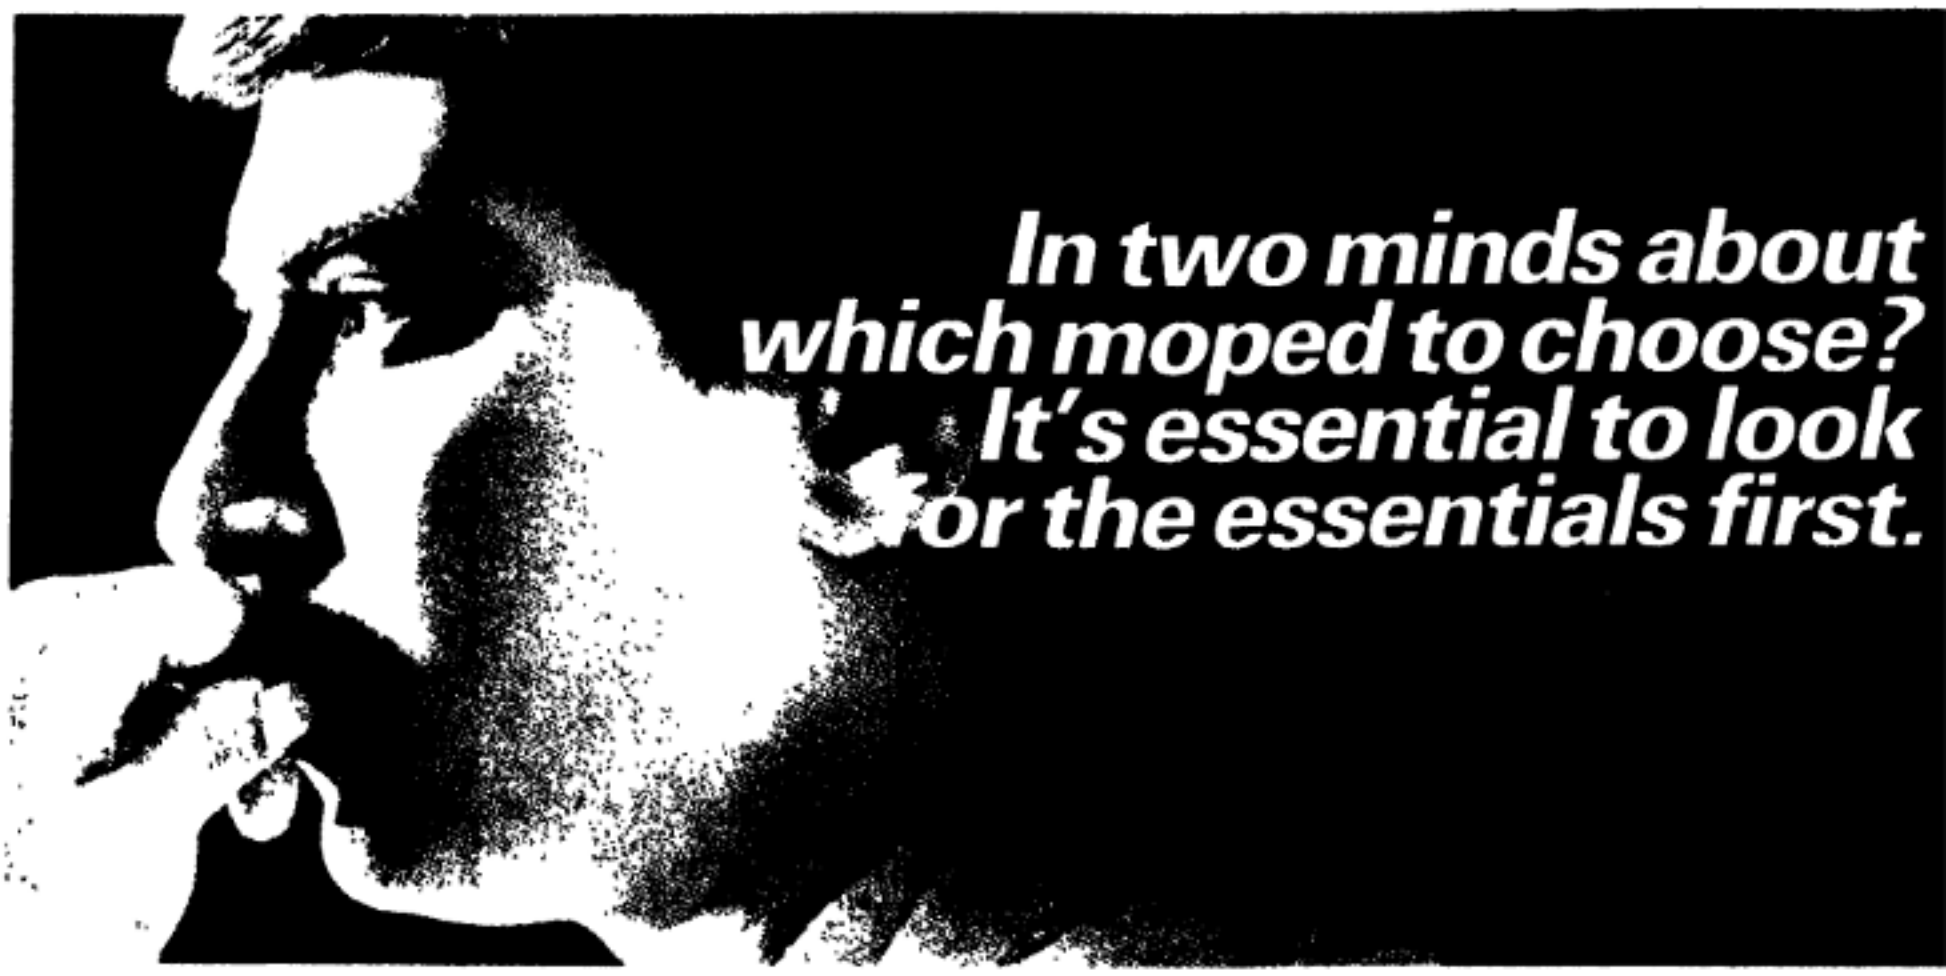
Was it a move to discredit the Tamils?

The bomb plot to allegedly kill President Jayewardene in Colombo on 11 July has led to more scepticism than outrage. The 'sensational disclosure' prompts question marks, not exclamation marks. There was something so fishy about the whole episode that the Sri Lanka government allowed the incident to fizzle out. And that in itself causes eyebrows to be raised.

On 11 July at a hurriedly convened press conference, minister of state Anandatisa De Alwis announced that an alert police officer had foiled a plot by the Eelam Revolution Organisation of Students (EROS) to kill the President. According to him, at 6.45 am, the police officer detected three persons behaving in a suspicious manner in a jeep parked near the St Lucia cathedral about three kms from the President's office. He noticed that the youths were fiddling with a device inside the vehicle. The police officer tried to apprehend the youths, but though he managed to capture the driver, the other two ran away. One of them, however, was caught by the public and handed over. Two packages of Indian made gelignite weighing 50 kg and 70 kg, wired together with a timing device set for 9.00 am were seized from the vehicle. Three youths, Ranganathan, Ranjan and Jeyakumar, all belonging to the EROS were arrested. According to Mr De Alwis, the youths confessed that the target was the Presidential secretariat as the President would have been driving in to his office at the time of the explosion.

The amateurishness of the whole plot made it look highly suspect. The EROS has successfully exploded bombs in and around Colombo. Since the July holocaust of 1983, the EROS exploded eight bombs in Colombo including the bomb blast at the Lanka Oberoi Hotel in September 1984. They were also behind the bomb blast at the Katunayake airport during British Premier Margaret Thatcher's visit and also masterminded the bomb blast at the army headquarters on 29 April 1985 in which four military advisors and two sentries were killed. In this blast, the Taj Samudra and the Intercontinental Hotel were also damaged. In the circumstances it is difficult to believe that they would have failed so badly in this attempt. Another fact that raises doubts is that the press had published that the President was suffering from influenza. He had cancelled all engagements and was recuperating at home. Again, it is difficult to believe that the EROS members did not check this before attempting to assassinate the President.

Strangely, a number of contradictory statements were issued by the government. While De Alwis claimed that the target was the President's secretariat, the Colombo police indicated that the bomb was probably meant to be placed at the Colombo High Court which is now hearing the case of a Roman Catholic priest, Father Abaranam Sinnarayer, who has been charged under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. The timing of the alleged bomb blast is significant. It came the day after the Tamils had rejected outright, the proposals for autonomous district councils put forward by Hector Jayewardene in Thimphu where the peace talks were going on. The Tamils are therefore convinced that the whole plot was stagemanaged by the Sri Lanka government to discredit the Tamil militant organisations. According to the Tamils, the plot was a move to sabotage the Thimphu talks so that the Sri Lanka government could wriggle out of a political settlement with the Tamils while shifting the blame for the breakdown in the talks on them.



All the six Tamil groups have denied the involvement of EROS in the bomb plot. The denials were issued at Thimphu and at Madras. The Eelam National Liberation Front comprising the four main militant groups including the EROS stated, "The Sri Lankan defence ministry, the police headquarters and the information ministry have come out with contradictory statements which indicate that the story is a baseless lie invented by the Sri Lankan government to tarnish the image of the Eelam Liberation movement. The adoption of such notorious tactics clearly shows that the Sri Lanka government has no sincere intention to bring about a fair and just solution to the Eelam national question by peaceful negotiations."

In an interview with SUNDAY, the 35-year-old executive committee member of EROS, V. Balakumar said, "Our organisation has never believed in annihilation of individuals. We have consistently been against murders and bank robberies. In fact, we have had differences of opinion with other Eelam groups over these issues. Our main emphasis has been to damage tourism and to deliver a lethal blow to Sri Lanka's economy. This is why we have been staging bomb blasts in Colombo, particularly in hotels so that tourists will be forced to keep away from Sri Lanka. In some of the blasts, a few persons have been killed accidentally, but it has never been our intention to kill an individual." According to him, a few members of EROS have been arrested. When asked whether a dissident group of the EROS was responsible for the blast, Mr Balakumar said, "Yes, I have also heard this version. It is just not true. Our entire group is committed to observing the cease-fire. We have no dissidence because decisions are taken at a grassroot level and transmitted upwards. However, I would like to add that dissidence may raise its head if the cease-fire is prolonged."

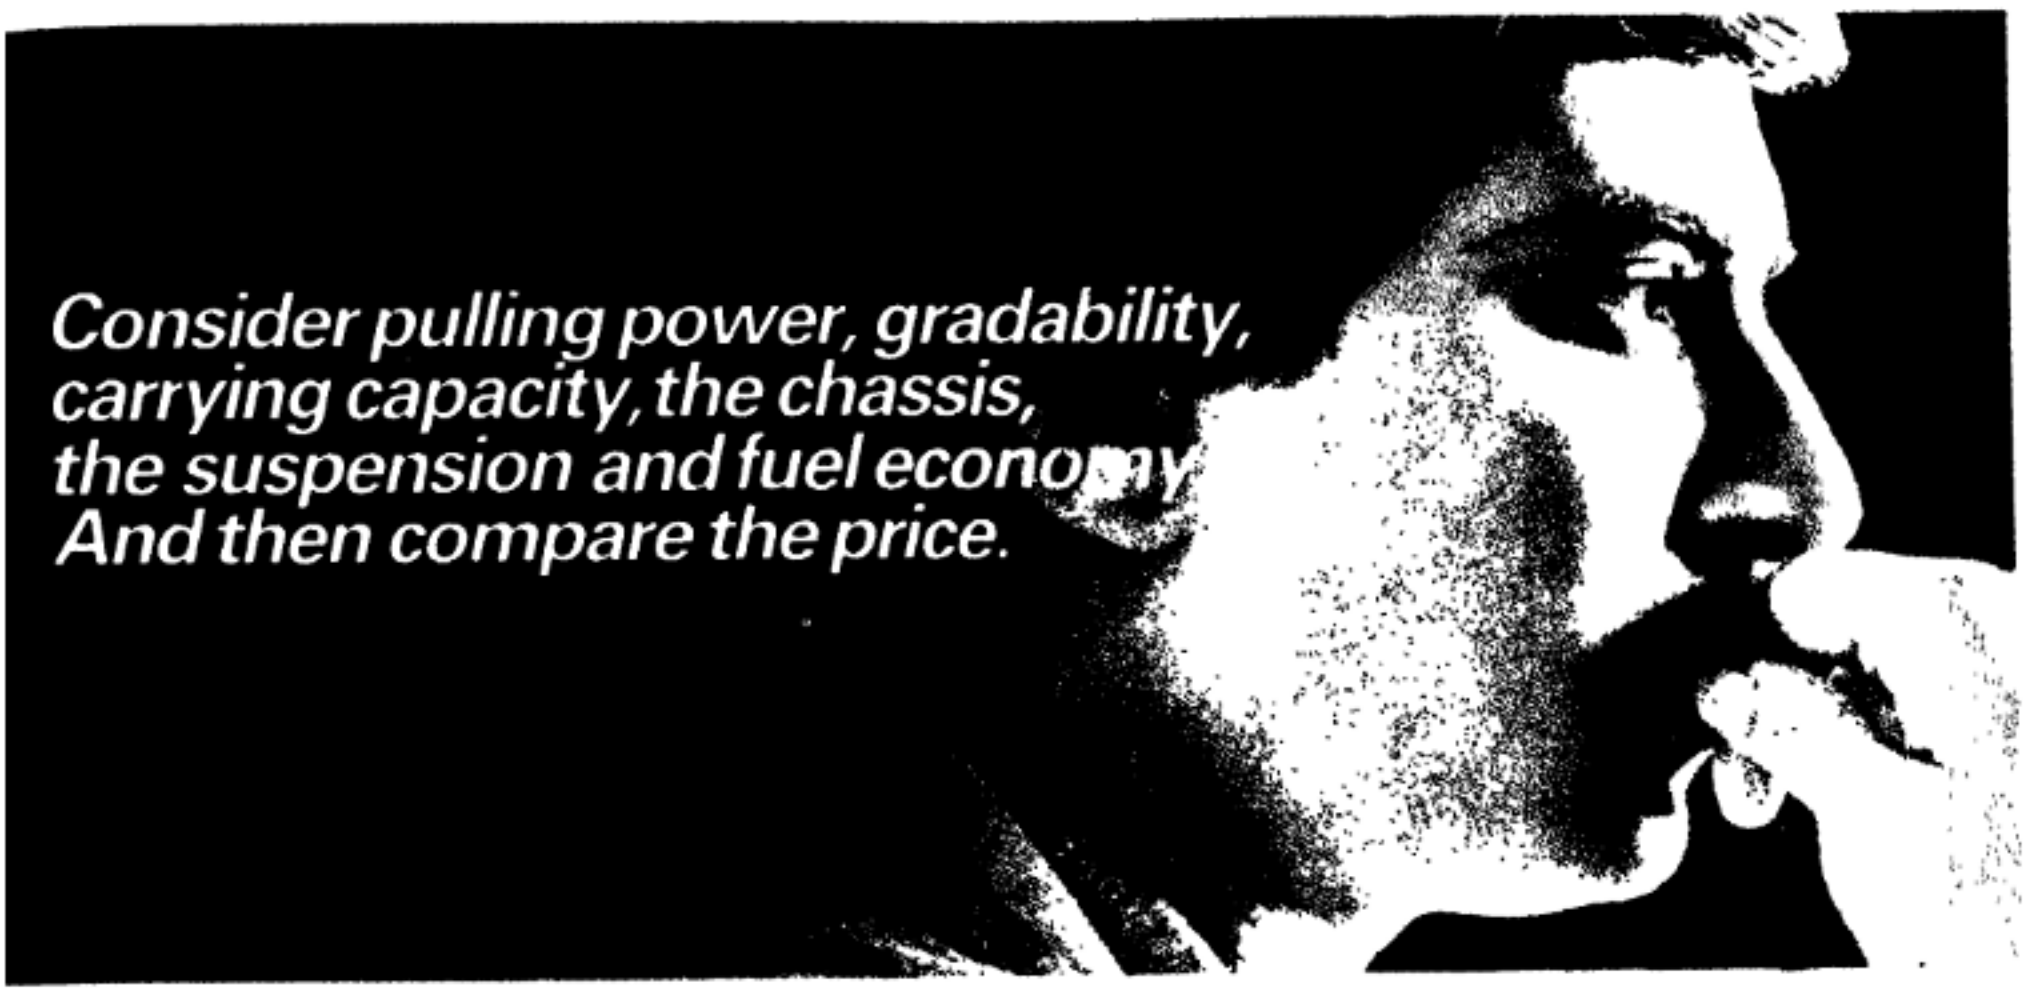
President Jayewardene: survives

In two minds about which moped to choose? It's essential to look for the essentials first.



When you're looking around for a moped, look beyond the frills. At things that really matter. And you'll discover what makes the TVS 50 XL your best bet.

To begin with, it is specifically created for two. Its engine is the most powerful one in its class, with an unusually high torque. So its pulling power is greater. And it can easily go up slopes, even doubles. It has a payload capacity of 130 kg. So it's a real work-horse.

Its chassis too is a lot sturdier. As for the suspension, it has hydraulic shock absorbers with variable rated springs. The kind you find on bigger bikes. So naturally, it can tackle varying road and load conditions with ease.

CD TVS SUNDARAM-CLAYTON LTD

Here are its outstanding features:

- The most powerful engine—it delivers 2.13 BHP with an unusually high torque of 3.6 Nm.
- Uniquely engineered transmission with twin-plate clutch and chain drive for efficient power delivery.
- Specially designed variable rated shock absorbers and dual seat for riding comfort.
- Rugged, single-piece tubular chassis to cut out wobble and unsteadiness, for precise handling and safety.
- Unique Reed Valve induction assures high fuel efficiency and better pick-up.

In just five years, TVS mopeds have crossed the 3,00,000 mark. And proved their superiority. Country-wide.

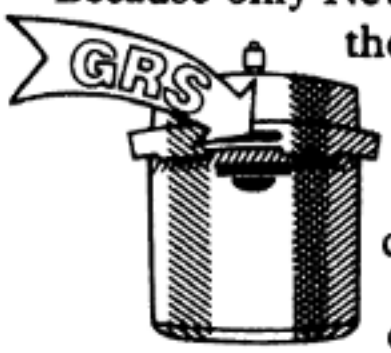
Do you really love your wife?



How much you really love your wife has a lot to do with the pressure cooker you will get for her. If you like your wife just a little, just about any pressure cooker will do. Love her a little more? Buy her a better, a little more reliable one.

But if you love her more than you love life itself, get her the pressure cooker that is the safest. Get her the New Prestige.

Why is New Prestige the safest?

100% SAFE

Because only New Prestige has the unique gasket release system (GRS) — a unique safety device built into the lid of the cooker — that makes it 100% safe.

If the weight vent gets clogged, excess steam builds up inside and if you have a spurious safety plug, it could prove a risk to the person nearest the cooker. With the New Prestige, the excess steam pushes out the gasket which lets out the steam safely, surely, downwards.

Push in the gasket with a spoon and the pressure cooker is ready for use again.

There is never the slightest worry when it's a New Prestige. That's why it's the safest pressure cooker you can buy. For someone you love.

If you truly love your wife, how can you refuse to get her a Prestige!

The Small Screen

With the airing of Titliyaan, a satire on the eccentricities of high society women, Shobha Doctor has become a name to reckon with in the field of TV serials. Besides being the chief executive of Concept Advertising, she has also successfully put out four programmes on the national network as an independent producer. Inspired by the success of Modella Ghazals, one of the first independent productions to be televised, Shobha went on to make her next serial, Humlog which still continues to be a crowd-puller. Though the credits claim that the serial is co-produced by Doordarshan and Time and Video Communications (which is Shobha's production company), it is difficult to believe that Doordarshan's contribution is more than token. Humlog is also the only programme which is aired during prime time twice a week. Shobha has also received an offer of extension for Idhar Udhar which was stopped after a few episodes. But it is rumoured that she was not happy with the way the serial was shaping up, and has turned down the offer.

Manju Singh (right) and Dimpi Khera, co-producers of Show Theme

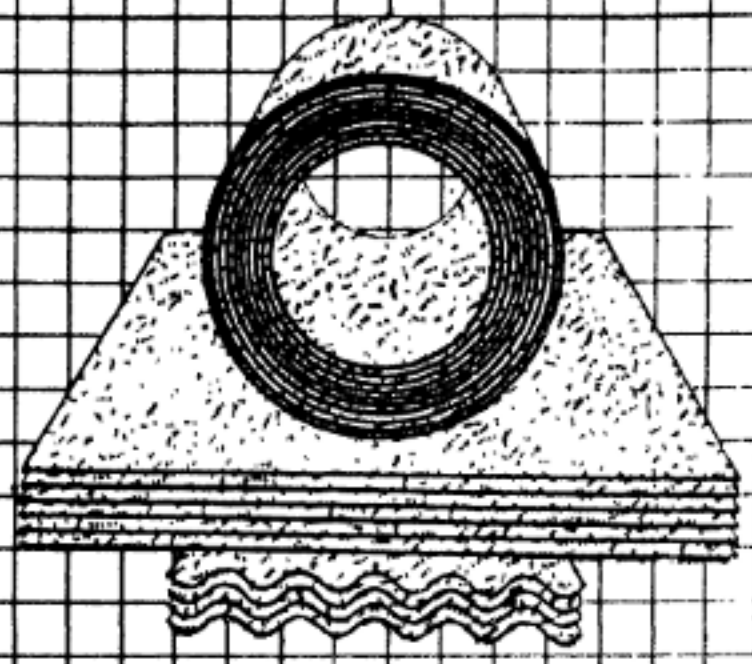
Another successful producer Manju Singh, whose Show Theme lasted for over a year (65 instalments), has got the go-ahead from Doordarshan for her new serial Ek Kahani. The programme scheduled to be televised from August will feature a 20-minute-play based on short stories written by contemporary Indian writers. At the beginning of each serial a three-minute time will be devoted to introducing the authors.

Amrita Pritam's Junglee Booti is ready for viewing. According to Manju, when the Jnanpith Award winner saw a recording of the play, she was moved to tears. The director is Dayal Nihalani, the one-time assistant to Shyam Benegal.

More and more filmmakers are joining the sitcom bandwagon. Kundan Shah, who directed Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi, was followed by Sai Paranjpye (Ados Pados). Basu Chatterjee too joined the fray with Rajani. And now Anil Jejani, who had made a film, Partner, a couple of years back, is currently busy with a serial called Bambai Meri Hai whose cast includes Benjamin Gillani, Madhuri Dixit and Mazhar Khan.

Shekhar Kapur who failed to make an impression on the silver screen has made an impressive debut in Khandaan. Shekhar who always wanted to be a star, however, made it big as a director. With the success of Masoom, he graduated to a whiz-director from being just the 'boy-friend of Shabana Azmi.'

Protima Bedi



Protima Bedi's guest appearance in one of the episodes of Khandaan, has proved to be a disaster. Sex appeal notwithstanding, her poor and boring acting has put off viewers. One only hopes that in future, she will stick to her own domain: Odissi dancing.

Sriparna Banerjee

Wonder Girl

A 25-year-old graduate from Calcutta's Jadavpur university Sriparna Banerjee has almost always got what she worked for. In swimming she shattered the state's 50 metre butterfly record for juniors. In 1974, she had broken a 14-year breaststroke record for all age-groups. Inspired by her successes, the West Bengal government made the feature film Kony. Sriparna played the lead role in the film, which bagged the President's award.

Sriparna turned her attention to rowing—and excelled again. Today she is the proud winner of more tankards (the most coveted prize in rowing in India) than one can hope for, the latest being for the first place in the just concluded nationals in Madras.

Our Astronauts

After the Rakesh Sharma-Ravish Malhotra combine, it will be the turn of the N.C. Bhat-A. Radhakrishnan duo.

One of them will fly on board the US space shuttle some time in the middle of next year. They are slated to undergo some preliminary training here and further intensive training of six months in the US before being space-bound Whoever goes will actually be the first Indian astronaut.

His task will be to deploy the third Indian multi-purpose satellite, Insat-1C, in orbit.

Bhat is an engineer with the Indian Space Research Organisation, Bangalore, and Radhakrishnan works at the Vikram Sarabhai Space Centre, Trivandrum.

Fighting Illness

Havaldar Yashwant Raoji Jadav is a retired jawan—with a difference. He is said to have been endowed with an extraordinary ability of curing polio victims by a special therapy, which was passed on to him from his guru. Every day dozens of polio victims queue up at his open-air clinic for treatment. How successful his therapy has been can be judged from the fact that he has cured more than 2,000 polio victims.

But now, after nearly a decade's stay in Bangalore, the therapist has finally decided to close shop. Recently, he packed his bags and left for his native village, Sangli, in Maharashtra. Bureaucratic apathy, apparently, prompted him to make such a move. He had threatened to close his clinic before but each time he tried to do so the Karnataka government would thwart his plans, luring him with promises of honorarium, housing and other facilities—most of which remained on paper. He will be missed by thousands of polio victims. One can only hope he continues the good work in Sangli. Needless to say, Bangalore will miss his healing touch.

Judging Ballet

To the famous Dhrupadi danseuse from Calcutta, Chetna Jalan, the invitation to be a judge at the international ballet competition in Moscow came as an unexpected honour. Ballet, she believes, is not her territory. But the competition's organisers wanted knowledge of an accomplished classical dancer to appreciate the intricacies and aesthetic value of ballet. She was chosen to assess the performances of famous ballet artistes from Russia, America, Britain, Argentina, Cuba, Turkey Japan and China. She was recently selected joint chairperson of UNESCO's International Theatre Institute dance committee in Canada, along with Robert Geoffrey of the Jefferson Ballet Group of USA.

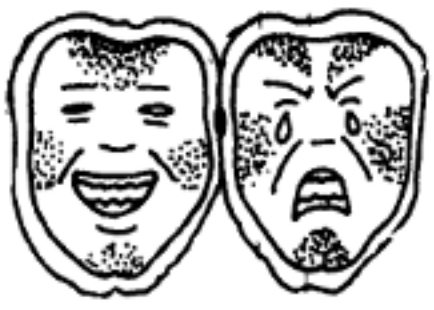
A Vegetarian Cure

Vegetarian women are about two times less likely than other women to develop gallstones, according to results of what researches at Oxford university described as the largest study of gallstones ever undertaken. The researchers said that the two-year study also showed that gallstones were more common among women who were overweight or had a family history of the condition and that the risk increased with age. Because gallstones are twice as prevalent among women as men and the condition usually strikes in middle age, the study was confined to middle aged women.



Light: A Source of Food

The discovery of a one-celled organism that uses light for food—the first animal known to do so—could lead to an understanding of how light is converted to other energy forms. Previously, only plants and bacteria were known to photosynthesise, a process in which light is changed to energy. Pil-Soon Song of Texas university found evidence of photosynthesis in a blue-green trumpet-shaped protozoan called stentor coeruleus.

Test for Vitamin Deficiency

An inherited vitamin deficiency, which can cause mental retardation in new born babies if not treated quickly, can now be detected by doing a test. Doctors at the Medical College of Virginia say that the victims of this disease do not produce an enzyme that allows their bodies to recycle the vitamin biotin. The resulting symptoms are so subtle that they sometimes go unnoticed until permanent brain damage has occurred.

Curbing Hysterics

Researchers from the university of Rochester (New York) Medical Centre have shown some success in curbing the symptoms of what is called pathologic laughing and weeping. These are the side-effects of multiple sclerosis, strokes, brain injury and some other diseases. In an experiment, they administered low doses of the anti-depressant drug, amitripyline, on 12 patients. While seven of them showed a "dramatic" improvement in 48 hours the condition of the others took a turn for the better. Each of the four patients with uncontrolled laughing responded to the drug, while four of the eight who wept uncontrollably did not.

Antidote for Mountain Sickness

A pill, acetazolmide, for conquering mountain sickness has been successfully tested by the Birmingham Medical Research Expeditionary Society. Above 16,000 feet mountain climbers face problems as their bodies start "to die" because of reduced oxygen intake. Even at much lower altitudes they suffer from nausea and headaches. The condition worsens as they go higher and higher and it is estimated that after spending a couple of days over an altitude of 26,000 ft, most suffer from brain damage. However, tolerance differs from person to person and there are some who remain unaffected even at great heights. Twenty climbers from the society spent two weeks at high altitudes in the Himachuli region of Nepal. Ten of them took placebos (medicine given to humour rather than cure the patient) and ten acetazolmide, a drug long regarded as being capable of countering mountain sickness. The people taking the drug performed 15 per cent better than the ones who took the false pill. What is more important, they did not lose muscle mass at the same rate and remained stronger for longer periods.

Saving an Endangered Species

Successful breeding in captivity of ten numbats, one of the world's smallest marsupials, has raised hopes that the tiny animals—an adult numbat can be held in one hand—can be saved from extinction. According to the Australian Science and Energy Newsletter, numbats were once a common sight in southern Australia, but clearing of their woodland habitat has left only two colonies of them in the southern part of western Australia. Numbats are listed as an endangered species by the World Wildlife Fund, which has sponsored the breeding project.

Waging a War on Insects

Research done on a substance extracted from the seed of the neem tree has shown that there could be another weapon to fight the war against certain insects, which have for long plagued mankind. Scientists of the Max Planck Institute for Biochemistry, near Munich, have discovered that the substance, azardirachtin, attacks that part of the brain of the insects which controls the hormone level for the reproduction and growth of larvae. Although the larvae survive, they "forget" to reproduce. This amnesia also affected locusts and grasshoppers. The researchers now hope to study the potential usability of azardirachtin as a safe biological exercise.

For those born between 15 July and 14 August

You are essentially helpful by nature. However, your intense self-consciousness restrains your being over-generous. You are also aware of the beauty and harmony of sound, form and colour. Men born during this period are virile but emotionally sensitive. You are easily given to tears and you often become nostalgic. A long period of depression is quite usual with you. You are possessive and desperately in need of understanding. Women born during this phase do not hesitate to take up challenging assignments.

PANAJI: It is incredible but true. A teenage girl, Kanchan Desai, was singing with deep devotion at a bhajan programme when a cobra crawled up to her, settled on her lap and swayed while the girl sang. The incident occurred at the Mangesh Mahalaxmi Ashram at Curti village, three kilometres from Ponda. The occasion was a bhajan during the Ashada Ekadashi Saptaham (a religious week of non-stop prayers). The girl continued singing totally oblivious of the presence of the deadly reptile on her lap. A woman seated close to her saw the snake and raised an alarm. Thereupon the snake slipped away from the girl. But when the bhajan session resumed, it reappeared and this time crawled to the ashram sanctum and lay coiled round the stone image of the deity — Indian Express (P.M. Irfan Ahmed, Madras).

MADRAS: "Go and study geography," was the advice a ruling party member got from the Speaker, P. H. Pandian, in the Tamil Nadu Assembly on 8 July. Raising a point of order during question hour, Dr K. P. Ramalingam (AIADMK) referred to the Sri Lanka Tamil talks and said that the talks were being conducted at "the capital of Burma, Thimpu." Amidst laughter from members, Mr Pandian told the member, "Go and study geography." The electricity minister, S. Ramachandran, pointed out that Thimpu was the capital of Bhutan and not Burma—Indian Express (C. R. Sitaram, Ranebennur, Karnataka)

MADURAI: It was a loan under the self-employment scheme for an educated young man, but with a difference. Ganesan, a commerce graduate, has been sanctioned a loan of Rs 20,000 by a nationalised bank—to buy an elephant. The 24-year-old youth plans to hire out the elephant for film shooting and festivals and hopes to make an earning of Rs 40,000 a year—Deccan Herald (N. Mohan, Bangalore)

HAJIPUR (Bihar): Right from the pyre which had been lit, a woman was rushed to hospital as she showed signs of life. The incident occurred here on 7 July; she was brought to hospital by some of the pall-bearers. Others had fled crying "ghost, ghost" when the woman got up and tried to come out of the burning pyre—The Hindustan Times (H. Majumdar, Roorkee)

DAVANGERE. Can a person steal a car while in jail? Apparently, yes, if you go by the chargesheet filed by the police here. According to them, Subramani of Bangalore stole a fiat car from a house here on 2 March 1982. They said he had sold the car, after changing its number plate on 24 August 1983. But a copy of the court proceedings with the accused says that he was produced before the Sixth Metropolitan Magistrate, Bangalore, on 24 February 1982 and remanded to custody till 10 March for failing to furnish bail. The question is: how can a person in judicial custody be free to travel 175 miles and steal a car?—Indian Express (V. Ramakrishna, Tirthahalli, Karnataka)

BOMBAY: A rumour that toy models of Maruti cars would be given to children who could list the number plates of 300 Maruti vehicles has caused a traffic crisis in Bombay and endangered scores of young lives. Attempts were being made by the mayor, the police and Maruti dealers on 9 July to scotch the rumour by using Doordarshan. No one knows how the rumour started. One version is that it began with an advertisement in a vernacular paper that Maruti models would be given to children able to note down the numbers of 300 vehicles. As the rumour gathered momentum, scores of children began to appear along the roads, notebooks in hand and peering anxiously at the passing traffic looking for Maruti cars. Baffled motorists had anxious moments, steering cautiously to avoid knocking down over-eager youngsters darting into the traffic to catch a glimpse of a vehicle on the far lane. One woman motorist driving through Dharavi on the night of 8 July said she was stopped by a hundred children who asked her to sign their notebooks after they had written down the registration number. —The Times of India (S. CHESS

The performance of the English team in taking the silver medal in the Olympiad has fulfilled a long-standing promise. In every Olympiad since Haifa 1976 (where we won bronze) the team has threatened to take top honours, only to draw the short straw in the last few rounds. This time however the final three rounds yielded 10 out of a possible 12 points, compared with an average of about 6 points on previous occasions. The result must bring a smile of satisfaction to all chess enthusiasts in this country, in particular bankers Duncan Lawrie Ltd, on whose financial support the team has long relied.

Individual honours were swept up by John Nunn, who scored a phenomenal nine wins and two draws on board two. Undoubtedly the best result ever by an Englishman in an Olympiad, it formed the platform on which the whole team performance was built. Jonathan Mestel also shone, justifying his modesty in accepting the lowly status of fifth board by walking off with the prize for best score on that board.

Pride of place however must go to John Nunn, who incidentally put his feet up on the rest day by winning the problem-solving competition. The following massacre presented him with relatively few problems.

BRIDGE

Of the many thousands of deals played in the Olympiad, I doubt whether there can have been a better one than this, reported in the Bulletin by Gudmundur Hermannsson:

Dealer North Love all

Playing against Australia, the Icelandic North opened Two Hearts, promising 4–4 or 4–5 in the majors. East overcalled with Three Diamonds, destroying the delicate exchanges. South plunged into Six Spades; East doubled, to indicate his desire for an unusual lead; and South, realising the situation, transferred to 6NT.

What should West lead? A club – it's obvious (for five down); but supinely he led a diamond. Now guess which card won the twelfth trick. This was the ending:

When Bjorn Eysteinsson led the ace of hearts from dummy, East did his best, discarding the queen of clubs. A club followed from dummy and South made the last trick with the jack of clubs.

SCIENCE

Bringing the Moon Closer

The dollars promised for America's space station ($8 billion from the United States, more than $2 billion from Europe) are beginning to fire the imagination of America's space explorers. A faction of scientists within the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) has spent the past year pushing the idea of sending people back to the moon to conduct experiments, build telescopes and, perhaps, set up a permanent colony. Many of their schemes sound fanciful; most are based on impeccable logic.

The argument runs like this. Once the space station is flying, in about ten years' time, going to the moon will be cheaper and easier than it was 15 years ago during the Apollo programme. Two things pushed up the costs of Apollo: having to design all the equipment from scratch, and needing a mammoth rocket—the Saturn V—to escape earth's gravity with enough velocity to reach the moon.

Future moon missions would get there in two hops: from earth to the space station, and thence to the moon. The shuttle can take care of the first hop; all that the second needs is a "space tug" that can be launched from earth and stay moored to the space station in between moon expeditions.

Would it be worth it? Last year, Dr Mendell and his fellow "lunatics" invited a group of scientists to discuss the benefits of going back to the moon for experimenters and explorers. The most obvious beneficiaries would be lunar scientists. They still know precious little about the place or how it was formed: the theory that it could be a lump of earth dislodged when a planet or asteroid collided with earth millions of years ago is back in fashion, for example.

Astronomers, too, are keen to get to the moon. Those who peer through optical telescopes would like to put one on the moon where it would be free from the atmospheric distortions of the earth. Radio astronomers say radio telescopes on the far side of the moon would be shielded from the noise of the earth's own radio emissions. Dr Jack Burns, of the University of New Mexico, has an idea for radio telescope called an interferometer with one leg on the earth and one on the moon. Interferometers already straddle continents on the earth. Dr Burns says the resolution of his earth-moon telescope would be 100 times better.

Dr Mendell admits that these projects could hardly justify a lunar expedition on their own. What if they were combined with a plan to pave the way for manned flights to more distant planets? Scientists are tantalised by the moon's low gravity and lack of atmosphere. It will take 20 times as much energy to launch an object from earth to the space station as from the moon to the space station. Indeed, spacecrafts could probably be launched from the moon without rockets: a decent catapult could do it. If only there was something on the moon worth launching.

Perhaps there is. One estimate says that three out of four shuttle launches in the 1990s will be loaded with liquid oxygen to fuel the space station and its associated spacecraft. The moon, on the other hand, has abundant oxygen chemically trapped in its rocks. Dr Mendell's group believes it might eventually be cheaper to extract oxygen from the moon and transport it to the space station.

They tried every trick to create a misunderstanding between Deepti Naval and Prakash Jha, but in vain. The couple, who were married last year on 1 July are still very much in love and have ignored the rumours that are being floated. Some even went in search of Prakash's first wife whom he had allegedly tucked away in some remote part of Bihar. But they had to return disappointed. Meanwhile, Deepti's past affairs with Farouque Shaikh, Marc Zuber and filmmaker Rahul Gupta were being raked up. Stories were also being spread about Deepti's 'disillusionment with marriage.' "They really tried hard to see that there was trouble, but we behaved like two responsible adults and it paid off," says a mature Deepti.

Farouque Shaikh is a man of word. Ever since he entered the film industry, he had resolved to accept only "good roles" that would fetch him "good money," and he has stuck to his guns. Recently, a leading filmmaker approached him. Farouque liked the role and demanded four lakhs for it. The producer promised to return within a few days but eventually did not turn up. "I don't know why they crib when it comes to paying my price. I have carved out a place for myself in the industry and I know I am good. I am only demanding what I deserve," complained Farouque.

Vijayeta Pandit is heading for trouble. Not only are the producers fed up with her tantrums, but her frustrated sister, Sulakshana, too is trying to sabotage her chances. Vijayeta has made a successful comeback after all those years away from the glare of the arc-lights. As one of her directors and well-wisher put it: "She has a bright future ahead of her. But one thing is certain, if she lets her sister do all the planning and talking for her, she will see doomsday soon."

With Naseeruddin Shah, Shabana Azmi and Om Puri as the artistes of their films, producers now find themselves on shaky terrain: financiers are not willing to invest in their films while distributors are reluctant to buy the completed films. Says one distributor, who has been in the film industry for years: "I have distributed some of the 'art' films and have lost a lot of money. They make very good cinema but they are big risks at the box-office."

Dimple Kapadia has finally broken all relations with Rajesh Khanna. "It's all over between us and there can be no going back now," she says. "How can I live with that man again? I am happy the way I am. All that matters to me now are my two daughters...nothing else."

Family Reunion?

Is Menaka Gandhi drifting back to the Prime Minister's household? Efforts are being made by common friends of Sonia Gandhi and the Prime Minister's estranged daughter-in-law to end the family feud. To begin with, Menaka may be asked to head the Sanjay Gandhi memorial trust. The post is presently held by Arun Nehru. A factor which has acted as a catalyst in the patch-up process is the fondness which the Prime Minister's children, Rahul and Priyanka, have for Sanjay and Menaka Gandhi's son, Feroze Varun

They have persuaded Sonia and Rajiv Gandhi to bring their young cousin back.

Chief Minister, by Proxy?

Madhavsinh Solanki

The appointment of Amarsinh Chaudhary as the chief minister of Gujarat has raised a question: who will be the real chief minister? As home minister in the last days of the Solanki regime, Chaudhary had allowed his predecessor in the home portfolio, Prabodh Rawal, to run the show. Rawal, who was denied a party ticket in the Assembly elections (hence he could not be a minister), even briefed newsmen in Ahmedabad on Chaudhary's behalf in those days. It is well known that while helping Chaudhary to reach the top post, Solanki had not entirely given up ambition for ruling the state. Will the Chaudhary regime be overshadowed by Solanki and Rawal?

A Record, Indeed

On 1 June, Kapal Mehra, chairman of Orkay Silk Mills was levied the highest ever personal penalty by the excise department. His firm was subjected to a fine of Rs ten crores (the highest corporate fine so far) and a personal penalty of Rs 50 lakhs was levied on him. The hearing in his case concluded in Bombay on the evening of 31 May. By noon the next day, a 130-page order, duly cyclostyled, was issued from the directorate of anti evasion (DAE) of the central excise department in Delhi. Where was Kapal Mehra when the order was being issued in Delhi (and quietly leaked out to a news agency journalist) in the afternoon of 1 June? He was standing next to the Prime Minister of India. Rajiv Gandhi inaugurated a polytechnic for the blind at Ambernath, near Bombay at 1 pm on 1 June. The man who managed the function was Kapal Mehra. Was the Prime Minister aware that the person standing next to him was being declared as the biggest ever excise evader by the DAE that afternoon? Apart from the record penalty levied on Mehra, the case has set many precedents. Never before has a 130-page judgement been passed with such haste. The adjudicator, M. S. Bindra, was the person who conducted the raids on the premises of Orkay. It was he who issued the show-cause on Mehra and he only sat on the judgement in the case. Mehra has appealed against the order. Bindra has meanwhile been transferred from DAE.

Detergent Image

If a criminal case against a politician can cost him the Congress(I) nomination in the Assembly elections, then the reverse could also be true: perhaps by being given a ticket for the Legislative Council elections, the politician can be absolved of the criminal charge. A former MLA, Shankarrao Kolhe, a powerful member of the dominant sugar lobby in Maharashtra, was denied the Assembly ticket this year because he was accused of having stormed the Kopargaon police station near Ahmednagar with a mob on 3 November 1984. According to the charge, Kolhe had threatened the police officers with serious consequences if they did not desist from arresting people in connection with the riots which followed the assassination of Indira Gandhi. The case had been filed on the basis of written statements by the district collector and the DSP, Ahmednagar, who were present in the police station when the incident took place. He is said to have threatened to burn the police station down if the arrests were not stopped. After he was given the Congress(I) ticket for the council elections, the charges against Kolhe were dropped. In the application filed in the court for withdrawal of the case against Kolhe, the state government asserted that what Kolhe had done was only a "verbal exchange" and that he did not assault anyone. The case was dropped in the "public interest," according to the public prosecutor. Detergents are indeed being used to ensure a clean image.

SHUBHABRATA BHATTACHARYA

A Patna-datelined news agency report which appeared in the inside pages of most newspapers on 3 September has created unprecedented ripples. No Congress(I) leader is prepared to comment about it. Yet the two-paragraph news story has become the talking point among Congressmen. According to the report, a meeting of party workers in Patna has demanded that Rajiv Gandhi's wife, Sonia, should replace him as the Congress(Indira) president. The credentials of Rajendra Singh, the person who issued the statement, are not too well-known. He is a former general secretary of the Bihar unit of the party and is better known for his proximity to the AICC(I) treasurer, Sitaram Kesri. It is this link which has made partymen apprehensive about the origin of the move to make Sonia Gandhi the AICC(I) president. The absence of a denial from any office bearer of the party has added to the confusion. The newsmen covering the AICC(I) headquarters at 24, Akbar Road made futile attempts to elicit a statement from party leaders after the newsitem appeared. Even Srikant Verma, the general secretary in charge of press briefings, was not his normal ebullient self when confronted with the question if the Prime Minister's wife indeed was being groomed for the party post.

Sitaram Kesri is known for springing surprises. In January 1983 he had suddenly resigned from the union council of ministers when there was a talk of a new "Kamaraj plan" being introduced by Mrs Indira Gandhi. He is the treasurer of the AICC(I) and has access to the Prime Minister's house. A move initiated by a person close to Kesri, therefore, is bound to generate interest among partymen. In the past, the induction of Sanjay Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi had been preceded by similar unprecedented moves from unknown quarters. In the case of Sonia Gandhi, though she is often seen accompanying her husband on his official tours at home and abroad, there has so far been no indication that she is interested to join politics. Since her marriage to Rajiv Gandhi in 1968, Sonia Gandhi has never been projected as a political person. Till some years back, her role was confined to the Nehru-Gandhi household. With her husband joining politics, she too crossed the barriers of her home.

Dissatisfaction has been growing in the Congress(I) ranks over the past one year. The denial of tickets to many sitting members both in the Lok Sabha and in the state Vidhan Sabha elections has created a large bunch of disgruntled partymen. Many senior leaders have not been accommodated in the council of ministers either at the centre or in the states. But the dissatisfaction among legislators and parliamentarians has been tackled by the Anti-defection Act. The MPs have now been put under the scrutiny of computers. Data is being fed about their parliamentary performance and their visits to the constituencies. This new pace of working has not quite fitted into the Congress culture.

Inaccessibility of the Prime Minister and his aides to party leaders has become a major complaint. In this background, when a move to induct Sonia Gandhi is initiated by unknown persons in a state capital, one cannot rule out the possibility that it is a move aimed at questioning the ability of Rajiv Gandhi to hold two posts: that of the party president and the Prime Minister of the country. Had the name of anyone other than Sonia Gandhi been suggested, that person could have then invited the wrath of the powers that be. In the case of Sonia Gandhi, a Catch-22 situation has arisen. No one other than Rajiv Gandhi himself would like to comment on the proposal. And, for the Prime Minister, it may have been considered improper to comment on the statement of a former PCC(I) general secretary emanating from Patna.

While the move to induct Sonia Gandhi as the Congress(Indira) president was initiated in Patna, the name of Mrs Gandhi disappeared from the campaign posters in Punjab which have been put up by the party named after her. The decision to retain Mrs Indira Gandhi's name as the suffix was a conscious decision taken by her party after the Election Commission decided to recognise the Congress(I) as the real Congress after the 1978 split. (The decision came in 1982.) Having retained her name as the suffix, should the party, now led by her son, ignore her in its election campaigns? Mrs Gandhi's role in Punjab can be criticised in many ways. But so was the case with her role during the Emergency ten years ago. That did not make the Congressmen disown her. Should she be forgotten within less than a year after her assassination? The propaganda material for Punjab may have been prepared by a professional advertising agency in Bombay. But the strategy for selling detergents and paints cannot be extended to politics.

The absence of Mrs Indira Gandhi's name from the election material in Punjab may be a pointer for many changes which are in the offing. Already some of the basic policies of the past are being reversed. The industrial policy drafted by Jawaharlal Nehru is slowly being moved into the archives. Change is essential for progress. The old cannot be retained just for the sake of traditions. But while ushering in the "new," the basic edifice should not be totally dismantled. In the Congress centenary year, the traditions built over the years and tempered at first in the fire of the freedom struggle and then in the quest for building modern India should not be given up. The Congress has grown through many struggles in the hundred years since it was presided over by a foreigner called Alexander Octavian Hume.

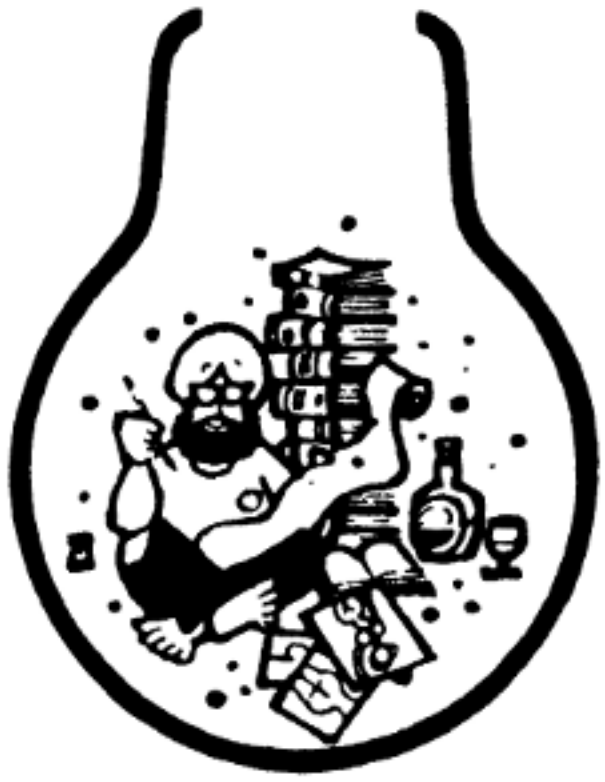
Nowhere Man

Everytime I write about God, God-lovers send me a flood of hateful letters. So much for God being Love. At the same time I get one or two from young people saying how disillusioned they are with institutionalised religion and how they can be good without believing in God. A few books and traits follow. The latest addition to my collection on the subject is Of Human Phenomena (Natraj Publishers) by a young (38) engineer, Phillip D'Souza, working with the ONGC in Dehradun. The dedication is reminiscent of Nirad Chowdhuri's,in his Autobiography of an Unknown Indian. D'Souza dedicates his work "to the British peoples and to their Queen." Unless it is meant to butter up the British High Commission for a visa and a work permit, the dedication does not make sense. However, I did not let that put me off. I was turned on by the prelude that follows on the next page, a song of the Beatles which pretty well sums up my own bafflement over the universe and its creator.



He's a real nowhere man,
Sitting in his nowhere land,
Making all his nowhere plans
For nobody.

Doesn't have a point of view,
Knows not where he's going to,
Isn't he a bit like you
And me.

D'Souza takes Darwin, Newton and Freud in his stride as he puts his own theory of the creator-preserver-destroyer God. It turns out to be quite a thought-provoking thesis put across in flat, dull prose. His only commitment is to reason. And logic needs no embellishment. "Truth needs no defence," writes D'Souza. "It is utter, absolute and immortal It only needs exposure."

New Gadgets

What I look forward to most when abroad is to look for new gadgets. I got my first pen with a light at its tip more than 20 years ago; also a miniature transistor half the size of a match box which could be put in the ear like a hearing aid. This time it was an instant ice-cream maker and a novel key chain. The ice-cream maker consists of a metal cylinder whose walls contain a chemical which when kept in the deep freeze section of a frigidaire becomes so cold as to be able to solidify the cream mixture within five minutes. A churner is fixed to turn the ice-cream to edible consistency. The key chain has a small receiver attached to it. If you misplace it all you have to do is to whistle. The receiver is activated and lets out a bleep or music to tell you where it is. Unfortunately you cannot use it for your car keys while driving in Delhi. Every passing scooter and blare of a car horn rouses it to bleep. I also saw many ingenious devices to trap burglars and frustrate car thieves. I could not buy them as I did not have enough foreign exchange. Why can't our scientists invent such simple things?

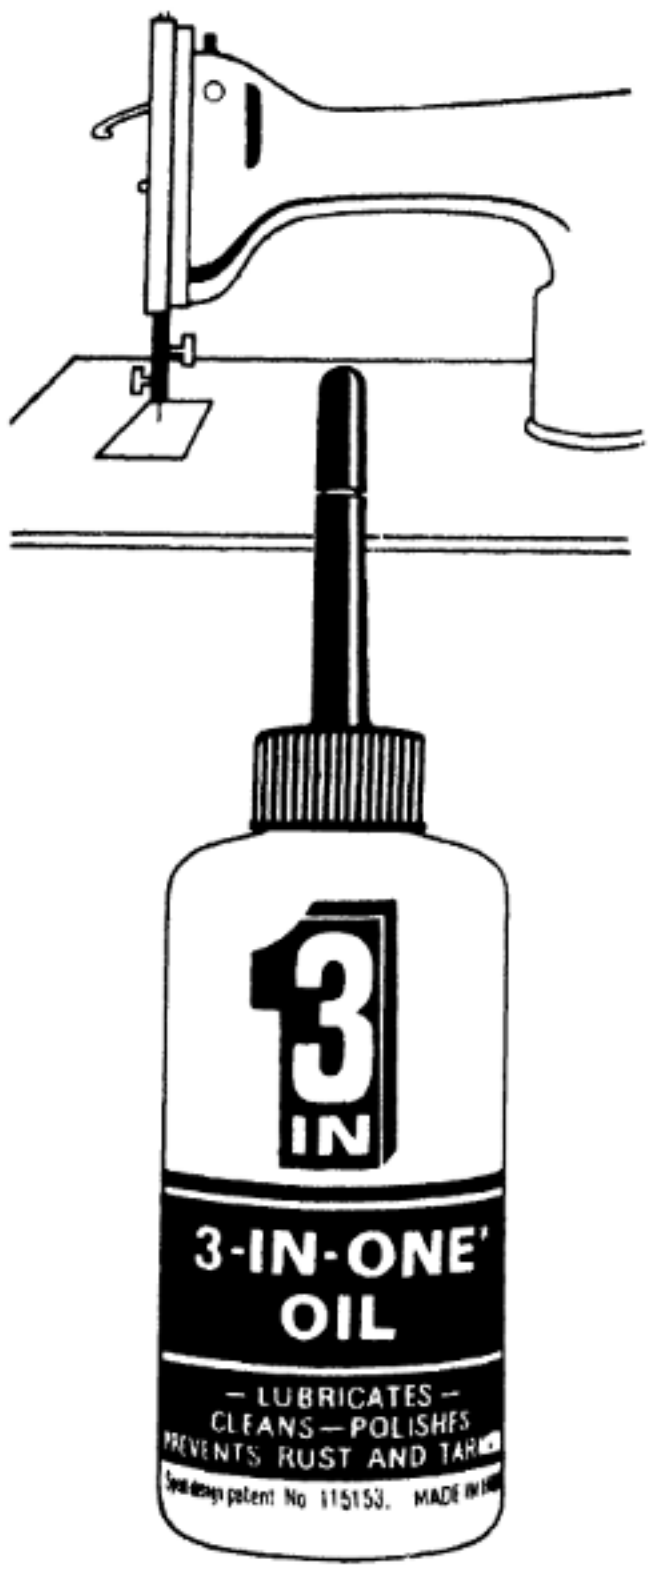
God Exists

A good example of how believers bamboozle non-believers by using obscure language and parables which have no analogy to prove the existence of God comes from the Court of Queen Catherine the Great. The Tsarina was perturbed over the influence of the French Savant, Diderot, had acquired in Russia and feared that unless checked in time her courtiers would also turn to aetheism. She commissioned the famous mathematician of the times, Euler, to engage Diderot in public debate on whether or not there was a God. The court was assembled and the two adversaries faced each other. Euler knew that Diderot knew nothing about mathematics. So he opened the debate with a mathematical proposition:



$A + B^N/N = X$

(A plus B to the power of N when divided by N is equal to X).That clearly proves that God exists. Now monsieur Diderot, it is for you to reply.

Diderot had no answer.

Pledged to build a bright future for the people Peerless is ever marching forward...

Closely linked to people's lives

Growing confidence of people

The people's confidence in Peerless deepend further during 1984. New Business worth more than Rs. 3,000 Crores (face value) was secured by Peerless inspite of some odds and adversities. Peerless achieved yet another landmark.

Investments

Guided by its corporate philosophy to ensure absolute security to the Certificate-holders' funds, Peerless invested a total sum of Rs. 525.88 Crores upto 31st December 1984 in Govt. Custody by way of Fixed Deposits with Nationalised/Scheduled Banks, in G.P. Notes and in Units of Unit Trust of India, which fully covers the Liabilities of Rs 460.35 Crores to its Certificate-holders upto that date.

Expansion & Modernisation

To offer prompt and improved services and to better its efficiency, Peerless opened new Branch Offices at Bhopal & Vijayawada and also Organisation Offices at Balasore & Tiruvannamalai. What is more, to obtain a data base and provide cost effective operation, Peerless completed the first phase of Computerisation in its offices throughout the country. Again, with a view to strengthening the Company's operational efficiency, Messrs Price Waterhouse & Co have been appointed to carry out a study of the Financial System and related areas

Target for 1985 Rs. 3,200 Crores

Backed by the trust, that the people have in it, Peerless has set a Target of New Business worth Rs. 3,200 Crores (face value) during 1985 and is confident of achieving it.

Social obligations

To discharge social responsibilities, Peerless made donations & contributions worth Rs. 20.90 lakhs through well-recognised charitable institutions to provide educational facilities, to promote sports and medical research and for various other social & philanthropic causes.

Contribution to National Economy

With a view to participating in the process of the development of the National Economy during the Seventh Plan period in a comprehensive manner, the Company has proposed to open dialogues with the appropriate authorities for rendering assistance to the Central and State Government Industrial Undertakings in the priority sector against availability of suitable financial guarantees and reasonable return

Self-employment opportunities

Upto 31st December 1984, Peerless has generated self-employment opportunities for more than 4 lakh persons. This is unparalleled in the history of any other non-banking savings company.

The Future

To maximise the benefits to its Certificate-holders, Peerless is now exploring the possibilities of introducing some new schemes of savings tailored to suit the people of small means.

Inspired by the lofty idealism of our departed Leader and trail-blazer, Late B. K. Roy, Managing Director, Peerless is steadfast in its mission for dedicated services and in its pledge to work for National Welfare.

Today a unique Company and its unique Team of field force and office staff face the future with renewed hope, vigour and optimism.

Elusive Peace

The brutal assassination of Sant Harchand Singh Longowal was shocking (The Death of a Saint, 1—8 September). He was killed by a group of misguided people who worked for their own personal gains instead of considering the welfare of the nation. Their objective was to disturb the peace and communal harmony of India. The government should deal with such elements with an iron hand.
A. Shankar, Calcutta

• After the signing of the historic Punjab accord, one thought that peace would return to the state and there would be no more bloodshed. But with the return of terrorism, these dreams have been shattered. Sant Longowal has sacrificed his life for the cause of Hindu-Sikh unity. Perhaps, the Sant would not have been killed had not the government declared the elections.
K. Chidanand Kumar, Bangalore

• Will the tragic death of Sant Longowal finally bring peace to Punjab? The Sikhs must have realised by now that if the extremists are allowed to gain the upper hand it will pose a grave threat to the survival of their community.
Prahlad Ghosh, Calcutta

• I agree with Rita Sharma that the choice of Surjit Singh Barnala as the successor to Sant Longowal was a wise one. Mr Barnala seems to be a capable man and as far as one can make out from his interview with SUNDAY, he is determined to fulfil the dreams cherished by the late Sant. If a lasting peace is brought about in Punjab then the martyrdom of Sant Longowal will not be in vain.
Rajvir Grewal, Calcutta

• The shocking murder of Sant Longowal is the outcome of the announcement of elections in Punjab. The atmosphere in the state is not favourable to holding polls so soon. The elections should be postponed in order to prevent further damage.
S.S. Raju, Bombay

• The assassins of Sant Longowal are traitors who destroyed the most selfless and sincere servant of the Sikh panth. The Sant, like Mahatma Gandhi, stood up to the threats of violence and secessionism. Throughout his life, the non-violent soldier fought for the rights of his people and won a victory for which he deserves a place in history.
Rishi Raj Agarwal, Calcutta

• Sant Harchand Singh Longowal sacrificed his life to further the cause of national unity. The Sant helped the Sikhs to regain their honour with his own blood and reduced the chasm of disbelief between the Hindus and Sikhs.
G. Banerjee, Varanasi

• India suffered a heavy loss with the death of Sant Longowal. The Punjab problem was solved only due to the efforts of the Sant. The extremists by defying the Punjab accord is committing a grave mistake. The accord was not only the dream-come-true of Rajiv Gandhi and Sant Longowal, but of the Indian people as well.
Sanjib Barua, Buxarah (West Bengal)

All Quiet on the Eastern Front

The special report, Assam: The End of a Nightmare (25—31 August), was absorbing. As rightly pointed out by Tooshar Pandit the Assam problem could have been solved much earlier, thus avoiding loss of life and property. But due to bad administra tion and wrong policies followed by the Congress(I) during the Indira Gandhi regime, the problem not only remained unresolved but grew more complex day by day, endangering the unity and integrity of the country. Credit must go to Rajiv Gandhi and leaders of the All Assam Students Union and the All Assam Gana Sangram Parishad for giving priority to the larger interests of the country and sidetracking personal and party interests. It was heartening to learn that the Assam Assembly has been dissolved, for the 1983 elections, when a large number of foreigners had voted, was reduced to a farce.
M.H. Rama, Bhubaneswar

• West Bengal is going to be mostly affected by the memorandum of settlement. As the Bangladesh government has issued a statement saying that the Bangladeshis who had voluntarily left their country cannot return to Bangladesh, the possibility of sending them to that country is ruled out. This will be the first time in history that Indian citizens, deported from Assam, will be stateless. These people will be forced to enter West Bengal as this is the only alternative before them. West Bengal will be facing problems both on the economic and political fronts, due to the influx.
R Rajesh Gupta, Ahmedabad

• The Assam accord is a total surrender of the government to the unreasonable demands of the AASU and the AAGSP. Perhaps, the settlement was rushed through by the Prime Minister in his eagerness to present the nation with an Independence Day gift. The centre's decision to accept 1966 as the cut-off year will spell disaster for lakhs of people. The linguistic minority in Assam will become stateless.
Bijoy Kr. Dutta, Jalpaiguri (West Bengal)

• I share the author's apprehension that the Assam accord "has created more problems than it has solved," for lakhs of so-called foreigners "will now be subjected to harrassment, insult and tyranny." The large-scale killing that was witnessed "in the six years since the anti-immigrant agitation started" and the losses incurred by the state due to so many bandhs had adverse effects on the state's economy and peaceful atmosphere.
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan (West Bengal)

In the article, Planned Leakage or Industrial Accident? (15—21 September) Calico should readIlac Ltd (Calico Group) and not as mentioned.

Poor Performance

The report on football was a welcome change from dull political analyses (Football in the Island of Turmoil, 25—31 August). It is indeed a matter of pride for all Indians that East Bengal won the trophy outclassing teams from other countries. But the Indian players need not be complacent since the teams which participated, apart from the one from Bangladesh, were all mediocre. Tarun Dey deserves our praise.
A Pradhan, Siliguri

• East Bengal may have won the championship but their standard of play was well below the international level in most of the games.
S.M. Mehta, New Delhi

Tarun Dey: best footballer in Colombo

Crime and Politics

I was startled by the alarming increase in the number of crimes being committed in Delhi (The Mafia of Delhi, 18—24 August). After reading the cover story I was convinced that the Punjab terrorists could not be the sole culprits behind the murder of the Maken couple.
Sujit Kumar Mohanty, Barbil (Orissa)

• Rashmi Saksena's report pinpointed the murderers of Lalit Maken and his wife Gitanjali. It is now upto the government to punish the culprits to ensure that such ghastly incidents do not occur.
S. Ravindrachetty, Chittoor (Andhra Pradesh)

Showing the Way

It was heartening to read that the Jaipur Metals and Electricals Ltd., which was on the verge of liquidation, earned a profit of 90 lakhs in 1984—'85 (An Amazing About-turn, 14—20 July). The credit goes to the employees for their hard work and dedication. The employees had agreed to the 'charter of demands'set by I.S. Kavadia envisaging a voluntary wage freeze for five years, the revision of production norms, production-linked wages, wage cuts, increased working hours, a total ban on go-slows, strikes, provision of overtime and other allowances. If all of us are duty-conscious and work with honesty and sincerity, then with all the vast, fertile lands and abundant manpower and natural resources, I do not see any reason why India cannot be self-sufficient and economically prosperous.
Nazir Ahmed, Bangalore

• Milap Chand Dandia's report was noteworthy. It is interesting to learn that the new managing director, I.S. Kavadia, was able to convince the employees in agreeing to his proposal which included production-linked wages and a total ban on go-slow, strikes, OT and other allowances. The provision of 20 per cent bonus in case of profits, and that too in distribution of equity shares, acted as an incentive.
Shyamal Gupta, Burdwan (West Bengal)

Marathi Vs English

Though it is not wrong to display signboards written in regional languages, their English versions should not be blackened as were done in some parts of Bombay (Shiv Sena's 'Marathi Mumbai' 11—17 August). This new line of action on the part of Bombay municipal corporation will only pave the way for growing regionalism hampering the cause of national integration. I do not agree with the mayor, Chhugan Bhujbal, when he says that in cities like Calcutta and Madras, the signboards are written only in the regional languages. However, the BMC's scheme to beautify Bombay deserves praise.
K. Ravichandran, Ahmedabad

A Government that Does Not Care

The grim, pathetic picture painted by Sarada P. Nanda in Starvation in Kalahandi (11—17 August) disturbed me. The J. B. Patnaik government has done very little to improve the plight of the starving villagers. With limited resources at his disposal, the young and efficient MLA from Bhawanipatna, Bhakta Charan Das, has done more than what an administration with unlimited resources could do. The article exposed the thorough inefficiency of the Orissa government.
Birendra N. Praharaj, Balasore

• The photographs of the drought-stricken villagers presented a pathetic sight. While on the one hand, the ministers of the Orissa government are leading a lavish existence, on the other,people are dying without food. Instead of making tall promises and fooling the people, the government should take emergent steps to improve the lot of the needy persons on a priority basis.
Param Hans Singh, Arrah

• My heart goes out in sympathy to the suffering masses of Kalahandi. J. B. Patnaik bears moral responsibility for the sorry plight of the poor villagers. Instead of rushing relief to the affected area, the Orissa government tried to hush up the news. However, it was heartening to learn that Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi visited the area and promised all help. I only hope that his promises bear fruit.
A. N. Veeraraghavan, Bombay

• The heart rending report on the drought in Kalahandi made me wonder how the Congress(I) manages to win elections in spite of such criminal negligence. What is the secret of the magic spell that the party weaves to win the heart and minds of the poor illiterate masses?
C.T. Vairavan, Madras

• I was shocked to learn of the plight of the poor people of Kalahandi. However, the situation is not very different in other parts of the country.
Saeed Aktar, Lucknow

• The report exposed the inefficient, government headed by J.B. Patnaik. The government is in the habit of making tall promises but hardly any of its policies are implemented. I wonder why our energetic Prime Minister is turning a blind eye to the state of affairs in Orissa.
Deepak Acharya, Phulbani (Orissa)

COVER STORY

Rajiv Gandhi's Discovery of India

Shubhabrata Bhattacharya reports on the Prime Minister's visits to the tribal areas and their impact on the integrated programmes for rural development

There is an umbilical link between Rajiv Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru's book, The Discovery of India. Nehru wrote his masterpiece as a detenu in the Ahmednagar Fort prison during the five months, April to September, 1944. Rajiv Gandhi was born in this period on 20 August 1944. Forty-one years after his grandfather had recorded for posterity his experiences, Rajiv Gandhi has embarked on a voyage of discovery. His visits to the tribal areas, which began in mid-July, are not mere administrative visits by a head of government. During these trips, he is treading on grounds so far untrodden by VVIP feet. The remote areas which he is visiting are not even visited by the local politicians on occasions other than election campaigns. The attempt is to understand India: to get a kaleidoscopic view of the problems of development. The Seventh Plan has an outlay of Rs 2,400 crores for the Integrated Rural Development Programme (IRDP) alone. Huge amounts have been allocated for other programmes: the Integrated Tribal Development Programme (ITDP), the National Rural Employment Programme (NREP), the Rural Landless Employment Guarantee Programme (RLEGP), Training of Youth for Self-employment (TRYSEM), etcetera. Crores have been spent on these programmes in the past. A review of the effectiveness of this expenditure is an integral part of the young Prime Minister's voyage of discovery. While on the one hand he is getting a first-hand knowledge of the realities of India, on the other, the administrative machinery in each district of the country is becoming vulnerable to scrutiny by the head of the government.

Four trips have been undertaken by the Prime Minister so far. Between 12 and 15 July, he visited drought-affected areas in Madhya Pradesh. Jhabua, Sarguja, Shadol, Raipur and Bastar districts of the state were covered in the three-day helicopter-hop tour. On 26 and 27 July he went to Phulbani and Kalahandi districts in Orissa. Between 8 and 10 August, Udaipur, Sirohi, Barmer, Jaisalmer and Bikaner districts in Rajasthan came under his scrutiny. On 5, 6 and 7 September, he was in Kerala. Coastal Travancore, the backwaters of Kuttanad, the Girijan villages near the Periyar sanctuary in Thekkady, the Silent Valley, the Muslim-dominated Moplah district of Mallapuram on the coast and Palghat in the east were part of his itinerary. In the coming weeks, he is planning trips to Ladakh, Lakshadweep, Nagaland, Mizoram, Manipur and Arunachal Pradesh. The peripheral regions of the country are receiving his attention first. The voyage of discovery is being effectively followed by back-up action. The petitions which are received by him during the trips are being judiciously processed and reports sought from the concerned departments. A team of three—two officials and one politician—has been entrusted with the task of following up these complaints. Wajahat Habibullah, a Jammu and Kashmir cadre IAS officer, coordinates the official part of the monitoring, while AICC(I) joint secretary Tarun Gogoi (from Assam) is entrusted with the political monitoring. A career diplomat, Mani Shankar Aiyar, joint secretary in the PM's office, is in overall charge of these trips. The trio accompanies Rajiv Gandhi on each trip and at the end of each day there is a review meeting. While the PM flies back to the capital at the end of a tour, the previous trip's follow-up action is reviewed by him along with Habibullah, Gogoi and Aiyar on board the Indian Air Force Boeing 737. Rajiv Gandhi's discovery of India is no gimmick. On the contrary, it is an attempt to ensure that the tribal and rural development projects do not become mere ideas on paper while crores of rupees are spent on them year after year.

The Prime Minister, accompanied by K. Karunakaran and Sonia Gandhi, cruises through the backwaters of Kuttanad

On the morning of 7 September, two helicopters carrying the Prime Minister's party landed at Kottathara near Silent Valley. The previous night's stopover had been at the Periyar sanctuary in Thekkady. The day had begun on a pleasant note when the visitors from Delhi had taken an hour-long boat ride on the Periyar Lake. Later on in the day, the motorcade rushed towards the Silent Valley. Suddenly, all cars came to a screeching halt. The Prime Minister had ordered the caravan to stop. The pleasantness of the morning disappeared. He was annoyed because he found that the trees on the roadside had been cut indiscriminately. The district collector was summoned. He could not give a satisfactory explanation. The trees had been felled due to security reasons was one of the explanations offered. Rajiv Gandhi was furious. "I think a person who is the head of a department should know what is happening in his department. If he does not know what is happening, then he has no business to be the head. Do you agree?" shouted Rajiv Gandhi. The visibly shaken officer mumbled, "Yes." He was asked to find out why the vandalism on nature had been carried out and report back before the helicopters took off from Kottathara three hours later. The motorcade drove to Chindakki, where the party got into jeeps and drove into Silent Valley. (Even the sound of crickets is missing in this densely-forested valley, hence the name.) Due to the hue and cry raised by environmentalists, the hydel power project which would have inundated large portions of this unique valley had been scrapped last year. The threat of technology to nature disappeared when Rajiv Gandhi unveiled a plaque in Silent Valley, declaring it as a national park. Ironically, the hutments built to house the abortive project's office served as the landmark for the spot where the plaque was unveiled.

While driving through Silent Valley the Prime Minister stopped to talk to tribals. Later, addressing a meeting at the Adivasi Higher Secondary School at Chindakki, Rajiv Gandhi admitted that the laws protecting the jungles had created problems for the adivasis. While protecting the environment, his government would also try to remove the hardships of the adivasis caused by forest laws. This was not the first time the Prime Minister had expressed such sentiments. Officers accompanying him told this correspondent that since his visit to the tribal areas in Madhya Pradesh, Rajiv Gandhi has been exercised about the problems created by environment protection laws on human beings who live in the jungles. For example, in places where firewood is the only source of fuel and timber is used for beams to construct houses, mere laws banning the felling of trees cannot solve the problem. Easy availability of alternative fuels for the poor and making LPG cylinders available in good numbers in the towns near the forests have been suggested as deterrents to the felling of trees. The union works and housing ministry has been asked to explore the possibility of developing an alternative to wooden beams for house construction. The concept that forests are mere ecological preserves is undergoing a change. Today, adivasi welfare is moving out of government files to become a reality. And to ensure that the files tell the truth, the Prime Minister is visiting tribal areas himself to monitor implementation. An advisory council on forests at the union government level is being set up soon.

Are all complaints of the tribals being redressed? The maximum number of petitions plead for the lease of forest land for agricultural purposes. Here, the district administration is told to explain the importance of forest laws to tribals and at the same time explore the possiblities of offering them employment through one of the many integrated programmes of the government.

The visit to Kerala had begun on 5 September with the inauguration of the new international airport terminal at Trivandrum. This was the only programme in an urban area apart from the public meeting which the PM addressed at Palghat at the end of his tour. Rajiv Gandhi made an attempt to see the living conditions of the different sections of society and gain first-hand information of the production process in traditional industries during his trip. He visited the sea coast to see the damage caused by the sea's erosion. At Pannathura near Kovalam, when the villagers demanded a bridge across the backwaters to link their village with the main road as well as a sea wall to stop the erosion caused by the sea, Rajiv Gandhi asked Kera-

Sakhatora village, Orissa: a tiny parrot perches comfortably on Rajiv Gandhi's hand while Sonia Gandhi and J.B. Patnaik look on.

The Impact

Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi with Girijans in Kerala

The policemen at Jonk in Orissa's Kalahandi district are regretting the Prime Minister's visit to Navapara block on 27 July. Some young men complained to Rajiv Gandhi that they had been wrongfully detained by the police and beaten up. The local DIG was asked to enquire into the incident and on learning that the allegation was true, the Prime Minister's office has advised the Orissa government to take the erring officers to task. The policemen are presently facing trial at the sub-divisional judicial magistrate's court.

In mid-July, when the PM visited Shahdol district in Madhya Pradesh, Ramdin Singh and some other villagers of gram panchayat Lakhnouti complained about the state of the local school. There was not even tatpatti (jute rugs) for the students to sit on and the teachers were corrupt, they alleged. In early September the district magistrate of Shahdol reported to the Prime Minister's office (through the chief secretary of Madhya Pradesh) that an enquiry had been conducted by the assistant district inspector of schools and some corrupt teachers had been transferred. As for tatpatti, the funds were being provided under the Integrated Tribal Development Programme (ITDP), the officer reported. The matter did not end with the transfers. A note has been sent from New Delhi about the steps being taken to ensure that the teachers who had replaced those charged with corruption did not indulge in the same practices.

The petitions received by the PM during his visits are categorised as "community-social," "community-economic," "individual" and "political." The last category is tackled by the Congress(I) network. The "individual" petitions are mostly of job-seekers. The possibility of helping them under the integrated programmes is explored. In case of requests for roads, bunds, bridges, school buildings, etc, the district authorities are asked to examine them on merit and report. The plea by Surjan Singh, the sarpanch of Dungardola of Nagri block (Raipur district) for the extension of irrigation facilities from the Sondur dam has been accepted by the government, but at the same time his plea for providing forest land for agricultural purposes has been turned down. The sarpanch of Balerbahara, Phul Singh Dhruv, had asked for hand pumps for his village, the construction of a tank for water storage and the linking of the village by a road. The first two pleas have been upheld, but in the case of the demand for a road, the Prime Minister's office has accepted the district authorities viewpoint that it is not feasible. The report from the district had said, "a rivulet intercepts the proposed road. Unless a bridge is constructed, the construction of the road is not likely to serve any purpose. The population of the village is less than 500, which does not satisfy the norms for linking villages to roads." Only a detailed explanation like this one leads to the rejection of a petition. The answers received are cross-checked before they are accepted by New Delhi.

In the case of Barbarpur village in Bandavgarh tehsil of Shahdol district in MP, the population did not justify the setting up of a higher secondary school, but funds have been provided under the ITDP for a primary school in the village. The villagers of Khaira village in the same district complained that mid-day meals served to school children in the local balvadi had been discontinued. On enquiry it was found that the meals were being provided under the CARE programme till June 1984, when the CARE funds stopped coming. The possibility of reviving the programme under the Integrated Child Development Scheme (ICDS) is being examined by New Delhi. Already, ICDS is providing food in some of the blocks in Orissa's drought-stricken Kalahandi district, after the PM discovered that the programme existed under the anganvadi programme, during his Orissa tour.

la chief minister Karunakaran to send him reports about their feasibility. At one point, he stopped to ask an inhabitant of Pannathura if potable water was available in the village. On receiving a negative answer, the Prime Minister smiled and said that apart from the sea wall and the bridge, potable water should also be considered important by the villagers. It was at Pannathura again that Rajiv Gandhi acquainted himself with the process of husk-retting and coir work. The next day at Quilon, he saw how cashewnuts were processed at a cashew factory. At the fishing harbour at Vizhinjam, he witnessed a fisherman auctioning his catch. At Neendakara, he visited a marine products processing plant to see how canning was done. At Chavra, he visited the rare beach where ilamenite sands are washed ashore by the sea. At Kulathupuzha, he visited a rubber plantation where Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka had been rehabilitated ten years ago. (It was a symbolic move: he did not visit the refugees who are pouring in now, lest the sentiments of the Sri Lanka government are hurt. At the same time, the PM's visit to the rehabilitation plantation at Kulathupuzha was certainly going to become a talking point among the Tamil refugees there.) Apart from the rehabilitated refugees, the PM also saw the tapping of rubber at the plantation.

Witnessing rubber-tapping in Kerala

For three hours Rajiv Gandhi cruised through the backwaters of Kuttanad on 6 September. On the face of it, the cruise, which began at Alleppey and ended at Pulinkunnu seemed to be a pleasure trip. (At Pulinkunnu, a boat race was organised specially for Rajiv Gandhi.) But the Prime Minister did not board the Kerala police motor launch, Kuttanad Rover, for a pleasure trip. A glowing example of human endeavour is there in the backwaters of the Vembanadu Lake. For the past five decades, with a process started by a pioneer called Murugan, land is reclaimed from the lake for paddy cultivation (Kuttanad is Kerala's rice bowl). Bunds are erected by dumping material ferried by boats and the area surrounded by the bunds is dewatered for paddy cultivation, known as punchakrishi. Acres after acres of paddy lands under punchakrishi have to be sustained by constant dewatering of these areas, which are eight to ten feet below the mean sea level, by pumps. At places the help of the Dutch government has been taken in recent years to reclaim land for punchakrishi. Rajiv Gandhi visited the man-made "islands" to acquaint himself with the cultivators' problems. Only a visit to the dewatering pumps (set up with government subsidy) can explain the importance of pumps in Kuttanad. Sitting in New Delhi the demand for pumps in Kainakery "island" in the Vembanadu Lake may not look as serious as after a visit to the paddy lands under punchakrishi. Apart from paddy, coconut, cocoa and plantains are also grown on these "islands."

Rajiv Gandhi had cruised on the backwaters of Vembanadu Lake way back in 1952, along with his grandfather, Jawaharlal Nehru. He noticed the progress made over the years. Along with the progress, the aspirations of the people too had changed. At Alleppey, his boat was greeted by slogans demanding the setting up of a railway link between Quilon and Alleppey. Along with the cheering, local aspirations were also coming to the fore.

Devigarh village in Madhya Pradesh's Jhabua district was the starting point of Rajiv Gandhi's discovery of India. While the Prime Minister accompanied by the state chief minister, Motilal Vora, and senior district officials met the villagers, two members of his party quietly moved out among the people. The report which Tarun Gogoi and Mani Shankar Aiyar gathered by moving incognito was different from what was being given out by the officials. Severe drought had affected the area and the local population, primarily agricultural people, faced an acute fodder shortage for their cattle The feedback was given to the PM. The next scheduled stop was at Kathwara village, but Rajiv Gandhi made an unscheduled stop on the way to talk to the people who had lined up by the roadside. What he discovered there amazed him. In a district affected by fodder shortage, the government had been supplying buffaloes under the IRDP. Instead of uplifting the economic standard of the IRDP beneficiary, the buffalo was adding to his economic burden. He had to buy fodder imported from Gujarat at a high price and at the same time pay back the IRDP loan. At Abujhwar in Bastar district, the PM discovered that the tribals did not drink milk. But because someone sitting in New Delhi or Bhopal had decided that the best thing to supply under the IRDP to the Bastar tribals was a cow,

On the sand dunes of Jaisalmer

Abujhwar was being flooded with cows by the government. At Jaisalmer district in Rajasthan, the IRDP has been supplying goats. While on the one hand Rs 500 crores are being spent to close the gaps in the Aravalli so that the desert does not spread, an animal which lives on almost every kind of foliage and aids the process of desertification is being supplied to the Jaisalmer villagers by the government.

As a result of Rajiv Gandhi's trips, the IRDP is being given a fresh look. A project approach is being introduced. Cattle will be supplied only if fodder is available in the area and infrastructure for marketing the Problems of Access

Are local politicians benefited by the Prime Minister's trips to tribal areas? The areas are inaccessible and if local politicians do not tread on them, the resource constraints on them are understandable. While AICC(I) joint secretary Tarun Gogoi accompanies Rajiv Gandhi to coordinate the political angle of the trip, security restrictions often deprive the local politicians from accompanying the Prime Minister when he tours their constituencies.

The Kerala PCC(I) president, Padmanabhan,was candid when he told this correspondent that he had great difficulty in explaining to his partymen why they could not be allowed to accompany the PM. Only six cars are allowed to be in the convoy. Apart from the state chief minister, only the PCC(I) chief can be squeezed in. On a representative basis, this should suffice, but Congress culture has it that everybody who is somebody in the area being visited by the VVIP should be in the entourage. At Kottathara, for example, the MP from Palghat, Vijayraghavan, had to literally squeeze into Tarun Gogoi's car to be able to accompany the PM. At Pulinkunnu, the local MP, Vakkom Purushottaman, was asked by the crowds to turn his face towards them so that they could have a glimpse of their MP. Apparently, this was Purushottaman's first trip to the area after the elections.

The Parliament of India provides funds for a MP to travel between New Delhi and the headquarters of the constituency. Perhaps, while computer monitoring of Congress(I) MPs' performance is being undertaken, this financial aspect could also be looked into. Tarun Gogoi was non-committal when confronted with this practical difficulty which is faced by local politicians. After all, when funds are provided for elections, can the party not help its legislators to nurse their constituencies? Perhaps, monitoring by computers can eliminate misuse of the money.

Politics, of course, is not entirely missing from Rajiv Gandhi's visits. At Thirurangady in Mallapuram district, he visited an orphanage, the managing committee of which is headed by the Indian Union Muslim League leader, Ibrahim Sulaiman Sait. The IUML is an important constituent of the ruling United Democratic Front in Kerala. For Sulaiman Sait, this was a good opportunity for sycophancy. If he is to be believed, then Mrs Indira Gandhi used to praise Sonia Gandhi in front of him. The opportunity denied to local Congress(I) politicians was made available to Sulaiman Sait, thanks to the fragility of Karunakaran's coalition government.

milk (or in the case of goats, the meat) will be created. From fodder to a chilling plant for milk will be a part of the integrated programme in areas where cows and buffaloes are to be supplied. Similarly, under the Rural Landless Employment Guarantee Programme (RLEGP), if a school building is to be built, it will be integrated with the construction of roads and bridges in the area. While imparting training under TRYSEM (Training of Youth for Self-Employment), the requirements of a particular area would be taken into account. So far, in many cases because tailoring was proving attractive, many youths from the same village were trained as tailors under TRYSEM. In a village with a population of 500, if ten tailors were to spring up suddenly, none could possibly earn a reasonable livelihood. In many places, TRYSEM has created two or three blacksmiths in a village, whereas the requirement of three neighbouring villages could have been taken care of by one blacksmith. The basic aim of the IRDP is to help the poorest of the poor and to help them cross the poverty line. In his reviews, Rajiv Gandhi has discovered that the IRDP assistance has mainly benefited those sections of the population which were in the higher brackets of the definition of "poor" and who needed a little push to cross the poverty line (having an annual income of Rs 6,000 and above). Statistically, IRDP has done well. The number of people below the poverty line has declined, but the benefit has not reached those for whom it was primarily meant. The below-poverty line population is categorised as "destitutes" (annual income below Rs 2,265); "very, very poor" (annual income between Rs 2,265 and Rs 3,500); "very poor" (annual income between Rs 3,500 and Rs 5,000); and "poor" (annual income between Rs 5,000 and Rs 6,000). The "poor" have crossed the poverty line, while the "destitutes" are yet to qualify as being "very, very poor." In the last five year plan, 16 million people were helped under the IRDP. In the Seventh Plan, the target is to help 14 million people: two million less than the Sixth Plan. But the assistance this time is being aimed where it ought to have reached before.

Special monitoring of the IRDP has been ordered by the Prime Minister. Two blocks in each state are picked at random for review each month. A year-and-a-half will be taken to monitor the whole country. Twenty families which are receiving IRDP assistance in each of these blocks are under the focus of this survey. Of these, ten are those who have come under the IRDP in the past few years. Their income is being reviewed to see if they have indeed benefited from the assistance. Ten families of recent beneficiaries are being canvassed to ascertain if there are any procedural delays. Fifty per cent of the IRDP funds will now be released only after the centre is satisfied with the implementation of the initial programme. Projectivisation of IRDP will be the criterion while releasing the second instalment of the central funds. The Rs 2,400 crores earmarked under the present plan, therefore, will be spent after due scrutiny.

An incident which took place on the second day of the Prime Minister's visit to Kerala highlights his way of functioning. He had been taken to the fishing harbour at Vizhinjam. Rows of newly-constructed houses were being shown to him. Suddenly it struck him that the houses were not occupied by anyone. On enquiry he learnt that the houses had been completed sometime back and had not been allotted due to a local dispute between Muslim and Christian fishermen. He was furious. An official tried to bluff him by saying that some allotments had been made but the allottees had not moved in. This infuriated Rajiv Gandhi further. "Kuchh gadbad hai (there is something fishy)," he told an official accompanying him. Chief minister Karunakaran, who is also the minister for fisheries, tried to offer an explanation. But it was too late. The Prime Minister had spotted AICC(I) general secretary A.K. Antony (former chief minister of Kerala) in the crowd. "Antony, can you locate an allottee in the crowd?" Rajiv Gandhi ordered. The bluff had been called. That evening, sitting in the Lake Palace Hotel in the middle of the Periyar Lake at Thekkady, the Prime Minister asked Kerala chief secretary Ramchandran to send a report on the Vizhinjam episode to New Delhi. On 11 September, the Prime Minister's office sent a reminder to Trivandrum. The incident was not being forgotten. The Doordarshan report on the Kerala visit also showed this incident. The message of Vizhinjam was being flashed to officers across the length and the breadth of the country. "The government which works faster" was trying to ensure that inefficiency did not mar its pace.

Prize, Not Punishment

Postings to tribal areas are generally considered as "punishment" by bureaucrats. It is not because of any lack of interest in tribal welfare that officers avoid transfers to the backward areas, but the hardships which their families have to suffer as a result of these assignments that makes administrative jobs in tribal areas unattractive. The childrens' education is a major casualty when a bureaucrat is posted to tribal areas. As a result, good officers seldom get posted to areas where their efficiency can benefit the common man. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi has directed the department of personnel in New Delhi to formulate a policy guideline for the state governments under which a posting in the tribal areas will become a prize posting due to the package of incentives which will be offered. (As the bureaucracy is primarily under the control of the state governments, the union government's policy guideline will only have persuasive effect, the final decision will rest with the state chief ministers.)

[illegible] the proposed guideline, [illegible] will be given a substantial [illegible] so that they can maintain [illegible] one in the place of previous posting (where the children are studying) and the other in the new place of posting. If the officers want to send their children to boarding schools, then seats will be reserved for their children in the best boarding school in the state. In case the schools do not have adequate boarding facilities to cope with this demand, then the state government (with central assistance) will construct additional facilities in these schools. Apart from school and boarding house fees, the children studying in boarding schools will be paid fares by the government during holidays so that they can visit their parents stationed in tribal areas.

Under the existing rules, after a certain period of time (usually six months) officers cannot retain their government accommodation in the place where they were last posted. These rules will be liberalised so that the family of the officers posted in backward areas can retain the accommodation in the state or national capital during the officer's tenure in the "prize" posting. A fixed tenure will be offered for these postings and after a stint in the tribal areas, the officers will be offered a choice of posting.

Bajaj Tempo Limited.
Moving in step with the growing needs of Indian transporters

Bajaj Tempo Limited, with over 25 years of experience in the development and manufacture of light commercial vehicles, is today poised to take a leap into the future – propelled by the achievements of the past.

A leap possible not only because of Bajaj Tempo's own R&D efforts, but also due to its technical and financial collaboration with Daimler-Benz A.G. (makers of Mercedes light commercial vehicles, trucks and cars), the world leaders in automotive technology.

Bajaj Tempo's new Matador F-307 range is fitted with the Mercedes OM616, the most fuel efficient and least pollutant IDI diesel engine. And as a result of Bajaj Tempo's meticulous studies and vast experience, the new range of vehicles is perfectly tailored to Indian load, road and traffic conditions.

Bajaj Tempo supports all its vehicles with an extensive service and spare parts network of 150 authorised dealers: the largest of its kind in India.

Bajaj Tempo Limited, a combination of advanced technology, excellent engineering and solid service support – to fulfil tomorrow, as it does today, the needs of Indian transporters.

Asian Paints: trying to imitate an egg. An egg?

The egg represents nature's perfection. Something that's almost impossible to achieve. But it's a worthy goal to strive for.

Over the years we have believed that excellence must be reflected in everything we stand for: our products, our services and our organisation. And to do that we have had to constantly change, and adapt to tomorrow's needs. Your needs.

True, Asian Paints is the largest paint company in India. Yet being the largest is not enough. If it were so, our plans and ambitions would have stopped when we became the No.1 Paint Company in 1967. It was a big moment. But it was only a moment in our quest for perfection.

Leadership through excellence.

SPECIAL REPORT

Punjab: Elections Amidst Turmoil

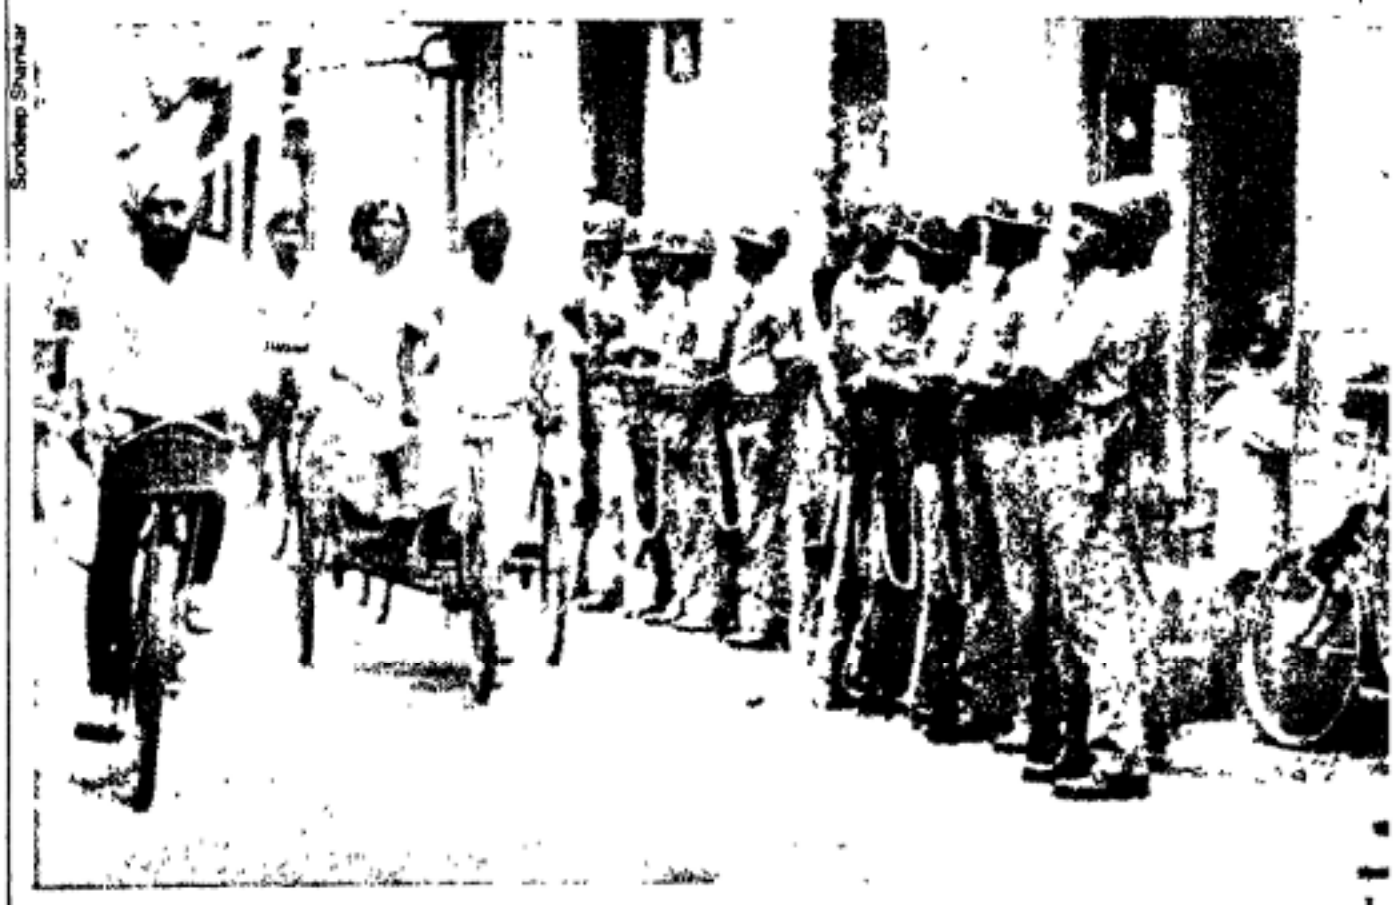
Janardan Thakur feels the pulse of the state

"Fear? What fear?" asked the strident Sikh police inspector who had thumbed a lift in our taxi somewhere between Ropar and Chandigarh. "It's only the outsiders who are frightened, not the people of Punjab," he went on. "Don't you know more people are killed just in New York city every month than in the whole of Punjab in a whole year!" Wherever he had picked up his statistics, it was obviously making him feel good. He was as perky and voluble as his clean-shaven colleague was tense and taciturn, and all through the short ride with us he kept correcting the "exaggerated notions" about fear and violence in Punjab.

And indeed in the clear calm morning of the lush green countryside, fear and violence could seem unreal. Alien. Something that was elsewhere, only in the newspapers perhaps. There were, of course, the little knots of jawans waving the cars and trucks down for identification and search every ten kilometres or so, bunches of helmeted soldiers sprawled under a roadside tree, their guns and carbines beside them, but then you also felt the rhythm of normal life all around you. A merry-looking Sardarji riding a scooter pillion, carrying not a gun but a huge banjo in his arms; a whole family of five perched happily on another two-wheeler; a big circle of sprightly school girls playing games out there in the field; a big roadside huddle of milk-proud buffaloes with their gleaming ebony flanks, being bought and sold, haggled over. Who could say this was a state under siege? And yet the calm and normalcy could be so misleading—blood and mayhem just a pull of the trigger away. One remembers a group of French journalists returning from Punjab convinced that all the stories about fear and violence in the state were grossly exaggerated and then a week later came Operation Bluestar!

"You may not find any scare," the 85-year-old journalist of Amritsar, G.R. Sethi, had told me, "but there is fear in the hearts. It may grow as the date of poll comes closer."

"Darna Khalsa ka dharam hi nahi ji (a khalsa or pure knows no fear)," were the brave words of the first campaigner I had met on my way out—a tall, hulking Sardarji fixing a poll banner to his car. He had absolutely no doubt they—the Akalis—were going to win "hands down." His candidate, Jasdeo Singh Sandhu, an ex-minister, had never lost an election in his life, and "this one there is no question of losing. Badal may lose, but not my candidate."



Part of his confidence, one felt, stemmed from the fact that the Congress(I) had fielded a "new and weak" candidate. No matter where you went, you could hardly miss the "rumour" that the central leadership was out to manoeuvre a victory for the Akalis in the state. Some insisted this was not just a rumour but a fact.

"They (Congress-I) are committing hara-kiri," asserted Birendra, the editor of the Jalandhar Hindi daily, Vir Pratap, known to be one of the strong champions of Hindu interests in Punjab. He said he was not going merely on impressions. "It was one of the observers of the Congress(I) who himself told me that they were looking for weak candidates. He told me it was a CPI(M) government in West Bengal which had finished the Naxalites, and in Punjab only an Akali government could end the menace of terrorists."

Even Satyapal Dang, the eminent CPI leader who is himself fighting a crucial battle in Amritsar, thought this could well be the plan of the Congress: to manoeuvre a victory for the Akalis in the Assembly. He said this was the common talk in the Punjab secretariat, with officers saying, "You have to set a thief to catch a thief..."

To the hard-core Sikhs who would have nothing to do with the Rajiv-Longowal accord, it looks like a "dubious game of the Congress(I)." Devinder Singh Duggal, a vitriolic scholar of Sikh history, thought the centre wanted the "Sikhs to face the Sikhs and capitalise on it...this I think is their game."

I had run into Duggal in the Guru Nanak Nivas, for long the abode of Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale. Or, perhaps, the meeting was set up for me by one of the secretaries of the SGPC chief, G.S. Tohra, who did not want to get into any controversy himself and yet was keen that I get a good slice of the real hard-core thinking among the Sikhs.

Armed police around the Golden Temple: tension without end

The Men Who Speak Bhindranwale's Language

Jagjit Singh Rode, the elder brother of the slain militant Sikh leader, Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale is an ambitious man. The eldest son of Baba Joginder Singh by his first wife (Bhindranwale was the youngest by his second wife), Jagjit Singh (53) is a senior member of the "United" Akali Dal (UAD) today. He is also a member of the party's nine-member ad hoc committee which the Baba had formed on 4 May this year after dissolving the two Akali Dals led by the assassinated Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and Jathedar Jagdev Singh Talwandi.

Jagjit Singh is following the footsteps of his younger brother. He too has begun by attacking the government and the Akalis, besides supporting the terrorists in Punjab and Delhi. Jagjit Singh made a fiery speech at the party's convention presided over by Baba Joginder Singh in Amritsar on 8 September in the famous Manji Sahib Hall. During the speech, Jagjit Singh justified the recent killings of the two Congress(I) leaders, Lalit Maken and Arjun Das, in Delhi. He said, "Do chuk ditte hai. Baki chuke jaan ge (Two have been liquidated. Others will also meet the same fate." He also threatened the Akali Dal (Longowal) secretary-general, Balwant Singh Ramoowalia, saying, "Ramoowalia says that the Akalis will finish the terrorists after forming the government. But he may be finished before that."

Equally provocative were the speeches of Baba Joginder Singh and Jathedar Jagdev Singh Talwandi as well as the resolutions passed at the 8 September convention. Said Talwandi, "The Anandpur Sahib Resolution is no more the issue. Now the main issue before the Sikhs is to have their own home." The Baba launched a frontal attack on the Akali leaders of the Longowal faction and accused them of betraying the Sikh panth for signing an accord with the "Delhi sarkar." Barring the former Punjab chief minister Prakash Singh Badal, who remains in the UAD ad hoc committee and whose supporters are also in the party, Baba Joginder Singh also attacked Sant Longowal, the acting Akali chief, Surjit Singh Barnala, former Punjab minister Balwant Singh and the SGPC president, Gurcharan Singh Tohra, and called them "quom de gaddar (traitors of the Sikh nation or community)."

On 9 September Surendra Nath, senior adviser to the Punjab Governor Arjun Singh and the state home secretary, N.N. Vohra, told the press in Chandigarh that the government was examining the fiery and provocative speeches made by the UAD leaders in Amritsar. Pro-Khalistan slogans were made and Sikh youths with kesari turbans dominated the 10,000-strong gathering at the Manji Sahib Hall and cheered the party leaders with slogans of "Khalistan zindabad" and "Bhindranwale zindabad."

The resolutions passed at the five-hour convention too, were provocative. In one of the resolutions, it was clearly stated that a separate Sikh state was the real demand of the Sikhs supporting the UAD. The resolution also called upon every Sikh to strive for the establishment of a political system in which religion reigns supreme. In another resolution, the convention reiterated its earlier stand of boycotting the Punjab elections. The Sikhs were also urged to oppose the Rajiv Gandhi-Longowal accord of 24 July.

Sanjeev Gaur, Amritsar

The elections and the accord were all bunkum, thought Duggal, and nothing was going to be solved by them. A small man with sharp eyes peering through thick glasses, Duggal heads the Sikh History Research Board of the SGPC. "To understand the problem of Punjab," he told me, "you must understand the tradition and psyche of the Sikhs. They have never given in (to force)..."

What can be done to heal the injured psyche of the Sikhs, I asked him, and it is as though the floodgates opened. "The Sikhs are being persecuted. They have not released any genuine people of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF). Unless the rule of law is established for the Sikhs there can be no peace in Punjab. The Delhi riots have caused a terrible hurt to the psyche of the Sikhs and time alone cannot heal it."

I begin to ask about the inquiry set up by the Prime Minister, but Duggal cuts me short, "You think the Sikhs are so naive? It's a bogus inquiry, its terms of reference are not genuine at all. The culprits must be brought to book..." Somebody intervenes to say that two of the culprits have already been killed, and for the first time a little smile plays on the lips of the intense researcher of Sikh history. "The government," he says, "is encouraging illegal justice." He relishes his words and goes on, "If they are serious they must enlarge the terms of reference to finding whether there was a plan behind it and identifying the culprits. Do you know there are 14 Sikh widows huddled up in one little room, being given a paltry compensation of Rs 2,000 and some not even that? But for the Hindus killed here they have given Rs 50,000 or even Rs one lakh. Is that the rule of law? Any security officer who does not like my face, or my saffron turban can put me behind bars. Is that rule of law? I tell you, if something is not done speedily, I repeat speedily, they are going to lose the Sikhs for all time to come...it will be a point of no return."

And what does he think of elections being held now? "Most impolitic. Things are going to recoil with much greater force than in Assam, because this is not Assam, people here are different." You can tell it is more of a threat than a statement. "The people at large would not accept the verdict," he tells me, "even if the Akalis come to power." He doesn't tell me, but you can see the iron has entered his soul. His inside is as charred and blackened as the burnt-out shells of the vehicles outside the building: grim reminders of Operation Bluestar.

As we come out, a local Sikh journalist tells me Duggal was echoing the very thoughts of Tohra. He says I ought to have asked the man what he thought of the accord. Was there anything in it that he was opposed to? That was a question that a foreign journalist had put to him some days before, and there was no point Duggal could oppose. All the same he was against the accord. The Akali demands conceded, they had graduated to other demands. As a parting shot, Duggal had said: "Let Rajiv Gandhi come to the Golden Temple and seek our pardon. The Sikhs will forgive him."

Will they? The very same point was referred to by another man, but with what difference! If Duggal breathes fire, Mubarak Singh exudes only love. It is not for nothing that this 68-year-old man is one of the most respected citizens of Amritsar. After serving the state and the city in various capacities, Mubarak Singh has been editing a journal he calls

The Art of Living for the last 12 years, and what sets him apart from other Sikh scholars and writers is his ability to see the problem of his state as a humanist rather than as a Sikh.

"I have been one of the unhappiest men during the last three years," Mubarak Singh told me. "I can understand a Lalit Maken or a Bhatia being shot down but what about a couple of Hindus dying unsung and unnoticed?"

He is an anguished soul, and he knows better than anybody the great divide that has come between the Hindus and the Sikhs. Unlike many other Sikhs who may have forgotten the horrors of partition, Mubarak Singh knows exactly what another partition can bring to his people. But are they in the mood to understand? He tells me Khushwant Singh was one of the persons who had suggested that Rajiv Gandhi should come to the Golden Temple and perhaps the Sikhs would forgive and forget. But Mubarak Singh knows it is not going to be that easy. "His coming will be hazardous," he told me. "There are young Sikhs who are going around with their heads in their palms..." And he quotes a few lines from Guru Govind Singh: "Je to prem khelan ka chao sir dhar talli galli mori ao..."

He cites another instance to emphasise the extent to which the suspicions have taken root in the Sikh mind. Some time back he told Dr Satya Dev, the head of the department of Public Administration in Punjab University, that the young Prime Minister, Rajiv Gandhi, seemed to be " doing very well." The professor stopped Mubarak Singh and said, "You may be right but tell me...the Delhi killings...what was Rajiv Gandhi's role?"The Delhi killings, Mubarak Singh tells me, weighs heavily on the Sikh mind, whether he is a child or an old man. "What Punjab needs today is a dozen psycho-analysts. It is no longer a political problem."

Going from Mubarak Singh to Satyapal Dang was something like going from a scholarly sant to a political sant. Many in Amritsar call him the Faquir Siasatdan (the saintly politician), and believe me, that's the impression he leaves on most people. A symbol of hope in the cesspool of politics, although even he has not been spared from all sorts of allegations, except that none of them has stuck. Dang said he had no doubts that election or no election, there were forces which were out to sabotage the accord. "The murder of Longowal was not only because of the elections but because he signed the accord." The terrorists would now work out a different strategy, and if our apprehensions come true, the task of secular, patriotic forces will become far more difficult."

We had barely started talking when in came some officers of the Punjab police. They had brought a bullet-proof jacket for Satyapal Dang. Obviously he was one of the candidates thought to be high on the hit list. Dang looked at the jacket—"point-blank body armour"—and smiled at me. Indeed, I had never thought comrade Dang would need this armour to fight elections some day. Behind him stood policemen with sten guns. Dang looked amused no end. Not that he would rule out the possibility of being attacked. "Don't write I am going to wear it," he said jokingly, "for then they might go for my head."

Dang, you could see, was far from sanguine about the post-election scenario. No matter which side won, there would be the terrorists and the extremists to contend with. Under the banner of the "United" Akali Dal, they had raised the slogan of "Panth in danger," and behind them there was the backing of the "foreign forces." Outside Dang's office in Chheharta was the somewhat rare sight of an independent candidate campaigning on foot. Almost surrounded by gun-toting securitymen. And yet how secure were these candidates? They obviously know there are too many chinks in the best of armours, which is why they have to resort to all manner of ruses. Fighting from Hoshiarpur is the fiery Jathedar, Suchcha Singh Chhotepur. He has a dozen personal bodyguards around him all the time, but that is not enough. One of his styles of fobbing off the potential killers is to announce three or four meetings at the same hour of the day and then go to the fifth unannounced meeting. His supporters, they say, are not annoyed with this at all, for they know he is high on the hit-list and the killers mean business.

What do the elections hold for Punjab? Much would obviously depend on the turnout of voters. How many would go out and vote, knowing the dangers involved? Many voters are getting letters from their friends and relatives elsewhere telling them not to go out to vote,come what may. Why risk your lives? Another question mark, of course, is whether or not the rumours about the Congress wanting an Akali victory are true. About the only objective onlooker who seemed to poohpooh the rumours was the old journalist, G.R. Sethi. "No political leader," he thought, "would like to commit political suicide." And if the rumours really got hold of the electorate there would be a "terrible backlash" among the Hindu voters. If that happened the Congress(I) would be nowhere: "It would fall between two stools."

Whatever the results of the polls, there would still be a long dark tunnel to traverse. As I returned from Punjab the words of Mubarak Singh kept coming back: "It is no longer just a political problem..." When will the healing of the psyche come? ■

"We Consider the Killings as the Will of God Almighty"

Baba Joginder Singh told SUNDAY

The president of the "United" Akali Dal does not like being called an angry old man. He is sore that the press has been misstating his age as 83 when he is actually 74. He is still convinced that his son, the slain militant Sikh leader J.S. Bhindranwale, is alive and well. Like his son, he is defiant of authority and believes the "Amritdhari" Sikh to be above all other men: to compare Longowal with Mahatma Gandhi, according to him, is an insult to the former. He lives in the quarters of a Golden Temple granthi (priest) behind the famous Manji Sahib Hall, the Akalis' meeting place. The Baba had just returned from prayers at the Harimandir Sahib and looked fresh and alert at the beginning of his interview to SUNDAY. Among those present during the conversation were Amolak Singh, private assistant to the Baba and grandson of the late head of the Damdama Sahib Taksal, Sant Gurbachan Singh Bhindranwale, and Tejwant Singh Gill, a leading businessman from Ludhiana and staunch follower of Baba Joginder Singh. Excerpts:

Q What do you make of the recent terrorist attacks in which six persons were killed and over dozen injured in several districts of Punjab?*

A: Whatever Wahe Guru (God Almighty) wishes happens. The will of God hurts some people.

Q: Do you approve of terrorist violence?

A: We consider it as the will of the Wahe Guru.

Q: Who is behind the violence in Punjab now?

A: This the government would know better.

Q: Do you think some foreign forces are behind the terrorist violence in Punjab?

A: I stay here with my colleagues (pointing to some aides sitting in the room). But sitting here I hear that the government is saying that those who are boycotting the poll in Punjab are extremists and they will be crushed. In the eyes of the government I am the biggest terrorist. And the government is trying to crush me and my colleagues.

Q: What do you feel about the recent murder of a Congress(I) leader Arjun Das and his bodyguard in Delhi?

A: People in Delhi would know better. The killing could be a result of personal enmity. But we consider it as the will of Wahe Guru. Still I suspect that there is some kind of government conspiracy behind these killings.

Q: There is a feeling that Arjun Das was killed because of his hand in the November riots.

A: People in Delhi would know better.

Q: What do you think about the killing of Sant Harchand Singh Longowal?

A: It was the will of the Guru. But it is also felt strongly that there was a government conspiracy behind his murder. This is evident from the recent action taken against policemen for their gross negligence in failing to provide him (Longowal) the necessary security. The policemen were sacked because they were slack in performing their duties. And if the policemen in charge of the security of Longowal were not good, why were they entrusted the task, in the first place? This exposes the government conspiracy.

Joginder Singh: the answer is God's will

CNS

Q: You have also been reported to have commented that Sant Longowal was responsible for creating the circumstances that led to his death. What were these circumstances?

A: I have not said this.

Q: What do you think of Sant Longowal as a human being?

A: A true human being is one who acts like a human being. And one who acts like a devil is a devil. But mind you, I am not referring to any particular person. I am just saying this in general.

Q: What will be Sant Longowal's place in Sikh history?

A: The historians will write as they understand.

Q: But after his assassination, Sant Longowal is being compared with Mahatma Gandhi. What do you say to that?

A: The question should be put to those who are comparing him (Longowal) with Gandhi. But we consider an "Amritdhari" Sikh to be above any other person. Hence it is no compliment to any Sikh to be compared with Gandhi. It is rather damaging to him (Longowal).

Q: Do you think Sant Longowal was playing into the hands of the government as is being alleged in some quarters?

A: Those who are making this observation will know better. But people have such feelings because the Delhi accord was against the Sikh qaum (the word qaum, according to Akali moderates means community, and nation according to Akali hardliners). That is what the people say. We have already rejected the Delhi accord. It has no meaning for us.

Q: What do you think of the other four senior Akali leaders—Prakash Singh Badal, Gurcharan Singh Tohra, Surjeet Singh Barnala and Balwant Singh?

A: They are also with Rajiv Gandhi.

Q: There is a strong feeling about a 'brain' behind Baba Joginder Singh.

Sondeep Shankar

Baba Joginder with his followers: unyielding

Who is he?

A: (Smiles) Guru Gobind Singh. Guru Granth Sahib. Whatever he wills happens But he is at our head, not 'behind' us.

Q: Why did you boycott the elections in Punjab?

A: The Guru Granth Sahib was desecrated in the holiest Sikh shrine, the Harimandir Sahib, during the June army action here. The Golden Temple was attacked with tanks. Two thousand and five hundred copies of the Guru Granth Sahib were set on fire. The government employees entered our holiest place with shoes on. They demolished the Akal Takht with shells of tanks. They smoked cigarettes and bidis inside the holiest temple. Devout Sikhs—men, women and children—were shot dead inside the Golden Temple. In the November riots, thousands of innocent Sikh men, women and children were butchered. Copies of Shri Guru Granth Sahib were scattered at crossings in Delhi and desecrated. Innocent Sikh children were put into gunnybags and set on fire. When the children screamed, they (the rioters) said that the Khalistan of the Sikhs was screaming. Keeping in view this tragedy, and demanding the release of the members of the Damdama Sahib Taksal, Sikh soldiers and members of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) went to jail besides resolving to continue the fight for the achievement of the rights of the Sikh qaum. I decided to use the authority entrusted to me and boycott the poll and not to cast my vote during the elections.

Q: Do you propose to take some action against party leaders, Randhir Singh Cheema and Jaswinder Singh Brar, who recently revived the Akali Dal (Talwandi) after parting company with the 'United' Akali Dal?

A: I feel bad about the mistake they have committed. But it is a family matter. We will think over it and decide the matter.

Q: Are you in touch with the convener of your party's ad hoc committee Simranjit Singh Mann, currently in Bharatpur jail, and Harinder Singh, another senior member of the committee, who is in Norway these days?

A: Simranjit Singh Mann is in jail. They don't allow us to meet him. The other one, Harinder Singh, who had resigned from the Indian Foreign Service (IFS) in protest against the army action in the Golden Temple, has also not met us. But they were given these important positions in the party on the basis of the sacrifices made by them.

Q: You say that your fight for the rights of Sikhs will continue. Could you kindly tell us what those rights are?

A: Those rights are the concern of Rajiv Gandhi. When the time comes and he (Rajiv Gandhi) also realises that it is necessary to know about the rights of the Sikhs, I will explain the matter to him. But then he can't keep quiet after hearing us out. I can also tell you what our rights are. But that will be of no use. You will write them in your newspaper and after half an hour, the newspaper will be thrown into the wastepaper basket.

Q: Do you think the elections will pass off peacefully in Punjab?

A: It all depends on the will of the government. If the government wants to hold the elections peacefully, it has got the whole administrative machinery under its control. But if it (the government) is bent on creating some mischief then it can always organise some killings and put the blame on us to crush us. It might be thinking on these lines. It would know better. The government has already started arresting and harassing our leaders and workers.

Q: What do you think of the Punjab situation now?

A: Atrocities are going on against us.

Q: What are your views about Khalistan?

A: I have stated my view on this subject many times before and I repeat the same. If Khalistan is in your hands, then I will talk to you. But if things are not in your hands, then there is no point talking to you. The Khalistan issue can be discussed only with the person who is to decide the issue.

Q: Do the Sikhs plan to get their rights within the framework of the Indian Constitution?

A: This too we will talk to it (the government) about. But Rajiv Gandhi is suppressing our rights.

Interviewed by Sanjeev Gaur

Mahesh Bhatt, Kumar Gaurav and Shernaz Patel on the sets of Janam

Janam of the Indian Telefilm

Will Mahesh Bhatt usher in a new genre in entertainment?

Janam is the coming to life of a new genre of commercial entertainment in the country. It is not simply the title of a film to be premiered over Doordarshan's national hook-up on 22 September, it is also the first-ever telefilm to be made. Janam is different from the run-of-the-mill Hindi films; it is a non-formula film and the difference is that it has been conceived and produced for the intimacy of the drawing room. The popular telefilm, a concept in the West, makes its debut on Indian television when the quality and content of films telecast by Doordarshan has come under strong criticism. The Sunday evening entertainment package is mostly a stereotype ordeal. Today, there is a demand for clean films being shown on television. While, this demand will, to a certain extent, be fulfilled with Janam, the telefilm is aimed at upgrading the existing standard of films on Doordarshan and encouraging healthy cinema to enter the privacy of homes. The telefilm is the latest in a series of imaginative steps taken by the Doordarshan authorities for better fare on television. There is optimism, that Janam, will begin a spate of such films. It will be yet another avenue for television advertisers and commercial houses to pump money into the idiot box.

For television-viewers entranced by the poignancy of Mahesh Bhatt's Janam, there may be no difference if the film was either made exclusively for Doordarshan or purchased by the directorate to be telecast on any Sunday. But to the discerning filmmaker, there is a change of technique and presentation, unique to a television film. The panoramic view of a formula film has been adapted to the limited range of the television screen. The maker of the telefilm has to keep in mind that the artistes would be enacting their roles on a screen much smaller than the cinema screen. There is an absence of long, sweeping shots of the camera in favour of close-ups. The telefilm is Doordarshan's premier which is enjoyed without the purchase of tickets. The biggest bonanza is for Doordarshan itself, which has been under constant fire for showing only "C grade" films: it will be able to select the kind of films it wants. In the process, it will substantially add to its commercial revenue.

The first serious proposal for making a film exclusively for television came a few months after Doordarshan's director-general, Harish Khanna, and information and broadcasting secretary, S.S. Gill, had sent "feelers" to directors who could be interested in small or medium-budget ventures to be shown on television first and later released commercially. Before Doordarshan could issue guidelines on the kind of telefilms it had in mind (no guidelines have, in fact, been issued so far) some directors including Mrinal Sen, Basu Chatterjee, Mahesh Bhatt and Sai Paranjpye approached Doordarshan with their film scripts. Mahesh Bhatt, producer of Arth and more recently Saraansh was the first to place on Doordarshan files a concrete proposal. His plan to launch the first telefilm received a boost when Mudra Communications, an advertising concern, decided to tie up with Bhatt and sponsor the film. It was originally planned that Doordarshan would pay the director Rs eight lakhs as telecasting fees, as it had done with Damul and Sukha (both films were premiered over Doordarshan this year but were not made exclusively for television). But by the time Janam was in the cans, the sponsor (Reliance Textiles) stepped in with a proposal that Mudra Videotec, a subsidiary of Mudra Communications, would pay Doordarshan Rs one lakh for sponsorship in return for four minutes of free advertising time. In the revised advertising rate chart of Doordarshan released in August this year, the telefilm was introduced as a new category for sponsorship. The rates for sponsoring such films, effective November this year, would be Rs one lakh for 90 minutes' duration, with four minutes of free advertising time. For a 60-minute film the rate would be Rs 70,000 with three minutes free advertising time.

With no more telefilms in the pipeline, there is a feeling that telefilms like Janam is perhaps the last of its kind. There is also the feeling that Janam is the pioneer of a new brand of cinema which is here to stay.

The second initiative, perhaps, has been taken by Mudra Videotec which, according to its own officials, has "taken a calculated risk in investing in the film without being assured of its success at the box office." For Mudra, the creation of Janam is only one of the many firsts it has achieved in the short span of time since it stepped in to make programmes for television. The company itself has grown from a Rs 13.2 crore billing in 1980-81 to a Rs 80 crore projection for the coming year . Today, Mudra is handling seven programmes including Rajani which has replaced the earlier top-rated serial Hum Log, Doordarshan's home production. Rajani has been so popular that the serial has been mentioned in the columns of the New York Times and over the BBC as one of the finest serials in the world. Besides, Mudra has already made a name for itself by importing high-profile, popular programmes like the Grammy awards, the Oscar and the Nobel prize presentations, the Miss Universe contest and the Live Aid pop show. For the television viewer, Mudra has brought in late-night shows.

While many might have complained about Mudra receiving a favoured position with the directorate in New Delhi, the decision to produce the country's first telefilm has once again reiterated the innovative approach of the agency. Said Sam Balsara, general manager, Mudra Communications: "From the marketing point of view, making telefilms is not profitable. We realised someone had to show the way and introduce a new medium of film entertainment. Now we expect, others will take the cue from Janam and enter into producing films exclusively for Doordarshan."

Consider the financial implications of making a telefilm like Janam. The film has cost Mudra Videotec over Rs ten lakhs, with one lakh paid as telecast time. According to the pro rata cost of sponsorship (for a 30-second sponsored programme, Doordarshan charges Rs 70,000 and offers two minutes of free advertising time) the 120-minute film should have attracted eight minutes of commercial time. According to Anil Gupta of Mudra Communications: "Doordarshan had initially allowed us the eight minutes for our telefilm. They later changed it to only four minutes cutting our revenue from the clients by 100 per cent." He added that while the production and telecast fee from the sole sponsor of Janam was still to be worked out, Mudra was negotiating the terms for selling cinema and video rights, after the film's telecast by Doordarshan.

According to Mudra officials, they were fortunate in finding an excellent producer and a superior theme. For Mahesh Bhatt, the telefilm is an important venture as it is an autobiographical attempt revolving around the life of a struggling film director. At the same time, it is a bold treatment of the sensitive subject of illegitimacy and the portrayal of the producer who has himself declared many many times: "I am a bastard." Again, in the selection of the theme of Janam, Doordarshan has shown that it is broadminded and can accept treatment of such sensitive subjects which have a social relevance and moral message. Janam has been seen by some critics as an attempt to legitimise illegitimacy. But, according to the producers, it attempts to remove the stigma of illegitimacy so firmly entrenched in our society and remove the veil of ignominy faced by a bastard child. The story rotates around Rahul (Kumar Gaurav) who is viewed as an outcast by society since he is the illegitimate son of Virendra Desai (Anupam Kher, who played the lead in Bhatt's Saraansh), a filmmaker who is no longer wanted. Rahul and his mother Nalini (Anita Kanwar) constantly face a barrage of insults, remain separated from Desai's family. It is on his way to discovering himself as a director that Rahul has to fight not only for the name of his father but also for a rightful place in his life after having been spurned by him at every step. In the concluding scene he is granted a new life, a janam. The climax of the film is reached at an award-presentation ceremony where Rahul is to receive recognition for his first film. His father gives the award to him and in an emotionally-surcharged moment grants the stamp of legitimacy on his son. The telefilm, it is obvious, is a personalised attempt by Bhatt. It has given an opportunity for the director to say what he wants to and he says it exclusively for the television-viewer.

'TV Will be the Trend-setter for Film Industry'

S.S. Gill, information and broadcasting secretary, told SUNDAY

Q: It was during the Tenth International Film Festival held in New Delhi that you first approached directors with a proposal to make films exclusively for Doordarshan. What was the objective?*

A: I spoke to some directors, as I have on several other occasions about the sad approach we have for telecasting films. The films that are shown by Doordarshan are too far removed from reality. They are an attempt at escapism with an excess of violence, sex and crime without even a hint of a social message. It was to show over Doordarshan, films with a social relevance that I decided on a three-pronged approach, of which one aspect was to have films specially produced for Doordarshan. This is the practice with several other broadcasting companies in Germany where telefilms lead the film industry. In a couple of years, I foresee a similar situation developing in India. Television will be the trend-setter for the film industry.

Q: What perceptive difference would there be in a film made for Doordarshan and one usually broadcast on a Sunday?

A: A film made for the theatre will use panoramic views, large sets. For a TV film, more emphasis would be laid on close-ups and mid-shots. It is a closer, a warmer contact. But the basic idea of mooting this concept of telefilms was to give opportunities to those directors who are not bothered about the commercial success of their film. They are not interested in the monkey tricks like dances, cheap songs, semi-nude scenes. Take Janam itself. It is an autobiographical film and the director, Mahesh Bhatt has said what he wants to—without bothering about the sale of a single ticket. He does not compromise on quality for making his film a box-office success.

Q: Who are the directors who have responded to your invitation and would be now making telefilms for Doordarshan?

A: In the eight-ten months since we launched the idea, several top-class directors have come to us. They include Mahesh Bhatt, Basu Chatterjee, Hrishikesh Mukherjee, Mrinal Sen and Sai Paranjpye.

My hope is that within six months, half of the films shown on Doordarshan, would be made for us.

Q: Will Doordarshan be playing the role of the censor for choosing the theme and sequence of telefilms to be broadcast?

A: Someone has to exercise judgement. If Doordarshan is going to be selective, it is perfectly understandable. There are artistes who may not have very strong social and moral commitments. But if we feel a particular scene or theme is socially damning, then we will decide whether to air it or not. Sex scenes may be permissible for some producers and cinema-goers, but not for Doordarshan. There have been complaints that with the TV serial boom, the film culture is being perpetuated into homes. But the fact is that the serials are very different. They are not escapist, nor romantic celluloid dreams, but films which deal with the ordinaries of life.

Someone has to exercise judgement. If Doordarshan is going to be selective, it is perfectly understandable. There are artistes who may not have strong social commitments. Sex scenes may be permissible for some producers and cinema-goers, but not for Doordarshan.

Q: The first telefilm to be aired by Doordarshan deals with a sensitive subject of illegitimacy. Should such a theme be exposed on, as you say, a home entertainment medium?

A: Janam has a bold theme. But the question is: how is the theme handled by the director? It is a film about the social trauma faced by an illegitimate child and his mother. The film is a depiction of true life and if there is any censorship it is for the advantage of the viewer.

When we see a deviation from purpose, that is where we will step in. The same as we have done in the case of serials and any number of sponsored programmes have gone off the rails. Take a serial like Rajani which has a social message to convey. I have personally contacted the director, Basu Chatterjee, and instructed him not to spare government officers and corruption in the establishment in future episodes.

Q: Do you expect any big banners to be attracted into making films for television, or only the small-budget film makers?

A: The point here is that no producer or director will sink with the film. If he, say, spends five lakhs on making a film, he will get eight lakhs from us. Though he will be allowed to get video and theatre rights, my own hunch is that after a telefilm has been premiered over Doordarshan, it would do well commercially. Television would provide tremendous publicity for it and after all only five crore people are watching it on TV. Seventy crore have still not seen the film.

Q: How is it, in the very first telefilm, the sponsor has stepped in and eventually Doordarshan would be earning a lakh of rupees instead of spending eight lakhs for paying the director, in this case Mahesh Bhatt, for showing it over Doordarshan?

A: Mudra Videotec who is making Janam with Mahesh Bhatt have been imaginative and have taken the calculated risk of embarking on something new. This does not mean that Doordarshan has favoured Mudra Communications and said no to others. The only favourites we have are those companies which can give us good quality films. What has Doordarshan to lose if someone else is willing to pay the tab and we get the money? I am confident, that as in the case of television serials, where we have ten programmes for a single slot, there will be a rush of good telefilms made by some best talents in the country.

CONTROVERSY

'A Handful of Jealous Politicians Do Not Constitute the AIADMK'

Jayalalitha Jayaram, MP, reacts to SUNDAY*'s report*

Anita Pratap's cover story, Jayalalitha: Skating on Thin Ice (25—31 August) is full of statements that are factually wrong and comments that are absolutely baseless. At the onset, no priest was flown in from Madras to Delhi by Ms Jayalalitha as mentioned by the author and no puja was performed in the bungalow allotted to her. Moreover, Ms Jayalalitha was never in any dilemma as to whether she should continue to stay in the MPs bungalow or return to Madras.

The fact is that she did not stay in the bungalow even for a day. She was informed that the bungalow had been renovated and was ready for occupation But on arriving at the house on 14 July, she saw that it was in a dilapidated condition and within an hour she moved to the Tamil Nadu house in New Delhi. From there she sent a letter to the chairman of the house committee of the Rajya Sabha, formally surrendering the bungalow on the ground that it was unfit for human habitation. Incidentally, she took with her 180 pieces of luggage and not 19 pieces as mentioned. Moreover, Ms Jayalalitha is a member of the parliamentary consultative committee for the departments of atomic energy, space, electronics, science and technology, environment and forests and ocean development and not just for electronics The allegation that she sent messages to the Prime Minister levelling charges against AICC(I) general secretary G.K Moopanar and others is also false and baseless.

In yet another part of the article, Ms Pratap says, "Jayalalitha is still waiting for MGR to lead her out of the shadows to political prominence again." Is Anita Pratap a mind-reader? How else would she know what is in Ms Jayalalitha's mind? In another place, Ms Pratap writes: "MGR is not favourably disposed to his partymen giving press interviews, something which had made Jayalalitha totally inaccessible to the press when she was the propaganda secretary in 1983 and 1984. She broke this hallowed edict only when she felt persecuted and needed the press to air her grievances to the public." Such remarks are baseless, for when

Jayalalitha: resurrected Shubha Studio

Ms Jayalalitha was the propaganda secretary she was not inaccessible to the press. She gave interviews during this period to several English periodicals as well as Tamil magazines. When she was first sent to the Rajya Sabha in 1984, Ms Jayalalitha held a press conference in New Delhi where the entire national press was present. Has Ms Pratap forgotten all this? Ms Jayalalitha was always accessible to the press. It seems to be a case of sour grapes on the part of the author who could not meet Ms Jayalalitha despite her repeated attempts.

Anita Pratap also says, "MGR was outraged when he learnt that she (Jayalalitha) had publicly questioned his mental alertness. This was an act of personal betrayal." Here Ms Pratap sounds like "the voice of R.M. Veerappan" and "the coterie." The author has conveniently forgotten or deliberately suppressed and ignored the fact that from the moment MGR fell ill and was admitted in Apollo Hospital in Madras on 5 October 1984, Ms Jayalalitha was denied access to him. Mrs V.N. Janaki and R.M. Veerappan saw to it that Miss Jayalalitha was not allowed to see MGR even once, not even when he was flown to the USA for medical treatment. After the campaign for the December '84 elections was over, during which Ms Jayalalitha campaigned tirelessly for the party's victory, it was made explicitly clear to her that even if she chose to defy party "commands" and went to the USA, V.N. Janaki would not allow her to see MGR.

Under such circumstances, how could Ms Jayalalitha know the state of MGR's health? The whole country knows how she was ill-treated, humiliated and persecuted during MGR's absence. The climax came on 31 December '84 when she was thrown out of Tamil Nadu House in New Delhi on a cold winter night. At that time R.M. Veerappan was making public announcements that MGR would be returning to India within two weeks. In anguish Ms Jayalalitha wondered how these people could persecute and humiliate her if MGR was really going to return home soon and was mentally fully alert.

It must also be remembered that R.M. Veerappan and his cohorts mounted a severe onslaught on Ms Jayalalitha both from public platforms as well as in the press, right from the moment MGR lapsed into unconsciousness on 13 October 1984. Their attack on Ms Jayalalitha continued unabated for four-and-a-half months. The only time they ceased their onslaught was during the three weeks in December 1984 while she was campaigning for the party in the Lok Sabha and Tamil Nadu Assembly elections. Anita Pratap and everyone else should remember that Miss Jayalalitha bore all this with stoic silence and fortitude. Despite the unbearable mental agony she was undergoing, she did not utter a word in self-defence or retaliation.

It was only towards the end of January 1985 that Ms Jayalalitha broke her silence and spoke to the press lashing out at her tormentors. Even then, she gave press interviews only four times: on 20, 21, 22 and 23 January. After that, although the attacks on her continued ceaselessly right till the eve of MGR's return to Madras on 4 February 1985, Ms Jayalalitha did not make any further statements to the press. The author's remark that Ms Jayalalitha "repeatedly gave press interviews" is untrue. It was the press which kept on repeating the interviews she had given just once, making it appear that she was repeatedly giving interviews. Apart from dailies, Ms Jayalalitha gave interviews to weeklies, fortnightlies and monthlies as well. Naturally these interviews appeared later, at delayed intervals. But all interviews were given by her only on those four days in January, and not afterwards.

Elsewhere in the cover story Anita Pratap says: "Earlier Janaki was nowhere by his (MGR's) side when he made public appearances. Now she is always seen with him . Earlier, it was Jayalalitha who stood next to MGR at public functions Till today he has not made a single public appearance with her (Jayalalitha) after his return." Here again Anita Pratap is totally wrong. Even before MGR's illness, the CM and Ms Jayalalitha never made public appearances together. Even when she was the propaganda secretary in 1983 and 1984, she always had her own separate public engagements. In fact they made it a point never to appear together at any public function or meeting. Even at that time, V.N. Janaki always accompanied MGR whenever he attended marriages or other public functions where he chose to take her along.

The only major occasions when MGR and Ms Jayalalitha made public appearances together were at the AIADMK rally in Cuddalore in June 1982, and the valedictory function of Mahakavi Bharathiar centenary celebrations in December 1982, and a few other occasions which are rare. Even on those occasions, Ms Jayalalitha never stood next to MGR. They only sat on the same dais for a little while, with several chairs and people between them.

In another place Anita Pratap writes: "Jayalalitha threw one of her famous tantrums and decided to leave Madras for good and settle down in Delhi. In a fit of temper she wound up her links with the city (Madras) and was all ready for closing the Tamil Nadu chapter and opening a new one in the capital." This again is another instance of the author's feverish imagination running riot.

In the first place, what does she mean by "one of her famous tantrums?" Has Anita Pratap ever witnessed Ms Jayalalitha "throwing a tantrum?" No one has, for that matter. She is a very dignified lady with poise and grace.

Secondly, Ms Jayalalitha did not decide "to leave Madras for good in a fit of temper." The house at No 12, Safdarjung Lane in New Delhi, had already been allotted to Miss Jayalalitha at the end of March 1985. But she was told that the house would be vacated only after three months and that she would have to wait until then. Accordingly, on 9 June 1985, Ms Jayalalitha was informed that the house had been vacated and that she could take possession of it. She needed two weeks to make the necessary preparations to set up a new establishment and so decided to go to Delhi to occupy the house in the second week of July. All Members of Parliament are allotted official accommodation in Delhi. When MPs set up house in the official accommodation allotted to them, it does not automatically mean that they are leaving their home state, or winding up their permanent residence in a fit of temper. Miss Jayalalitha set out to occupy the house allotted to her in Delhi. It was not due to any fit of temper. She had no intention of leaving Madras for good. She did not cut off her links with Madras either. Such reports were only fanciful speculations which appeared in the press.

Anita Pratap declares: "Jayalalitha has visions of playing a dynamic role on the national canvas." What is the basis or justification for such a statement? How does she know that Ms Jayalalitha has such visions? Has Ms Jayalalitha ever said so or made any such statements in public or in the press? This may be Anita Pratap's personal view.

The author also states that "Jayalalitha had made considerable efforts to cultivate Indira Gandhi." This again is totally wrong. Where is the proof that Ms Jayalalitha did so? The truth is that Ms Jayalalitha never made any effort to cultivate Indira Gandhi or anybody else for that matter.

Khushwant Singh speaks the truth when he says in another article in the same issue: "Jayalalitha was withdrawn, much younger and shyer (than Nargis). She rarely cared to look up or smile at anyone." That is the plain truth. Ms Jayalalitha is by nature too shy and reserved to go out of the way to cultivate anyone. Such behaviour is alien to her character. The truth is that Indira Gandhi was impressed by Ms Jayalalitha's performance in Parliament, and went out of the way to show kindness to her and encourage her, because she believed that Miss Jayalalitha had great potential which should be fully utilised.

At yet another point Anita Pratap says, "She (Jayalalitha) had been pestering MGR to give her at least a ministerial berth long before he fell ill." This again is absolutely untrue Such a remark is based upon hearsay and rumour. How does Anita Pratap know this to be a fact? Did she ever witness Miss Jayalalitha "pestering" MGR for a ministerial berth?

Anita Pratap goes on to comment about Ms Jayalalitha's "personality flaws" and her "unbridled arrogance." Granted that nobody is perfect, but Anita Pratap's sweeping assertion that "Jayalalitha is unpopular with her partymen" because of her "arrogance" is again only a case of reporting hearsay. Ms Jayalalitha is a human being and she may have her faults, but arrogance is certainly not one of them.

As regards Ms Jayalalitha's popularity with her partymen, Anita Pratap should realise that a handful of jealous ministers, MLAs and MPs do not constitute the AIADMK. Let the author take the trouble to undertake a tour of Tamil Nadu, and let her make the effort of speaking to the lakhs of grassroots workers who constitute 99 per cent of the party, as well as party functionaries at all levels, and let her try to elicit their opinions. Anita Pratap will then discover the extent of Ms Jayalalitha's popularity, and if she questions them about her alleged "arrogance," she will discover that the rank and file, the cadres of the party will tell her that Ms Jayalalitha was the only AIADMK leader who took the trouble to listen sympathetically to their problems and grievances and helped them out of their difficulties.

Anita Pratap comments elsewhere that "in the last six months it was evident that deprived of his (MGR's) patronage, she (Jayalalitha) had fast become a nonentity, a recluse whom the public stopped talking about," is rather ridiculous and sounds like wishful thinking on the part of R.M Veerappan and company. Moreover, the remark is self contradictory. If Ms Jayalalitha has really become a nonentity, a recluse whom the public has stopped talking about, why did SUNDAY feature this "nonentity" on the cover?

Anita Pratap observes: "Apparently, there are not many callers as the phones are always free All this is in striking contrast to the scenario two years ago. At that time Jayalalitha was besieged by partymen and outsiders." Such remarks are totally unwarranted. Ms Jayalalitha has always believed in preserving the peace and privacy of her home. Even two years ago, one could never see crowds at her house. She was besieged by partymen and outsiders at the party headquarters in Madras. All those who wanted to meet her had to go there. Crowds could be seen at her residence only on festival days or on special occasions when partymen and others would flock to her house to offer their greetings. On all other days it was made clear to everybody that if they wanted to meet her they had to go to the party headquarters.

Anita Pratap is welcome to spend one or two days here in my office room at Ms Jayalalitha's residence. If she sits here she will observe for herself the amount of mail we still receive every day, the numerous telephone calls requesting appointments and the innumerable requests inviting Ms Jayalalitha to preside over some function or address some meeting. It is a different matter that for the present, Ms Jayalalitha has decided not to accept any public engagements. Because she is not making public appearances now, it does not mean she is not in demand

N. Jegatheesan, personal assistant to Jayalalitha Jayaram, MP, Rajya Sabha, New Delhi

'If My Intent Was Malice, I Would Not Have Censored Shocking Details'

Anita Pratap replies

I was right. Jayalalitha is her own worst enemy. Even if I had intended to be malicious I could not have possibly succeeded in damaging her as she has done herself with her absurdly long, hysterical letter. I have every reason to believe that though the letter is signed by her personal assistant it has been authored by Jayalalitha herself. For some odd reason, Jayalalitha rarely puts her own signature to the letters she writes. Even if one were to give her the benefit of the doubt (which I am not inclined to do as I know her all to well), the letter must necessarily have had the endorsement of Ms Jayalalitha

It is a fact that I made repeated attempts to meet Jayalalitha. It took three days for my request to be communicated to her. Finally, an appointment was made for 29 August, which was abruptly cancelled with the excuse that she was unwell. I conveyed to her PA that we were planning to do a major cover story on her and that we were very keen to have her views. He said, he would get back to me. In the meantime, the main article was prepared and despatched. The interview was supposed to serve as an adjunct, where I would have elicited her opinion on three points: Why she chose to be a recluse; did she expect to be reinstated to her preeminent position in the party and her controversial dealings with the Congress(I). So the fact that she did not give an interview, in no way altered the main article as it had already been despatched. As a magazine of stature and repute, SUNDAY and I as its representative do not need to operate at the absurd and crass level of "sour grapes."

One of the basic contentions of the letter is that the article is the product of my fevered imagination Why on earth would I be interested in concocting stories about Jayalalitha (incidentally she has not denied any of the substantive issues in the article)? The article was written after detailed discussions I had with various people in the AIADMK, DMK and the Congress(I) ranging from ordinary party workers to ministers. I spoke to independent sources as well as my contact in the Jayalalitha household I talked to people close to MGR I took special care to elicit the opinion and views of the "coterie" as well as Jayalalitha's supporters (though they seem to be an endangered species these days and were surprisingly lukewarm in their support). In other words, the article was not an expression of personal views but a collation of facts gleaned from various people.

Another basic contention of the reponder is that no journalist can write about an event or situation unless he or she is a witness to it. This is manifestly absurd It that were to be the case any statement that I have to make about Jayalalitha's very existence would be invalid by virtue of the fact that I had not seen her for sometime. Except on two issues in which I am accused of being "factually wide off the mark" (I shall come to them later), the running argument in the 11 page letter is "How does Anita Pratap know this to be true?" or "Has Anita Pratap witnessed Jayalalitha throwing a tantrum?" and so on Not a single journalist saw Mrs Gandhi being assassinated but there have been detailed authentic reports on how exactly it happened. Journalists depend on their reliable sources who are privy to goings-on or have access to reliable information For the substantive issues of my article I have relied on independent sources who have nothing to gain or lose by Jayalalitha's descent or ascent but who by virtue of their unique positions have access to reliable information pertaining to her. So, while I have not actually witnessed Jayalalitha throwing a tantrum before MGR, or for that matter before newsmen when she threw out a newspaper correspondent in one of the January press conferences for having called her "hysterical" in his despatch about her, it does not mean that the scenes did not take place.

Javalalitha says I am factually wrong in saying that she was inaccessible when she was the propaganda secretary. Accessibility is ascertained not by press conferences given by the individual (it is called because the person wishes to communicate something specific) but the ease with which a journalist can establish contact with the person. MGR has given three, while the Prime Minister and chief ministers like NTR and Hegde have given countless number of interviews. Jayalalitha has given less than ten interviews in two years.

As for the comment that Jayalalitha never stood next to MGR because there were tables and chairs between them is so ludicrous that one wonders whether it merits a reply. I don't know how right is the claim that "they (MGR and Jayalalitha) made it a point never to appear together at any public function." While sources close to MGR verify that MGR felt frequent public appearances with Jayalalitha would invite adverse comments from within his party and the DMK, I don't know whether Jayalalitha thought so too. The point is, as admitted in the letter itself, there were occasions when the two were seen together at the same public function. Despite Jayalalitha's claim at the time of the December 1984 election campaign, that she would accompany MGR in the rounds of thanksgiving, she and MGR have not made a single public appearance—with or without chairs in between. So though she openly hankers to undertake joint tours with MGR, the latter has not chosen to do so. This is seen by partymen and political observers as indicative of MGR's desire to keep her at a distance

When I interviewed her in Coimbatore in December 1984 at the time of the elections, I asked her whether she really believed that MGR was as fine as Mr Veerappan and others projected him to be. At that time her reply was that there were many people who had seen MGR and testified to his good health. Pictures also showed he was fine and active. Mr Thirunavukkarasu, her supporter, was also victimised when his major portfolios were taken away from him when MGR was still in New York. He very wisely registered a protest and then left it at that. I have made no moral judgments on whether Jayalalitha was right or wrong in her outburst, all I said was that it made the Congress(I) leaders wary because the "Avenging Bhadrakali," as she called herself, sounded rash and immature (this was what the Congressmen had to say, not I)

I know that Jayalalitha has visions of playing a role at the national level because she told me so herself (like she did about her desire for a ministerial berth). This was an off-the-record session that I had with Jayalalitha. Much as she would love to attribute this to my imagination, fevered or otherwise, she cannot do so, because another journalist was present with me when she made these statements. She said, she had no intention of being strait-jacketed in Tamil Nadu and that ultimately she would join the Congress(I) and use Delhi as the centre of her activities.

As for her agreeing with Khushwant Singh's assessment of her being "shy," I would like to point out that he (Mr Singh) himself admits that he does not know her very well. Everyone in Tamil Nadu who have had some exposure to Jayalalitha will confirm that she is not shy. Sometimes she chooses to be reticent. She does not complain about what is admittedly Mr Singh's personal views because it is favourable comment, right or wrong.

As for wasting space on Jayalalitha because she was becoming a non-entity stripped of MGR's patronage, I would like to enlighten her that Gibbons wrote hundreds and hundreds of pages on the decline and fall of the Roman empire. The decline of a person, empire or phenomenon is as important as its evolution because it exposes the crucial play of forces. The fact that Prem Nazir, Malayalam film star (SUNDAY, 1-8 September), is today unwanted by the film distributors is as important to newsmagazines as the fact that he is mentioned in the Guiness Book of World Records for acting in the maximum number of films.

Regarding the remark about the lack of callers at her house—since January there have been so many festivals—how is it that even on festival days she gets very few callers compared to the number she received two years ago? She can no longer meet visitors in the party office as she holds no important post in the party. But if she is a political phenomenon in her own right as she claimed before pressmen and is still very much in demand, then her house (since she cannot use the party office as she holds no party post) would have been besieged by callers, irrespective of the fact whether she chose to see them or not.

Lastly, she alleges that I have written the article out of malice, spite and venom. I have always been sympathetic to Jayalalitha because I felt it must be difficult for her to prove her worth in politics which, particularly in Tamil Nadu, is a man's world. Fellow-journalists have always teased me for being 'soft' towards Jayalalitha. When everyone chose to dismiss her off, I took the trouble of following her on her election trail and wrote about how hard she worked and the large crowds she attracted. It required some effort on my part to ensure that my personal sympathy for her did not come in the way of the criticism levelled against her by her partymen or the current predicament that she found herself in. If my intent was malice, I would have referred to the absolutely shocking and abusive epithets Jayalalitha used in January to describe MGR who alone was responsible for the political heights she scaled prior to his illness. She cannot deny this because she made the vituperative remarks about MGR at the same session where the other journalist was also present.

MGR with his wife Janaki Shubha Studio

The irrefutable proof of the authenticity of my report was Jayalalitha's reinstatement as propaganda secretary of the AIADMK on 5 September, nearly two weeks after the 25 August issue of SUNDAY hit the stands. I had stated, based on my discussions with certain key persons, that MGR would reinstate her as the propaganda secretary as he now feels the need for a glamorous crowdpuller, a need necessitated by his speech impediment. So now is Jayalalitha inclined to believe that I am not just a mind-reader but a soothsayer as well?

Brute Force

Andhra Pradesh police are blamed for the murder of a civil rights activist

Was Dr A. Ramanatham, vice president of the Andhra Pradesh Civil Liberties Committee (APCLC) shot down by policemen or by extremists? He was shot at when a police funeral procession was passing by. Andhra Pradesh home minister Vasantha Nageswara Rao said in the state Assembly that the APCLC vice-president was a member of the CPIM(L) and that he might have been killed by a rival extremist group. He added that the funeral procession had passed by Dr Ramanatham's clinic more than half an hour before the murder. But this has failed to convince most people

Dr Ramanatham was a leading private pediatrician of Warangal town. He had also been a civil rights activist for a long time. His activities centred round his medical practice and work for civil liberties. The APCLC says that the police are deliberately portraying civil rights activists as extremist sympathisers and anti-social elements while they are trying to prove that Dr Ramanatham's murder was the result of an extremist attack in order to cover up the fact that he had been killed during a police funeral. The procession included the district superintendent of police and the DIG (range).

On 2 September, a sub-inspector of police was killed in a bomb attack at the busy Kazipet railway station. Sub-inspector Yadagiri Reddy had gone to the station to see off his wife who was travelling by the Madras-bound train in the evening. Suddenly six unidentified men began to throw bombs and then rushed up to him and shot him at close range. Yadagiri Reddy was killed and two others were injured. This bomb attack in a crowded railway station sent a wave of shock through Warangal town.On the morning of 3 September the slain sub-inspector was given a police funeral. The funeral procession began at the mortuary of the government hospital and ended at the victim's village near Warangal. The procession passed through the Warangal Main Road post near Dr Ramanatham's clinic. Soon after the procession passed, Dr Ramanatham was found bleeding profusely.

On that day some patients had already arrived at Dr Ramanatham's clinic but he had not begun to see them The doctor and two of his neighbours were standing in the lane which runs behind the row of shops. N. Murthy from one of these shops, the Bharatha Engineering and Electricals, said, "Dr Ramanatham, Ramulu and I were talking behind the shop. We heard some noise so we moved to the third shop which has a grill door, but it was locked. So we entered Kalpana Opticals from the back door which was open. We saw the procession going past, so Ramulu and I rushed off to close our shops as the other shutters were coming down." Dr Ramanatham was left behind in the empty shop. After the procession had gone by, the shop boy raised the shutter and found the doctor lying in the back room with bullet injuries. While no one noticed how Dr Ramanatham was shot at, people said that as the procession was passing by, a few of the processionists began to beat up the young man who was standing next to the doctor's clinic. According to them, in the commotion some people entered and assaulted the compounder and the patients too.

Dr Sampath Rajaram, a private medical practitioner who has a clinic near Dr Ramanatham's, corroborated the time sequence. Dr Sampath was driving to his dispensary in the morning when his car got caught up in the funeral procession. So his car had to proceed slowly behind the procession till he reached his clinic. Said Dr Rajaram, "I was starting to examine the second patient when two boys ran in. They said Dr Ramanatham was hurt. So I went with them to the opticals' shop. I found Dr Ramanatham in a bad condition but he recognised me and said, 'Sampath take me to hospital.' I rushed him to the government hospital. My only concern at that time was to reach him there alive." However, within an hour the news spread that Dr Ramanatham was dead. The shops started closing and Section 144 was promulgated. The situation became tense when the people heard the shocking news of the second brutal death in less than 24 hours.

The district police authorities claimed that the procession had already left the area at the time of the shooting. They also said that apart from the policemen in uniform, many others had joined the procession since there was much resentment about the killing of the sub inspector. Interestingly, according to reports, the police also claimed that some policemen had entered Dr Ramanatham's clinic to drive away a mob which had entered the clinic.

Four bullets were recovered from Dr Ramanatham's body during the post-mortem. The bullets were from a service revolver but the Warangal district superintendent of police K. Aravinda Rao had an explanation for this: many Naxalite groups possessed service revolvers which had been seized from policemen. A portion of the wooden partition in the Kalpana Opticals shop was shattered and a bullet was found embedded in the wood also.

According to some witnesses, Dr Ramanatham, on leaving his companions, was returning to his clinic by the back lane when the assailants saw him and chased him to the optical shop to gun him down. No sound of firing was heard. It is suspected that the revolvers were fitted with silencers. However, Dr Ramanatham's wife refuted the vendetta theory. She said, "He was a popular doctor. He has had his clinic for 19 years. Why should he have any enemy who would take revenge? He never did anything against any person, he was only fighting for civil rights, the police killed him." It is true that Dr Ramanatham was very popular especially among the poor since he dispensed medicine to poor patients at a nominal cost. And this gives credibility to the words of people like Kannabiran who said, "There is a calculated attempt to blur the distinction between civil liberties work and extremist political activity, so that the attack on one is not distinguished from the other."

In recent months, the police have launched an intensive programme against the extremists. The district police have taken to producing plays and burrakathas (folk dramas) to educate the public about the activities of the extremists. The propaganda, by way of plays with long rhetorical speeches, attracts the crowd. Whether the message attracts at the same rate is another matter. Police encounters with alleged extremist groups have also increased. This has started a conflict between the police administration and the civil liberties groups. The police are also becoming increasingly intolerant about the civil liberties groups.

Meanwhile, the state government has rejected a demand for a judicial inquiry into the murder of Dr Ramanatham. But the circumstances in which the murder took place during a police funeral procession speaks of the need for an impartial inquiry especially when there is ample circumstantial evidence to implicate the police. A young college lecturer who refused to be identified said, "It is difficult to believe that such killings could take place in broad daylight. But I have one question: what would have been the attitude and action of the police if such a murder had taken place during a procession of some other group of people?"

SUNDAY SPECIAL

Maulana Azad's Forgotten Home

Will the West Bengal government's takeover of the decrepit house in which the great Indian nationalist once lived bring back its lost prestige?

Today, the quaint and dignified house at 19-A, Ballygunj Circular Road in south Calcutta where Maulana Abul Kalam Azad once lived presents a sorry sight. Garages and barrack-like quarters have sprouted within its premises, oil drums are stacked in a corner, and during the monsoons the mud and slush makes it difficult to walk down the portico. There is very little evidence that once one of the founding fathers of the Indian Independence movement, lived and conferred with his colleagues like Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru and even Motilal Nehru to free India from the British colonial rule.

Maulana Azad had spent the early years of his life in this house. It became a meeting place for Congressmen. In fact, senior citizens of the locality still remember Azad's spellbinding oratory at a Congress meeting held at the residence. Despite its historical significance the house has been neglected for years. But when the deputy chairman of the Rajya Sabha and a grand-daughter of Azad, Najma Heptullah visited Calcutta in July, she met chief minister Jyoti Basu with the proposal to convert the house into a memorial for the fiery educationist. Mrs Heptullah later told SUNDAY that Mr Basu had been "receptive" to her proposal and had sought the details.

Mrs Heptullah also expressed her desire to hand over the house to the Asiatic Society. According to its general secretary Chandan Roy Chowdhury, the society is ready to take over the house and establish its Institute of Higher Learning in Islamic Studies there. "We are very interested in the house and await its requisition by the state government," said Roy Chowdhury.

The house is presently owned by the Kalimata trust under the chairmanship of A.S. Naskar and divided into three flats. While two flats have been leased out to companies, the third is occupied by a tenant who runs an anti-rust oil factory. The tenants feign ignorance about the possibility of a takeover by the government. Said one of them, who did not want to be named: "I am not at

The porch of Azad's house: can it be a site for a memorial?

"Converting the House into a Memorial Would be a Tribute to Him"

Najma Heptullah, deputy chairman of the Rajya Sabha, told SUNDAY

Q: When were you first approached by the trustees for the renovation of Maulana Azad's house inCalcutta?*

A: I received intimation about the house in May this year from the board of trustees which is under the chairmanship of A. S. Naskar. Before this I did not even know the address of the house and had never seen the place since I was seven years old when Partition took place and after Partition my grandfather shifted to his New Delhi residence at 19, Akbar Road.

Q: Did the old house hold any memories for you and was your visit to the house reminiscent of your family history?

A: This was the first time that I stepped inside the house. But I immediately recollected some stories which my grandmother, Fatima Arzu had told me about Dadaji. The first thing that struck me about the house was a room on the building's first floor, which had big windows and a huge tree on the side of it. One day a thief had climbed on the tree and entered Maulana Saheb's study room. He was in the room writing a book and the keys to his safe were lying on the table close to where he was sitting. The thief picked up the keys, opened the safe and stole his cigarette case and other valuables. He then walked out leaving the keys on the same table. When my grandmother came into the room and found the money, and jewellery from the safe missing she informed Maulana Saheb. He replied that he had been so engrossed in his book that he did not notice the entrance and exit of the thief. The Calcutta police later arrested the robber as he was selling the gold-monogrammed cigarette case. When the thief was brought before Maulana Saheb, he simply said: "I did not commit any theft. You were sitting in the same room when I picked up your things." Maulana Saheb after hearing this, requested the police not to punish the guilty man. This whole story which my grandmother had related to me during my childhood suddenly came back to me when I visited the house.

Q: Is there nobody else in the family who could have maintained the house after he left Calcutta following Partition?

A: No. Though I was only 17 years old when he died I was very attached to him. Besides, I am the only one who is active in public life and involved in politics. Therefore, I think the trustees have contacted me. But the importance of the house is not only that Maulana Saheb lived there for so many years, but it was the seat of decision-making where several national leaders used to visit and stay. Gandhiji, Nehruji and Motilal Nehruji came and stayed with Maulana Saheb in the same house. Momentous decisions were taken on the very spot. Besides, the house has a historic significance for the Congress since its seat of power was at Calcutta before Independence. Similar houses in Allahabad, the Anand Bhawan and the Swaraj Bhawan which are filled with memories have been converted into permanent memorials where hundreds of people come and relive the past and recapitulate on the lives of national leaders. This is what I had proposed for the house in which Maulana Saheb lived. But what can I do alone? I have to have the cooperation of the state government. Since 1988 is the centenary year of Maulana Saheb, converting the house into a memorial would be a befitting tribute to his memory.

Najma Heptullah

Q: In what state has the house been presently maintained?

A: The house is bereft of any sign that a great national leader once lived there. I felt so disillusioned at seeing the house that I did not want my illusions to be shattered further by visiting all the floors. There are three or four tenants who have occupied it and the biggest hurdle would be providing these tenants with compensation or alternate accommodation before they can be shifted.

Q: How much rent do the tenants pay?

A: It is not important how much they are paying. Even if they are paying five rupees every month and they refuse to vacate the premises, there is nothing I can do without the intervention of the state government.

Q: You had a meeting with the West Bengal chief minister, Jyoti Basu, on the subject. What was his opinion about converting the house at Ballygunj into a memorial?

A: He seemed receptive to the idea and simply said he would let me know what can be done. What I only want is that the memory of Maulana Saheb should not be obliterated forever. I suggested to the chief minister that the memorial need not only provide an insight into the life and times of Maulana Azad but also his contemporaries who made a contribution to the freedom struggle. The personal contribution that Maulana Saheb made, before and after Partition, and then in framing the Indian Constitution is incomparable in history. It was Maulana Saheb who was so opposed to the two-nation theory that he said it would not last more than 25 years. How true his words were! The major decisions about the Quit India movement took place in the same house when he was the Congress president. He spent years in jail fighting for the freedom of this country and was one of the closest aides of Gandhiji. He stood like a rock when people were killing each other.

all worried. Obviously our company will provide alternative accommodation. And we will be proud to tell our friends that we lived in the same house where Azad lived." According to Mrs Heptullah, the trust is willing to allow the conversion of the house into a memorial for Azad. The local people claim that the third tenant who has stacked oil drums all over the compound, will contest the takeover.

The attention that Najma Heptullah's intervention has focussed on the forgotten building, however, will not be sufficient to transform the decrepit house into a museum and place of public interest. If this were true, the feeble protests that have been raised about the pitiable condition of Azad's former residence would have spurred the state government authorities to take action. Said Mrs Heptullah: "Though the chief minister has assured me that he would take action and even the Prime Minister with whom I have spoken in Delhi has promosed (to take) action, it is sad that nothing has been done so far. If I had enough money then I would have myself rebuilt the house and pieced together all those memories which still linger in its rooms and corri-

Mrs Heptullah has made a passionate plea for the conversion of the house into a memorial, adding that it would be a befitting tribute if the residents could be evicted before 1988, the centenary year of Maulana Azad. After her return to the capital, she wrote to the chief minister reminding him of their talks and hoping that expeditious action would be taken. She also wrote in her communication of 2 July that she had sought legal advice. It was pointed out to her that there is a provision in the law for the requisition of such property, whereby a suitable compensation could be paid to the trust in lieu of the property. The three tenants who live in the house and have occupied it since Maulana Azad (who was himself a tenant) left it, could be asked to vacate the premises under the provision of the Requisition Act.

It is imperative that prompt action be taken to preserve the place where this great man lived. This would only set a precedent for the rehabilitation of other such historic residences and buildings which have been lying neglected. In another letter to Jyoti Basu, Mrs Heptullah has drawn attention to the Manicktalla burial grounds in Calcutta where the mazaars of her great grandparents exist. The letter dated 25 July, states: "I understand the burial grounds are in an utterly bad shape in as much as its iron gate which is supposed to protect the grounds from unauthorised encroachment is reported to have been removed. The burial grounds are being used as playgrounds and for dumping scrap material." Now as the centenary year of the late Maulana Azad is approaching, it is an insult to his memory that such shocking neglect has been allowed to set in.

UNITED KINGDOM

Asians in Peril

Racial violence erupts in Birmingham

Indians or South Asians living in the United Kingdom may be prosperous but they are hardly secure. The recent incident in the Handsworth district of the central England city of Birmingham last week, when marauding Black and White youths raided and set fire to an East African-Asian owned sub-post office, causing the deaths, by carbon monoxide poisoning and asphyxia, of two brothers, Kassam Ali and Amirali Moledina is only another example.

Strangely, it was the first time that immigrants of African-origin who are quite steadfast in their allegiance to their brown brethren, displayed a vicious streak towards Asians. Why they did so, has been rather naively explained in the British media as jealousy, since the Asians are relatively well-to-do, while the Blacks are poorer and less well educated. This view has been endorsed by a section of the Asian shopowners who suffered heavy losses as a result of the riot. But according to reports, the Asians are also to blame for the chaos.

Wherever they go, a majority of South Asians tend to carry their "fair bride" syndrome with them. In the West, they are additionally afflicted by the "new rich" complex. These two shortcomings also contribute to a racist attitude. It would not be incorrect to say that Asians hold the darker-complexioned West Indian race in considerable contempt, especially if they are not financially well-off. In fact, many Asians would be proud to entertain a White in their houses, but would rarely contemplate inviting a Black.

But nothing can justify the mob fury in the Lozells Road area of Handsworth. This suburb of Birmingham witnessed one of the worst incidents four years ago, when riots in Toxteth in Liverpool and Brixton in south London took place. Ironically, Handsworth had been portrayed as a showpiece of community relations. In fact, a day before trouble broke out, Handsworth had witnessed a peaceful and enjoyable carnival. But the underlying tensions surfaced soon after. In Handsworth, 58 per cent of the population are from the "New Commonwealth" or in other words, those from the West Indies, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh and East Africa. The rate of unemployment, however, is highest among the Blacks. The unemployed Blacks are also believed to be involved in drug-trafficking and other breaches of the law.

Recently, the West Midlands police had, in fact, cracked down on drug peddlers leaving behind disaffection among many West Indians. Over the years, links between the guardians of the law and the Black immigrant sections have been rather tenuous in Birmingham, as elsewhere in Britain. The "stop and search" laws, complain the West Indians have always been used against them, rather than being directed at the population as a whole. Consequently, the anger built up, with the slightest provocation having the potential of creating an explosion.

The first conflagration took place five years ago in Bristol, which the authorities believed to be an one-off incident. Then, in 1981 the riots were more widespread prompting the setting up of a major commission of enquiry headed by the distinguished judge, Lord Scarman. Only the proposals regarding effective policing have been implemented by the Thatcher government, while the fundamental issues like social and economic problems were ignored or not tackled with adequate sincerity. The tendency of racial discrimination among White policemen and their differences between them and the Blacks have continued.

Handsworth, in this respect was believed to be an exception. An enterprising police officer had taken the initiative to win over the West Indians and make them feel that the latter were their friends. But this energetic superintendent of police resigned after he disagreed with his superiors on policy and finance. But in recent months, the situation in Handsworth was worsening rapidly and it was no surprise that another nasty flare-up occurred.

It has been said that Whites (the highest number arrested following the riots) ganged up with the Blacks to vent their wrath on the Asians. This is probably true. But at the same time, Black community leaders in Birmingham have been quick to realise the damage that has been brought on relations with immigrants from the subcontinent. They have given out apologies and severely condemned the riots. Nonetheless, the hunt for those responsible for the tragic demise of the Moledina brothers has begun. But one thing is clear: the killers must be captured and convicted. Otherwise the incensed Asians will have no respect in future for the police.

BOMBAY

Quietly Fades the Don

Varadarajan Mudaliar is slowly losing his clout

Varadarajan Mudaliar, once the most powerful underworld figure of Bombay, is slowly losing his grip over his empire. Reason: deputy commissioner of police Y.C. Pawar, who is in charge of the Matunga police station, has been slowly clipping his wings over the last three years. According to one source, Varadarajan may even quit Bombay permanently to settle down in Madras where he is financing a film in which his son has a major role. Besides, says an informed source, he will have to pay less people in Madras than he does in Bombay where allegedly every political party receives pay-offs.

The immediate reason for Varadarajan's distress is the controversy over the Sarvajanik Mama Ganapati Pooja Committee's request to hold the Ganapati festival. According to residents of that area, the festival is held with great pomp and splendour. For ten days, the roads from Matunga post office to Podar College are turned into a fairyland with coloured lights brought from Indore and the shamiana from Baroda. Over Rs ten lakhs, most of which is extorted from shopkeepers and hotel owners in the area is spent during these ten days. The members of the Pooja committee however deny that they extort money.

Apart from the entertainment which it provides to the people who throng the show, the cover of religion gives added acceptability and clout to Varadarajan. It is said that the police and politicians were "in his pocket" and that he could organise such a massive show only by keeping the police (including the traffic police) away from the area. For ten days, his men would be in total charge in the area. The festival gave employment to at least 100 unemployed youths who were also given khaki or white uniforms. It is believed that he invested in them for his alleged nefarious activities.

In the last three years, the festival has been held on a less lavish scale. It was said that Varadarajan had to keep the show going or his empire consisting of illicit dens and brothels would crumble. Varadarajan was also being cornered by the deputy commissioner of police Y.C. Pawar whom he tried to harass through court cases filed by his henchmen. For the first time, the then police commissioner Julio Ribeiro managed to put Varadarajan behind bars for nearly a month under the National Security Act early this year. Varadarajan had already taken refuge in Madras and had tried to seek anticipatory bail. When this failed he was brought to Bombay and sent to Nasik jail. Even in prison, he continued to wield immense clout. However, when legislators protested against the VIP treatment given to him, four policemen were suspended.

In July this year, the Pooja Committee applied for permission to the Bombay Municipal Corporation with a copy to the Matunga police station. On 21 August, a police chowki was put up in the area where the festival celebrations are held. Permission was given but the organisers were allotted far less space than was usually given. The committee protested and filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court. Justice Sujata Manohar, while dismissing the petition, asked the organisers to come to an amicable agreement with the municipal authorities regarding the amount of space. The advocate-general of Maharashtra, who appeared on behalf of the government, said that the authorities could only give an area of 1,500 sq feet. To justify this, Mr Pawar told SUNDAY since the area is very near the Matunga railway station, the police could only allow a smaller space.

The organisers rejected this offer and appealed to the divisional bench. They also approached the Shiv Sena which controls the corporation to get the necessary permission. Pramod Navalkar and Manohar Joshi, the two lieutenants of Shiv Sena chief Bal Thackeray, met the commissioner to intercede on behalf of the Pooja Committee. Pramod Navalkar later clarified that they were intervening on behalf of the committee and not Varadarajan. The organisers maintain that Varadarajan has nothing to do with the pooja committee. Varadarajan was the president of the committee for 17 years: a post he had held till three years ago. But it is Varadarajan who is behind the committee because none of his henchmen have the money or access to the large amount of money which is spent on the show.

MAHARASHTRA

A Return to "Swadeshi"

Cloth made of imported fibre to be burnt

On 2 October, Mahatma Gandhi's birth anniversary, a series of bonfires of Rajivastra will be lit in about 125 places throughout Maharashtra. The most important incident, said Sharad Joshi of the Shetkari Sanghatana, will take place at Wardha a few kilometres from Nagpur and a town closely associated with Mahatma Gandhi and the Independence movement. Rajivastra, as the peasant leader Sharad Joshi told SUNDAY is not imported cloth. It is cloth made after blending imported fibre and petrochemicals. Lighting the bonfires will be the farmer's way of protesting against the anti-cotton growers policy of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's government. The recent reduction in excise duty on polyester yarn from Rs 45 per kg to Rs 25 per kg is detrimental to the farmers, said Mr Joshi. "In Maharashtra, the farmers are forced to sell their cotton to the government through the cotton monopoly purchase scheme and the government pays a price that is below the cost of production. Maharashtra produces about 20 lakh bales of cotton, 65 per cent (13 lakh bales) of which is of the superior long staple variety. Two other states. Karnataka and Gujarat also grow the long staple fibre. The mills are, however, not keen on using long staple fibre and Mr Kedar of the State Trading Corporation had admitted that 28 lakh bales of long staple fibre where lying in godowns throughout the country. The Maharashtra state government had asked the centre for permission to export 12 lakh bales of long staple fibre and it was only recently that the government has given the go-ahead for the export of three lakh bales. Mr Joshi said that Rajiv Gandhi's new textile policy permits "fibre flexibility" which, for cotton-growers is a harmful policy. Till recently, production was regulated in a way that 80 per cent of the total raw material used by a mill had to be cotton fibre. It was C.R. Rajagopalachari who was the author of this policy. But today, cotton fibre is a minor element in the combination and the government is also allowing liberal imports of machinery to handle this fibre. "In fact," said Sharad Joshi "this is the only aspect of the new textile policy that is being implemented. The government had promised that production of Janata cloth would be given over to the handloom sector, but now they have gone back on this and given it to the national textile corporation mills. We have therefore called this cloth of polyester cotton blend Rajivastra."

The 2 October incident will not be an isolated one but will be followed by various other Rajivastra burning programmes. On 6 October, a rally of sugarcane producers will be held at Rahuri in Ahmednagar district and they will show their solidarity with the cotton growers by burning "Rajivastra." On 7 October at Pune, there will be a huge bonfire of "Rajivastra" to coincide with the eightieth anniversary of the burning of foreign cloth by Lokmanya Tilak in Pune in 1905 to protest against British imperialist policy of exploitation. Mr Joshi said, "Throughout the week, we will gently persuade people in a non-violent manner to put their "Rajivastra" into the fire. As far as the shopkeepers are concerned, we have asked them to start disgorging their stocks from 15 September onwards so that by 2 October there will not be any "Rajivastra" left in their shops. "We have set a deadline of 15 October for the shopkeepers by which they should return their stocks of Rajivastra. If they fail to do so by that date, then we will picket all such shops at taluka level."

TERRORISM

A Breakthrough, at Last

The Delhi police made a major breakthrough when they recently arrested six hardcore terrorists who had come to the capital from Punjab. The arrests were made days before they were to execute their plan to blow up the Shan-e-Punjab Express which runs between Delhi and Amritsar. The interrogation of the suspects, some of whom were wanted for the July bomb blast cases, is expected to lead to further arrests for which special teams have been sent to Punjab. The leader of the terrorists, Jagdish Singh however, committed suicide by consuming potassium cyanide minutes before his interrogation by the Delhi police. Jagdish Singh was also wanted for his involvement in the transistor bomb blasts and had been released on bail following his arrest in the Palika bazar bomb blasts in the capital last year.

While the suicide of Jagdish Singh has permanently silenced one aspect of the conspiracy, the six men who are facing interrogation at various places in the capital have told the Delhi police of their connections with the terrorists in Punjab, especially the men who were to finance the purchase of explosives for blowing up the train. The interrogation is believed to have led the Delhi police and the crime branch to important clues linking the members of the gang with the assassination of Lalit Maken and his wife and later, the killing of Congress(I) metropolitan councillor, Arjun Das on 4 September. According to Delhi police sources, the connection between the present arrests and the assassinations of Congress (I) leaders in the capital could not be firmly established. It has, however, been confirmed that the deceased suspect, Jagdish Singh, knew the persons arrested on 5 September following the murder of Arjun Das.

The police have in their custody, Harmeet Singh, another hardcore terrorist, who was arrested on 7 September. Harmeet Singh, a professor in the Khalsa College and an executive member of the Delhi State Akali Dal (Longowal) was remanded to judicial custody with five other suspects and was charged under Sections 3 and 4 of the Anti-terrorist Act. After sustained questioning by the police, it was revealed that Jagdish Singh, who was a resident of Narela and his accomplice Balbir Singh, also under arrest had approached Harmeet Singh in early September for money to blow up the Delhi-Amritsar Express in a week. The attempt was foiled following a tip-off received by the police who arrested Harmeet Singh and Balbir Singh on 7 September. It was also established that Jagdish Singh and Subeh Singh, another suspect, had come to Delhi from Amritsar four days ago and were since staying at the Paharganj residence of Mohinder Singh Goggi, a local anti-social. They had also collected large quantities of explosives.

The six terrorists, Mohinder Singh Goggi, Harinder Singh, Subeh Singh, Sukhdev Singh and Balbir Singh were produced before metropolitan magistrate, V.K. Malhotra and remanded to judicial custody till 20 September. The observation of the magistrate concerning the case was: "keeping in view the nature and gravity of their offences, the suspects should be remanded to prolonged judicial custody."

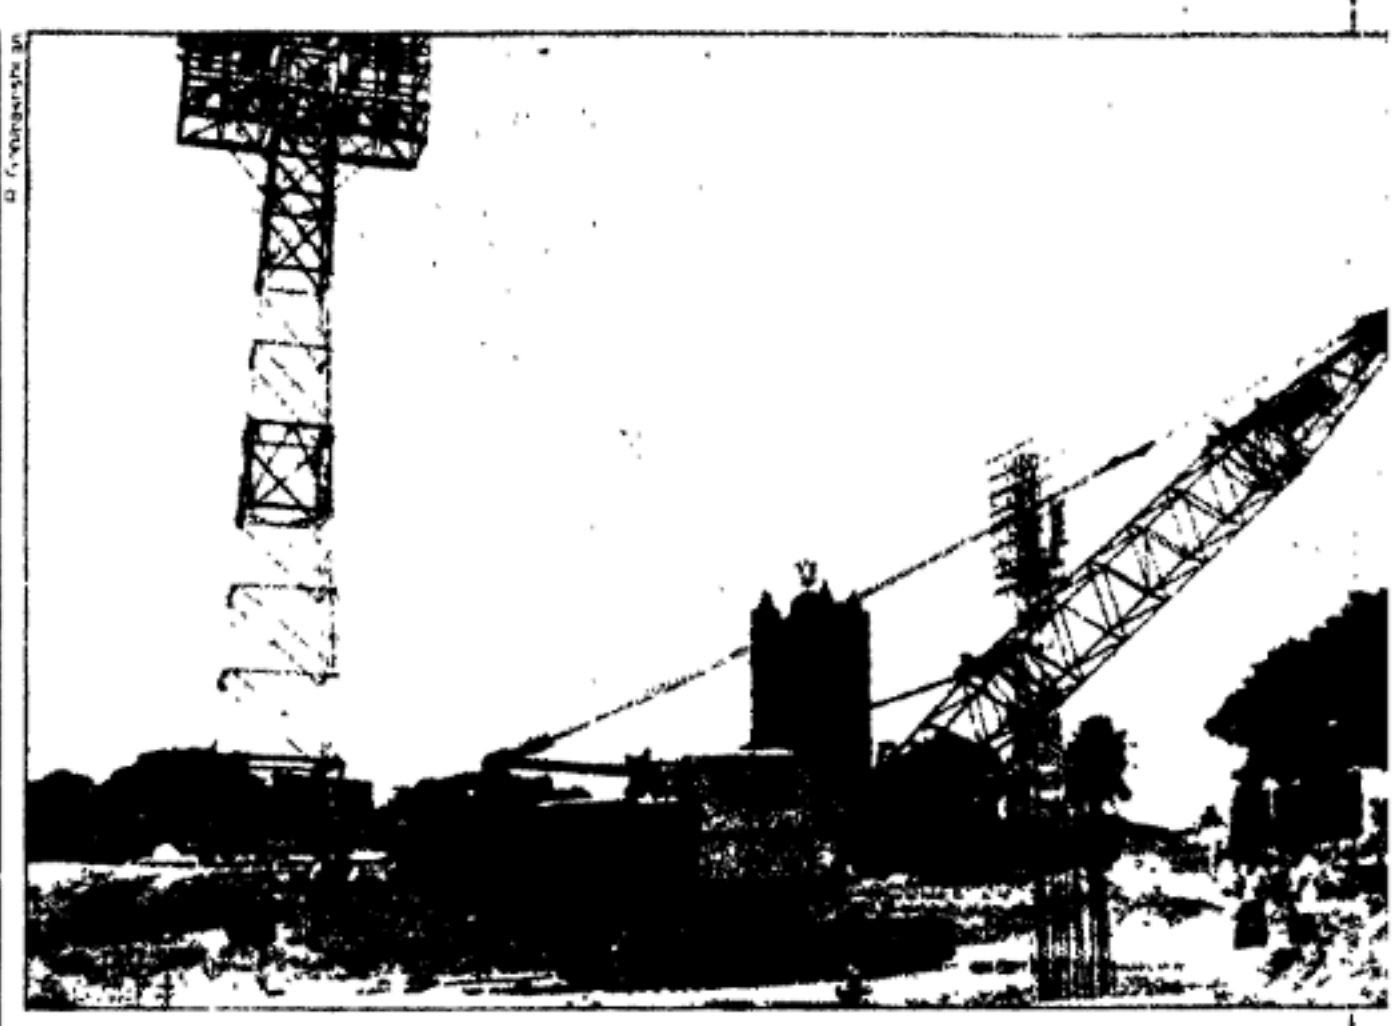
KERALA



Foul Play

Row over soccer stadium

The construction of a large gallery in the Chandrashekharan Nair stadium to accommodate 40,000 spectators for the Nehru trophy soccer tournament in January 1986 has raised a number of questions about the impact such a structure will have on the congested cityscape. The stadium is situated in the heart of the city with narrow roads on three sides and the gallery will prevent the construction of a fourth road which is part of the approved master plan for the city. Voluntary organisations like the Kerala Sastra Sahitya Parishat (KSSP) have expressed their concern about building such a haphazardly-planned concrete structure without proper facilities or exit points for spectators. In retaliation, the sports associations in Trivandrum took out a procession and shouted slogans supporting the construction of the gallery. They argued that the construction would ensure that the open stadium space was not utilised for the widening of Palayam Road, the most important thoroughfare in Trivandrum.

"We are sports lovers and football fans and we would love to have a beautiful stadium in the city. But as citizens of Trivandrum, we have every right to see the plan of the gallery and whether proper facilities are being provided. We cannot understand why the whole project is shrouded in secrecy," said Dr Iqbal, a neuro-surgeon who is president of KSSP. The Chandrashekharan Nair stadium belongs to the Kerala police and the construction is being overlooked by an organisation consisting of senior police officials. After Trivandrum was given the opportunity to hold the Nehru trophy tournament, this stadium was selected as the venue because of its superior ground conditions. The stadium also has floodlights which the bigger university stadium nearby lacks.

The budget for constructing the gallery is Rs two crores and the police had planned to take a loan from the toddy-tappers welfare fund. But there were objections to this and now a consortium of nationalised banks in Trivandrum is financing the project. The Kerala police have got the chief architect of the PWD, Mr Ramaswamy, to draw a plan and entrust the construction to the Uttar Pradesh Bridges Corporation. The corporation faces the task of finishing in four months a project which would normally have taken over a year. The senior police officials gave the go ahead signal for the construction without getting the approval of the Trivandrum Development Authority (TRIDA) which has to sanction all construction in the city. Instead, an expert committee was constituted (vide Go no 1953/85/home) to consider the safety measures and needs of town-planning. The report has not yet been submitted but work on the project has begun.

Construction of the gallery at the stadium in progress

It was initially decided to construct a two-tier gallery covering almost the whole of the stadium. But as it would block the view of the beautiful Palayam church and the Palayam mosque, the gallery circumference was reduced to about half its original size. The police have not made the plan public and have refused to show it to KSSP officials. The secretary of the Trivandrum Development Authority has in a letter to Mr Ramaswamy pointed out that "a structure about 250 metres long and 18 metres high would mar the aesthetic quality of the present green open space." But others feel that such a structure will only enhance the beauty of the city which has no tall buildings. Police officials are allegedly keeping the plan a secret as the gallery is bound to scuttle plans for the proposed six lane road on the eastern side of the stadium. The road had already been sanctioned by the government in 1978. "The government is acting contrary to its own plan," said Benny Kuriokose, a young architect. "As a citizen, I have a right to know what is going to happen to my city. See how well the Asian Games stadia in Delhi were planned. The stadia in Delhi are situated in different parts of the city. This gallery here has only five exit points with staircases connecting the two tiers. What will happen in the case of a stampede with the narrow adjoining road completely blocked? Total evacuation will take at least 45 minutes, according to some architects. Moreover, they have reduced the width of steps from one metre to 60 centimetres which is against all accepted norms."

The last time a football tournament was held here the bamboo stand collapsed killing two people and injuring many others. The sports council, the government and the district football association have probably not given any compensation so far. The issue is now pending in court. Moreover, many of the senior officials of the Kerala football association were chargesheeted for siphoning off money when the Santosh Trophy tournament was held in Calicut. Obviously, Trivandrum should not forfeit the chance to host the Nehru trophy. But the way in which the police is going through with the project, damaging the city's master plan, is objectionable. As the existing floodlights have to be changed another stadium could have been chosen. The chances of the two-tier gallery being completed in time are also dim.

AIR Raids

Commotion at Broadcasting House in New Delhi

The bleeps were sounding and the red bulb overhead was flashing. There were four seconds left for newsreader Vijay Daniels to go on the air for the 9 pm English bulletin on 21 July when the door of studio no. ten at the Akashvani Bhavan opened and the two "turbaned youths in their late twenties," walked in. One of the strangers stood behind the newsreader's chair while the other stood by his side. Supressing his rising alarm, Vijay Daniels who has been reading the news for the last 14 years kept the quiver out of his voice and reached for the emergency bell on his desk. Throughout the broadcast, he kept his finger on the button but the alarm did not ring. When the first five minutes of the bulletin were almost over, peon Satyanarayan entered with additional matter and the two strangers left the room on seeing him.

After the broadcast, Daniels asked Satyanarayan to find out who the men were and why they had entered the room during the news broadcast. On his return to the newsroom, he informed news editor Radhakrishnan about the incident Meanwhile, the peon returned to say that according to the security guards, the men were from the control room. The matter was dropped as men from the control room walking in during a news broadcast is a common practice at the AIR studios in Delhi.

On 10 August, the chief producer, features, Chitra Narain walked into her first floor office in the AIR building to find a stranger going through the papers on her desk. When she questioned him, the stranger said he was on the Prime Minister's security staff, and did she not know that the PM was to visit the premises? Then he quickly walked out of the room. Chitra Narain later mentioned the incident to some "high-ups."

The director-general of AIR, Suresh Mathur, made a round of the studio after the incident relating to Vijay Daniels was reported in a local newspaper. Daniels was asked to make a statement to the deputy director-general (security), D.S. Gerewal. On 29 August, suspension orders dated 23 August without charge sheets were handed over to five people in connection with the 21 July incident The suspended persons are news reader Vijay Daniels, news editor Radhakrishnan, peon Satyanarain and two security guards.

This action has stirred up a major controversy. The central information services association, the staff artists association, the Class IV Employees Association and the stenographers association have formed a joint action committee to protest against the suspension orders. The staff threatened to take direct action if the suspension orders are not withdrawn, and according to a member, it is looking for "justice." In fact, the news room staff have even threatened to boycott news bulletins. "Why should the news room people suffer if the concerned authorities cannot look after security? It is not our job Besides Vijay Daniels had informed the news editor and the matter was dropped when we were informed that they were control room men," one of the news readers pointed out.

The incidents bring into focus the slack security in a sensitive place like Akashvani Bhavan. The two guards supposed to be on duty outside studio no. ten were found missing. The control room denied that they had sent any men to the studio. How the two men got past four security points– the main gate, broadcasting house gate, main studio gate and the studio gate next to the general news room, remains a mystery. Why the emergency bell did not ring is another mystery. A complaint about the non-functioning of the bell had been entered in the service report on 12 July and 19 July by newsreader Spruti Sinha and news editor Radhakrishnan.

That security is not up to the mark is common knowledge in Broadcasting House. That it should remain so in these days when threats from terrorists loom large is surprising. Securitymen roam about without uniforms. Control room men walk into the studios and often, visitors are allowed in by men who work there.

INDO-PAK BORDER

Keeping the Extremists Away

To ensure that the 25 September Lok Sabha and Legislative Assembly elections are not disrupted in Punjab, the 553 km-long Punjab-Pakistan border has been sealed from the midnight of 1 September. Patrolling has been intensified all along the state's international border. About one lakh securitymen including ten battalions of the Border Security Force (BSF) and an equal number of men from other security set-ups including the army, have been deployed so far.

According to home ministry sources, the border has been sealed in order to thwart any attempt by terrorists to create trouble and the government is deploying troops near the new infiltration routes being used by extremists. Some activists of the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) may also have crossed the border after the Punjab accord. These people are likely to cross over just before the elections with the intention of creating trouble.

Union home minister S.B. Chavan confirmed reports that infiltration from Pakistan into Punjab and Jammu and Kashmir have been continuing for long. He added that the government was sure that extremists were interested in destabilising the country and that they were being trained in Pakistan. The Punjab Governor Arjun Singh said that the border had been sealed to check any possible infiltration by "undesirable elements," into Punjab. This, he added, was part of the massive security measures being taken to ensure a peaceful poll in the state.

Sealing the border completely is an impossible task say top army officers. However, such a move usually acts as a deterrent. Sealing the border in actual terms, means a massive movement of forces towards the border. All traditional routes are carefully watched and the strength of troops at such places are doubled. Mobile patrolling is also intensified. Patrols move from area to area at irregular intervals giving those attempting to crossover no indication of when they may check the spot again. The duration of patrolling is also reduced. Ambushes are laid to catch those attempting to cross over. Besides watching traditional routes, the troops keep a look out for any new route made or discovered by the infiltrators.

ACCOUNTANCY

The Cost of Power

Anomalies in the ICWAI raise eyebrows

The Company Law Board (CLB) is believed to have sought an explanation from the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants of India (ICWAI) on a number of anomalies in the institute's financial and administrative management following several complaints by a section of its members. These allegations have one common point, "alleged fraud and mismanagement and alleged advantages and benefits obtained by council members, secretary and director of finance and their associates."

An interesting feature of the controversy is that these anomalies stand recorded even in the minutes of different council meetings of the ICWAI. An indictment was also made against the secretariat of the institute in the 33-page internal audit report for the quarter ended December 1984. The council meetings on 17 March and 21-22 July this year also recorded profound displeasure on a Rs 32-lakh bank reconciliation lacuna, pointed out in the internal audit report. This report also pointed out several other inadequacies such as foreign tours by some council members in violation of the Cost and Works Accountants Act 1959 and the Cost and Works Accountants Regulations 1959 (Act No 23 of 1959).

A very interesting episode centres around a writ petition filed by the director (administration and finance), Sunil Kumar Rakshit, and assistant director (a & f) Swapan Dey, against the then president of ICWAI, Roshan Lal Bhatia, and the institute on 9 May 1985 in the High Court of Calcutta against bifurcation of the finance and administration portfolio and redesignation of the petitioners as director (finance and accounts) and assistant director (finance and accounts). The petition, inter alia, states: "...Ever since the respondent no 4 (i.e. Bhatia) became the president of the respondent no 2 (i.e., ICWAI), your petitioners had frequent differences of opinion with the respondent no. 4 in reimbursing T.A. and other bills, amongst others, concerning the respondent no. 4. In fact, your petitioners were asked several times to pass the bills as submitted by the respondent no. 4 without verification and checking and reimburse the same to the respondent no. 4 but your petitioners being loyal and conscientious officers of the respondent no. 2 refused to oblige the respondent no. 4 and thus invited the wrath of the respondent no. 4...

"That your petitioners state that being unable to force your petitioners to accede to improper requests for ignoring the irregularities in the bills of the respondent no. 4, the respondent no 4 threatened to snatch the powers of your petitioners from their respective positions as held in the directorate of administration and finance."

Mystery surrounds the subsequent actions in regard to the writ petition in which such serious allegations were raised against the ICWAI chief. Firstly, the petition was withdrawn the very next day. Item no. 7 of the minutes of the ICWAI council meeting subsequently held on 12 May states: "The committee noted the interim orders of status quo passed by the High Court of Calcutta in the writ petition filed by Shri S.K. Rakshit and Shri Swapan Dey on 9 May. The committee also noted that the petitioners in their letter dated 10.5.85 addressed to the secretary of the institute have conveyed their decision to withdraw the writ petition. The committee resolved that the official designation of Shri S.K. Rakshit as director (finance and administration) and the official designation of Shri Swapan Dey as assistant director (finance and administration) be restored immediately."

Insiders allege that the entire writ petition episode was a stage-managed affair. They question as to why the committee did not take notice of the derogatory remarks about the president of the institute. Secondly, a close scrutiny of the petition documents reveals that the plaintiffs, inter alia, produced copies of correspondence exchanged between Bhatia and ICWAI secretary, D.C. Bhattacharya. One letter, for instance (No.G/142/11/84/5038, dated 27 November, 1984) records Bhattacharya's opposition to the idea of bifurcation of the finance and administration portfolio.

ICWAI: a stage-managed affair?

DP Sahu

The question posed is: how did the plaintiffs get hold of these letters? The suspicion of stage-managing intensifies when one finds that Bhattacharya failed to react after the leakage of these documents.

Was the ICWAI secretary interested in preventing any enquiry into the work of these two officers, viz. Rakshit and Dey? One possible reason for this alleged cover-up may be the yawning gap in the bank reconciliation for which the responsibility apparently lies with the director (a & f) and the secretary. Thus page 8 of the internal audit report referred to earlier states. "Huge amounts were found deposited as per cash book in different banks which were not found credited in bank statements. Similarly, amounts were found credited in bank statements which were not linked with cash book." In four banks—Central Bank of India, Oriental Bank of Commerce and two branches of the State Bank of India—the amounts deposited per cash book but not linked with the bank statement or vice versa were noted as Rs 12,58,792 and Rs 20,17,140 respectively.

ICWAI is not a government organisation but it functions within the bounds set out by Act no. 23 of 1959 and deals with public money. Some members have lodged a complaint with the minister of industry and company affairs, suggesting that the centre should take action under section 35 of the Act which states in sub-section (3): "If, in the opinion of the central government, the council has persistently made default in giving effect to the directions issued under this section, the central government may, after giving an opportunity to the council to state its case, by order dissolve the council, whereafter a new council shall be constituted in accordance with the provisions of this Act with effect from such date as may be specified by the central government."

Will the centre seriously go into the happenings inside an institute which has over 1.5 lakh students and over 6,000 affiliated members and associate members and, in fact, represents the cost and works accountancy profession in the public eye?

Non-resident breathes life into Asiad tower

Delhiites can now go high—for food—with the opening on 1 September of the Bombay Palace restaurant on the dome of the 180 ft Asiad Village tower.

The tower was one of the monstrosities built during Asiad '82 so that participants could have a small bite while contemplating the vastness of the capital city. But astonishingly, there was no initial provision for running it as a restaurant since no kitchen had been built. During the Asiad, the food served on top was taken up from downstairs. And contrary to popular belief, neither is it a revolving restaurant, nor was it constructed with such a provision in mind.

Nevertheless, these drawbacks are not strong enough to dissuade Surjit Singh, the Delhi-based director of Chatwal Hotels and Restaurants (India) Pvt Ltd, from going ahead. To start with, he has chosen to serve Chinese cuisine—and has spruced up the tower with Chinese decor—because in a survey of South Delhi eateries he found Chinese food to be "the most popular kind of dish."

But what makes this piece of entrepreneurship one-of-a-kind is that the promoting group behind the show is a non-resident Indian restaurant chain, viz. Chatwal Hotels and Restaurants Inc (estimated turnover: US $25 million or Rs 30 crores) which runs ten restaurants and four hotels in the US, Canada and the UK. Invariably, their restaurants overseas bear the name "Bombay Palace," which presumably evokes nostalgic visions of India in those distant lands. The idea of setting up a restaurant on home turf came from the chairman of the group, Sant Singh Chatwal, who during a visit to New Delhi at the time of the Asiad thought that a tower restaurant might not be a bad idea after all.

After the Asiad tamasha was over, though, it was not clear what the Delhi Development Authority (DDA) wanted to do with the tower it was now saddled with. After about two years of dilly-dallying, DDA thought of giving it out on lease for a restaurant. Some "large groups" in India reportedly did show initial interest but later backed out. Chatwal stepped in at this stage and entered into a 20-year lease agreement with

Joydeep Vaidya

Asiad Tower: resurrected

DDA in July 1984. According to the terms of this agreement, the company will have to pay Rs 50,000 or five per cent of the gross receipts every month—whichever is more—and this rate is subject to renegotiation every five years. Also the company has to maintain the lawns around the tower, the building itself plus the adjoining constructions.

Surjit Singh says the restaurant has a capacity for 96 persons and the idea is to get a five star classification from the tourism department. The prices are also in the five star range. However, only one lift is available for patrons, the only other one being reserved for service. Singh plans to open a bat be cue on the lawns. The idea is that "while waiting for a table up there, customers could have a place to sit and munch something." Singh admits that the tower-top restaurant, because of its construction, is "not spacious. But once you sit down, the view from the window makes up for it," he promises.

The directors expect the restaurant to break even within three years. But whether it will be viable in the long run is something one has to wait and see. Singh says that the company is trying to get a licence for a bar. The floor above the restaurant, he feels, is ideally suited for this purpose and providing a bar "will make the whole project really viable." But this is a ticklish decision for the puritan Delhi administration which is known not to look too kindly on the opening of places of inebriation. It is likely, therefore, that Delhiites wanting to really go high will have to wait.

INDUSTRY

New Balm for Old Ailment

Bill to cure sickness is unlikely to work wonders

The Sick Industrial Companies (Special Provisions) Bill, which was introduced in the Lok Sabha on 29 August, spells out several admirable objectives to deal expeditiously with the problem of industrial sickness. It highlights the serious consequences arising from the persistence of widespread and chronic sickness—inter alia, loss of production, employment and revenue to the central and state governments as well as the blocking up of substantial sums of investible funds belonging to banks and financial institutions.

The outstanding credit on the latter's books, presently locked up in sick units, was Rs 3,778 crores at the end of 1983 when the sick list consisted of 491 large, 1,256 medium and 7,856 small-scale units. The Bill contains several provisions to revive and rehabilitate at least those sick units which are reckoned to be potentially viable.

The Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI) has welcomed the Bill as "a salutary step." But it seems doubtful if the Bill will really succeed in its aims in view of the fact that similar attempts made in the past have not produced the desired impact to solve this problem.

For instance, the government set up in 1971 the Calcutta-headquartered Industrial Reconstruction Corporation of India (IRCI) for rehabilitating and reconstructing ailing industrial units. Although the Proudly, we are taking India back to the 12th century.

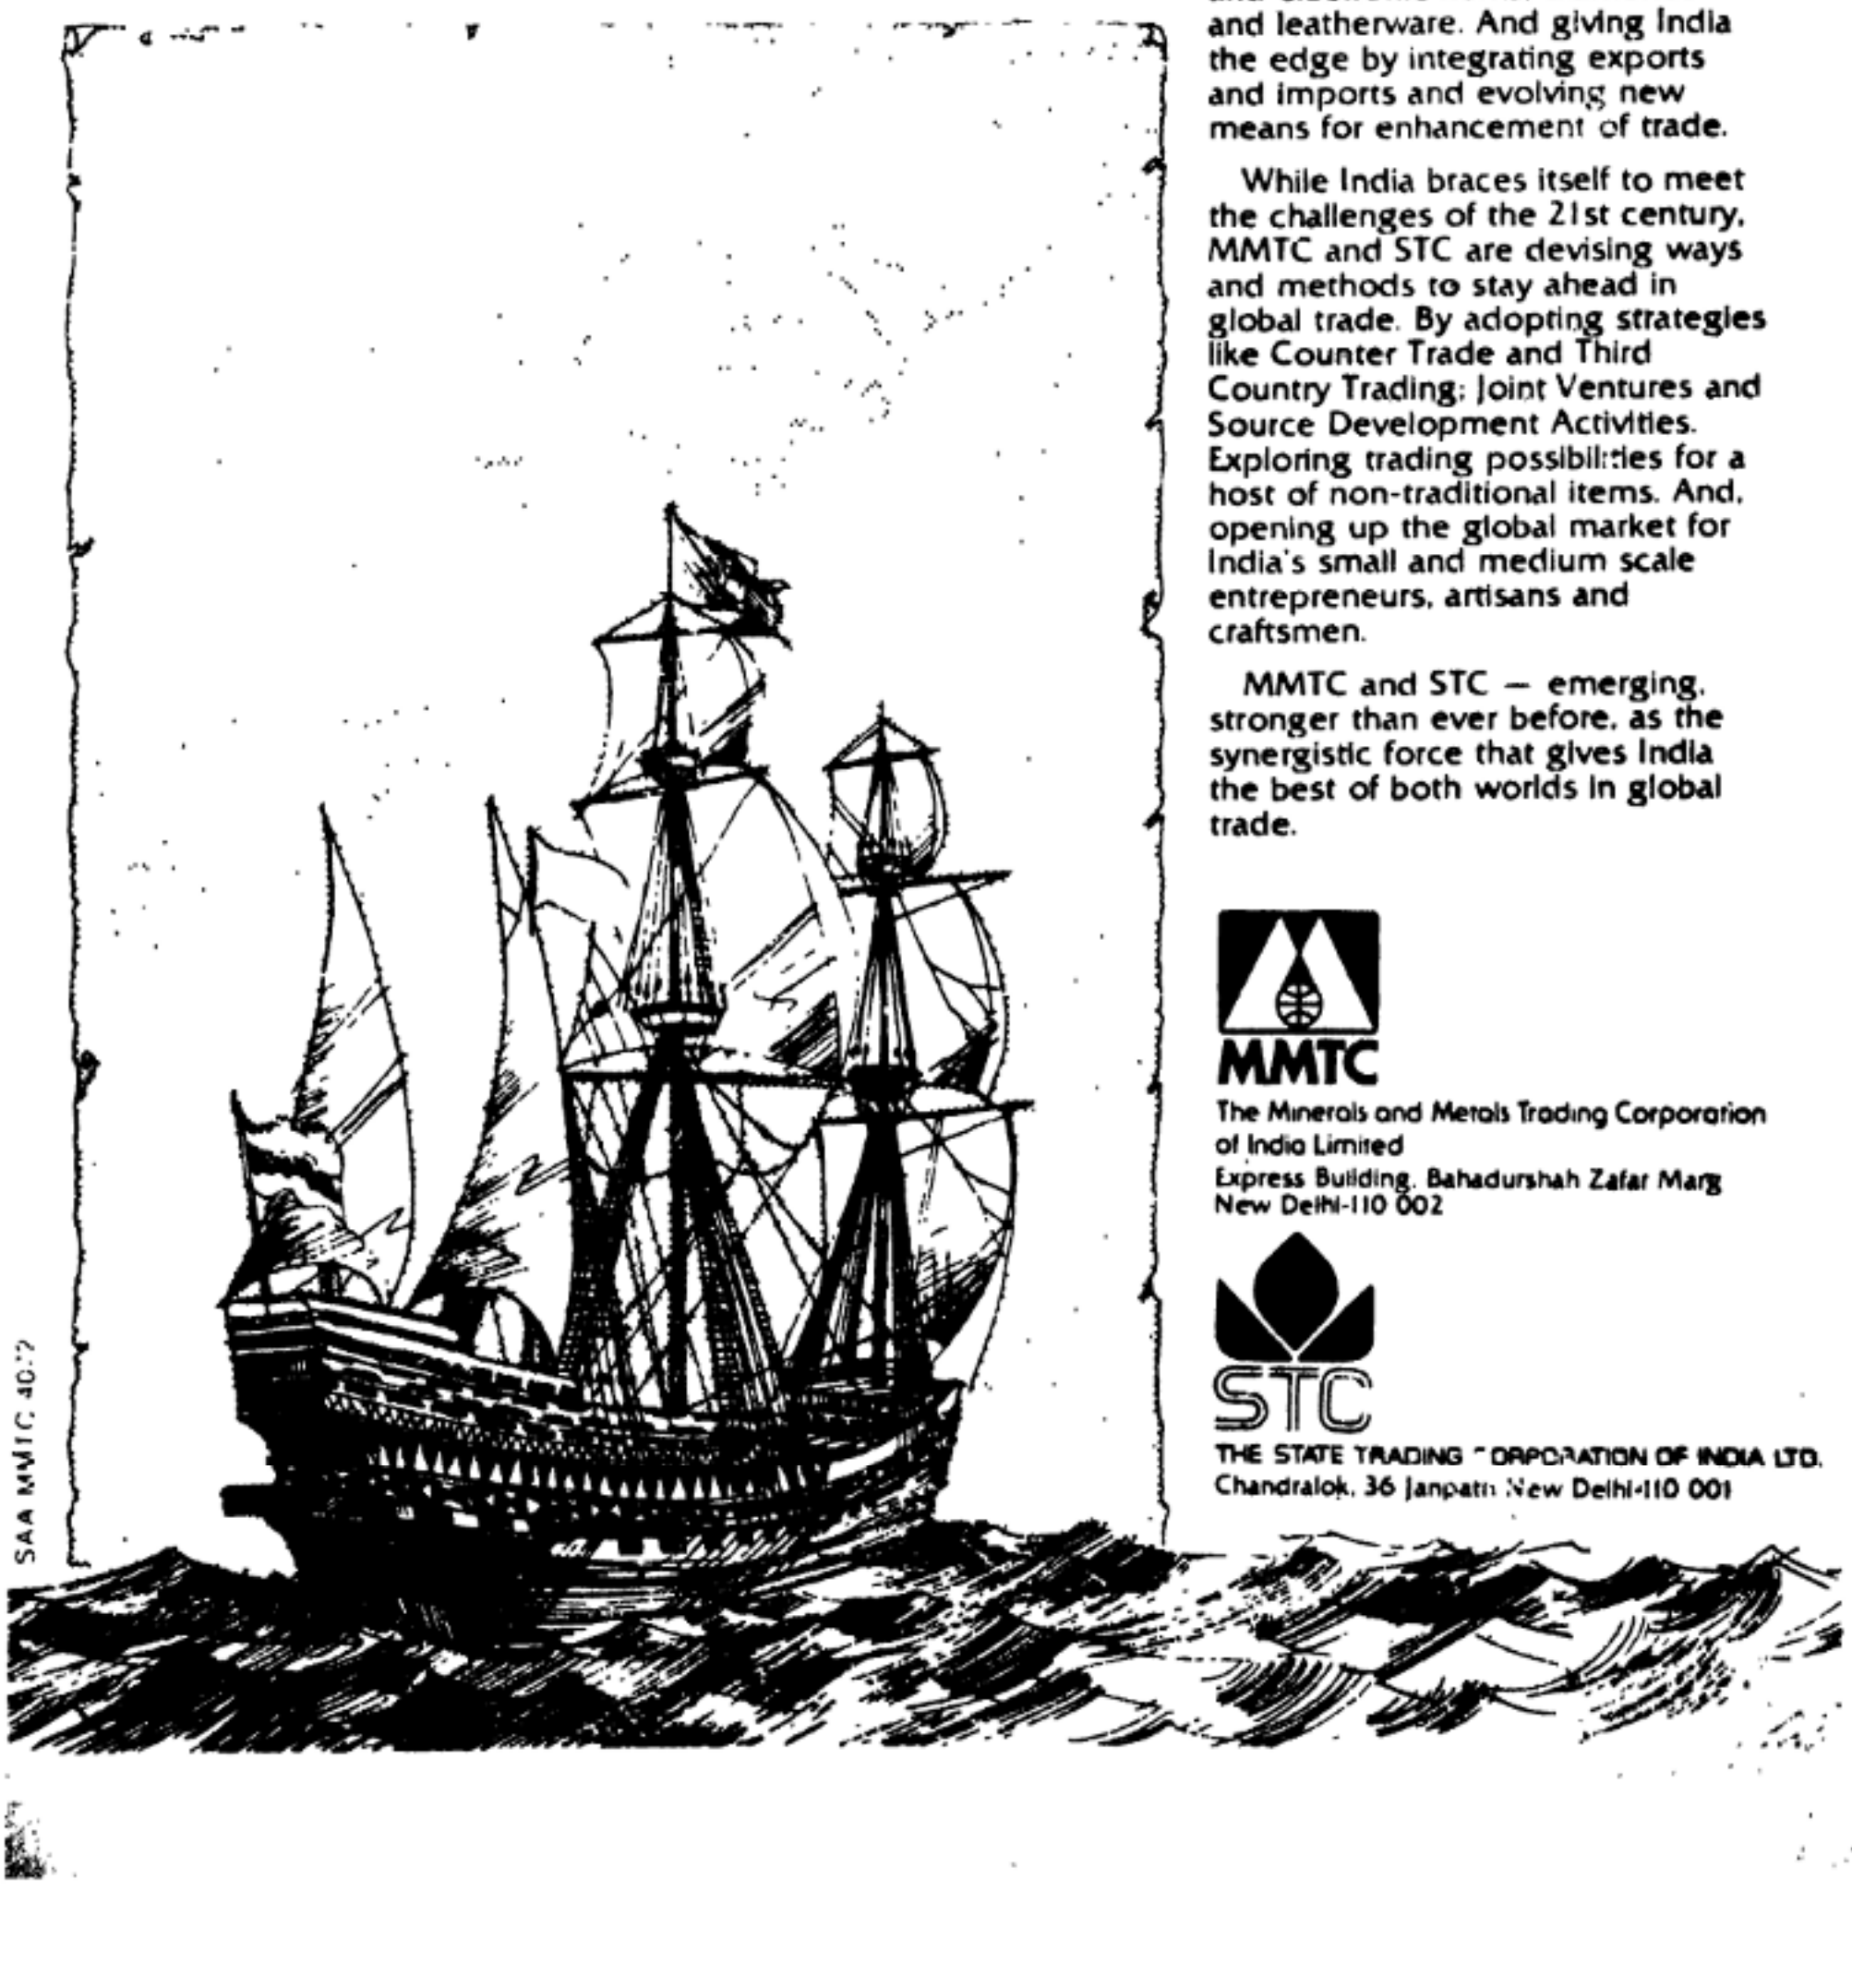
Time was when the world knew India as a great trading nation. Today, centuries later, India is all set to regain that position in the global market place.



And, bringing India into prominence amongst the world trading community are MMTC and STC.

The Minerals and Metals Trading Corporation of India Limited and The State Trading Corporation of India Limited. Premier organisations that serve as the two arms of India's foreign trade. Whose combined expertise has taken Indian goods to countries all around the globe. And whose formidable bulk-buying capability has brought a wide range of products for India's needs. At the right time, right price and in the right quantity. To serve the consumer as well as the core sectors of India's growing economy.

MMTC and STC. Trading in items as diverse as minerals and textiles, metals and sports goods, fertilisers and electronic items, diamonds and leatherware. And giving India the edge by integrating exports and imports and evolving new means for enhancement of trade.

While India braces itself to meet the challenges of the 21st century, MMTC and STC are devising ways and methods to stay ahead in global trade. By adopting strategies like Counter Trade and Third Country Trading; Joint Ventures and Source Development Activities. Exploring trading possibilities for a host of non-traditional items. And, opening up the global market for India's small and medium scale entrepreneurs, artisans and craftsmen.

MMTC and STC — emerging, stronger than ever before, as the synergistic force that gives India the best of both worlds in global trade.

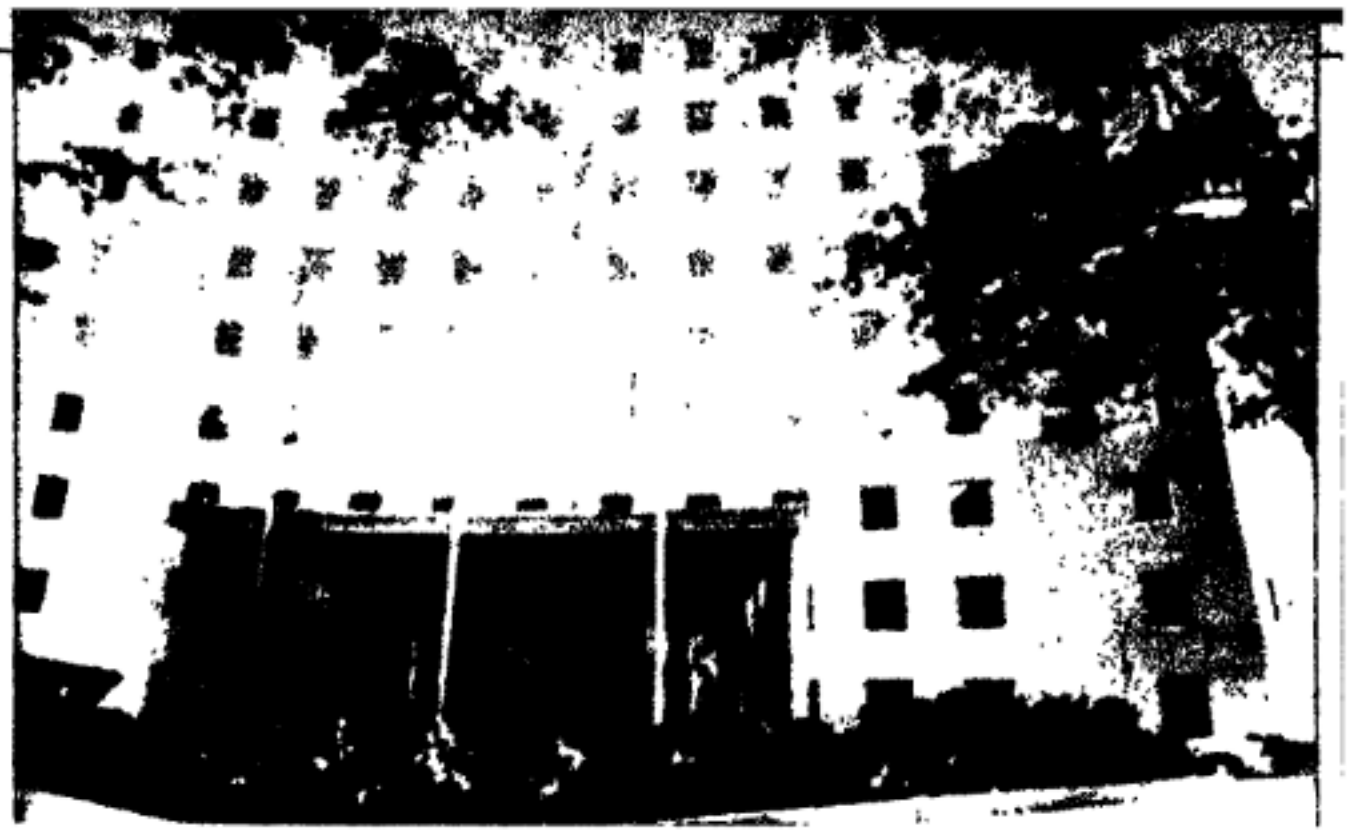
IRCI was able to revive a few sick units, it could not play an effective role mainly owing to financial and managerial constraints as well as some legal impediments in effecting mergers. According to T. Tiwari, former chairman of IRCI, "It is difficult for any organisation to survive purely as an intensive care unit." The government, therefore, decided last year to convert the IRCI into the Industrial Reconstruction Bank of India. Obviously, the government now realises that this re-naming exercise is hardly the answer to revive sick units and prevent future sickness.

The provisions of the Sick Industrial Companies Bill now before Parliament are broadly on the lines indicated by the finance minister in his budget speech. But it is not exactly clear as to how the government is going to deal with situations where not only individual units but entire industries have become sick. For example, in the sugar industry there are at présent 339 mills in the country, of which 166 are in the cooperative sector, 103 in the joint sector, and 70 in the public sector. According to the New Delhi-based Indian Sugar Mills Association, "The outlook for all of them is bleak."



The association reveals in a recent brochure that the losses suffered by mills in all the sectors and all the regions in the three years—1981-82, 1982-83 and 1983-84—were more than Rs 800 crores.

In setting up the Board for Financial and Industrial Reconstruction, the government has assumed that mismanagement is the sole cause of sickness. This assumption is wrong. It does not recognise that there are several external factors too which can cause sickness: unrealistic price controls, lack of demand, excessive taxation, severe power shortage, labour's opposition to modernisation and rationalisation and so on.

While the Bill no doubt reflects the government's anxiety to revive sick units and to prevent future sickness, some of its existing policies actually aggravate it. For instance, the price preference given to the public sector units in the matter of government purchases has been unfairly affecting the profitable working of a large number of private sector units. The government is now the single largest buyer of manufactured goods in the country and, therefore, its purchase policy has a great deal to do with the healthy functioning of industries in the private sector.

If industrial sickness is spreading, could the root source of the contagion be the government itself?

World Bank's Washington headquarters; Indian Railways should buy Indian

RAILWAYS

Bidding for the Outsider

But the World Bank is not impressed

The Indian Railways have chalked out a massive modernisation and expansion plan with World Bank aid. Under the programme, the Railways floated global tenders for the supply of 48,000 cartridge taper roller bearings, an essential ingredient in the construction of railway wagons. In October 1984, ten firms from countries like Japan, USA and Italy sent their offers. National Engineering Industries (NEI) of Jaipur was the only Indian company to join the race. Although NEI was the lowest bidder, the decision was manipulated in favour of a Japanese firm and the railway authorities recommended to the World Bank to approve the purchase from Japan.

The World Bank, however, rejected the proposal objecting that though the comparative statements of various offers had been tabulated the norms set by it in this regard had been overlooked. In the circumstances it asked the railway authorities to reconsider the whole matter and compute the rates correctly. While reassessing the offers made by the ten companies the rates of the NEI bid turned out to be the lowest. Once again, the railway authorities sent their recommendations in favour of the same Japanese firm, but the World Bank was not impressed.

Reportedly it has taken exception to the undue interest being shown by Indian Railways authorities in favour of the Japanese firm, despite the fact that the rates being offered by the Indian firm were lower by over Rs 200 per bearing. The World Bank also pointed out that besides the rate factor the capability of keeping to the delivery schedule also weighed heavily in favour of the Indian firm. The railways required 6,000 cartridge bearings per month but the the Japanese firm was not capable of supplying even half of the requirement. Moreover, it wanted six months' time to start the supply after the order was placed. Against this the Indian company was ready not only to supply the requisite quantity every month but was also in a position to start immediate delivery. In the circumstances the World Bank saw no justification for the railways favouring the Japanese firm. Placing an order with the Japanese firm would have cost the nation a sum of Rs one crore in foreign exchange

The story does not end here. The World Bank's insistence that the order be placed with the Indian firm was not relished by the railway board. However, as it could not oblige the Japanese firm, the lobby in Rail Bhawan favouring the Japanese, drastically slashed the order. To NEI's great surprise, the order was placed for the supply of only 12,000 cartridge taper roller bearings against the initial enquiry for 48,000.

While it took eight months for the deal to be finalised the wagon manufacturers' yards piled up with unlifted stocks of cartridge taper roller bearings. Meanwhile, the railways continued to pay a sum of Rs 70,000 per day as service charges to the World Bank for not utilising the sum earmarked for the modernisation and expansion of railway facilities in the country.

JAPANESE TECHNOLOGY IS NEWS FOR EVERYONE EX

FOR INDIAN BIKES CEPT RAJDOOT

ESCORTS

It was news for us too. But that was eleven years ago when Rajdoot was the first Indian motorbike to 'go' Japanese.

Collaborating with MIKUNI—the world-famous makers of carburettors.

And that signalled a technology avalanche.

FUJI for clutch assemblies.
HOSHI for swaged spokes.
And KAYABA for front-forks.

Which means that there's a lot of Japanese know-how making the Rajdoot a very efficient machine.

And, when you add the hottest name in motorcycle engineering world-wide—Yamaha of Japan—it makes big news in the form of the Rajdoot-Yamaha breed of 350 cc motorbikes. Soon to be followed by the highly fuel-efficient 100 cc bikes.

Yes, the foresight is paying off. Because today, one of every two bikes on the road is a Rajdoot.

Which, incidentally, is not very surprising news.

VARIETY/KHAAS BAAT

Whatever he does, Feroz Khan seems to be the cynosure of all eyes. Even when he decided to move into his sprawling bungalow in Bangalore, people started spreading rumours of how success had gone to his head. The grapevine has it that when he ventured out of his farmhouse, he would dress like a cowboy and ride on horseback on the streets of Bangalore. But Feroz came back to tinsel town and announced his latest film, Jaanbaaz, with great fanfare. Contrary to expectations he took a long time to begin the shooting of the film, causing a lot of tongues to wag once again. Now, after a change in the cast of his film—his brothers Sanjay and Akbar have been replaced and the new stars included are Anil Kapoor, Dimple Kapadia, Feroz himself and Amrish Puri—he has finally begun shooting.

She could not have asked for a better start for her career. In her very first film, Hum Kisise Kum Nahin, Kaajal Kiran worked with one of the well-established directors, Nasir Husain. Everybody predicted a bright future for her, but after her debut, she just missed the bus to fame, acting in small roles in films that did nothing to boost her career. Ten years after her first film, she has thrown in the towel. "Everyone wanted to exploit me because I am a girl. I played along with them till I could. I can no longer play their games. I am giving up," she says, disgusted. According to reliable sources, she has married a millionaire and has settled down to a new life.

Nagra

The one-time contender for the number one position among the heroines (till she was overtaken by Sridevi) seems to be facing rough weather. Jayaprada, who is being written off as a has-been, is very upset about the rumours, and she has reason to be: she still has eight films on the floors and a few others in the offing... which is hardly a sign of bad times!

Has success gone to Jackie Shroff's head? While producers allege that he is beginning to show signs of a swollen head, Jackie vehemently denies this charge. He says whatever success he had achieved with his first film, Hero, has been stemmed after his two subsequent films, Shiva ka Insaaf and Mera Jawaab, flopped. Meanwhile, his relationship with Ayesha Dutt continues to be indeterminate. All talk of their betrothal was dashed to the ground when the celebration turned out to be nothing more than Ayesha's birthday party.

Donning a New Mantle

The changeover has been smooth. With the untimely death of Lalit Maken, the mantle of leading one of the largest unions in the country, the National Confederation of Central Government Employees and Workers, which has over 50 affiliated unions and federations and a 16-lakh membership, has fallen on Rangarajan Kumaramangalam, the Congress(I) MP Kumaramangalam (33) who is the son of the late Mohan Kumaramangalam, is an active trade union leader He has been actively involved in leading unions since 1973 when he was president of the National Students Union of India (NSUI). He got his break in active trade unionism in 1977. After the death of Maken, says Kumaramangalam, he will have only "to work harder" to make Parliament an active forum to voice the demands of the workers.

Ramayana Japanese Style

Indian epics have evinced much interest in foreign climes. First, it was the French, led by Peter Brook who took on the onerous task of transforming the Mahabharata into a marathon play. And now, the Japanese are keen on filming the Ramayana. An Indo-Japanese project, the film is to be a full-length feature in animation and is to be shot in both 35 and 70 mm. It will be originally done in English, Hindi and Japanese. Among the luminaries attached to this project are Amitabh Bachchan and Sunil Dutt, who recently led a delegation to Japan to finalise the details. S.S. Oberoi, a big name in the advertising world, as well as the producer of the TV serial, Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi, will be the producer of Ramayana. Vinod Sharma of Gandhi fame will write the dialogues for the Hindi version while Bachchan will lend his voice to the film.

Epitome of Energy

It has been the nucleus of his life: nuclear energy. Whether at the department of nuclear energy at Trombay among distinguished colleagues like Sir Homi Bhabha or besides German scientists as the head of department of atomic energy at Karlsruhe, West Germany, Dr Deepak Gupta has made safeguards system the theme of his vocation. Dr Gupta, who hails from an illustrious family in Bikrampur, Dacca, graduated in chemical engineering from Jadavpur university, Calcutta, in 1951. Presently the head of the department of safeguard systems at the Nuclear Research Centre, Karlsruhe, he developed the process of making heavy nitrogen indigenously, a no mean achievement. A naturalised German citizen, Dr Gupta's dedication to his work has not gone unrewarded: the Institute of Nuclear Materials Management, Albuquerque, New Mexico, has conferred on him the Distinguished Service Award, bringing glory not only to his motherland but also to Germany. He is also the first German to win this award in the last 26 years. His wife, Mrs Eva Maria Gupta, has produced an authentic book on Alpona, the folk art of Bengal.

Birdwatcher Turns MP

What started as a childish curiosity matured into a relentless search for the rare and beautiful. At the age of nine, ornithologist Salim Ali had shot down a yellow-throated sparrow but when he could not recognise it he took the help of his uncle, who guided him to the Bombay Natural History Society (BNHS). Ever since birds have obsessed him. Today, on the threshold of his nineties, Salim Ali is no less active than he was in the prime of his youth. He is more than a bird-watcher; he is also an ardent supporter of the conservation of wildlife and protection of the environment. Countless awards and laurels have come his way. His recent nomination to the Rajya Sabha, therefore, hardly causes a flutter. But the hyperactive octogenarian still craves for adventure. Sometime in October this year, he attempts to trek along a Himalayan route in search of the mysterious Himalayan quail.

Poet of Brotherhood

Literature is his obsession; and his quest for the aesthetic has not only made him study the niceties of his own mother-tongue, Bengali, but also that of a foreign language, German. Dominique Lapierre of the Collins-Lapierre duo, who have authored a number of bestsellers, will soon start shooting for a serial for French television on the life and times of Mother Teresa. Though Lapierre had approached Mother Teresa with the idea almost two years ago, it was not until recently that she finally gave her consent. Indian television viewers too will be able to watch this programme once it has been broadcast on French TV.

Lovleen (Chutki) Mishra has just finished shooting for Govind Nihalani's Aaghaat. Gange, who plays the role of inspector Saamdar in Hum Log, has walked away with a prize role. A small-time actor till his TV debut, Gange has been signed on by director Kidar Sharma to enact the role of Netaji Subhas Chandra Bose, in his early years. Ardhendu Bose will play the role of the leader in the later years of his life.

Satish Shah (right), one of the talents in Pathak's new serial

Pankaj Kapoor, who plays Karamchand in the serial of the same name, is a veteran actor, and has already acted in over 70 plays and a number of films including Jaane Bhi Do Yaaro. Kapoor, who hails from Ludhiana, had decided to join the Film and Television Institute at Pune, but was rejected after the screen test. "They liked my acting but didn't like my screen presence," he recalls ruefully. But he was luckier when he applied for the National School of Drama where he went on to win a gold medal. A lesser-known fact is that he dubbed for Ben Kingsley for the Hindi version of Gandhi: he seems to have come a long way since his rejection by the FTII!

The Shafi Inamdar-Satish Shah-Rakesh Bedi trio will be seen once again by TV viewers, this time in a new serial. The man responsible for producing it is Avinav Pathak, who already has one TV serial, Paying Guest, to his credit. The only one who is conspicuous by her absence is Swaroop Sampat, the other member of the popular Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi team.

Basu Chatterjee's serials are turning out to be popular favourites these days. First, it was Rajani, which took the country by storm; now it is Darpan.

A. K. Hangal in Darpan

Sensitive and thought-provoking, each instalment of Darpan shows a TV adaptation of a short story by a contemporary Indian writer in a vernacular. In all, 13 such adaptations are to be telecast. The Hindi adaptations are by noted writer Kamleshwar.

Idols With Feet of Clay

Six months ago, after their triumphs in Australia and Sharjah, the Indian cricketers were on top of the world. The 'world champions' have, however, been rudely shocked by the Sri Lankans

The only consistent feature of Indian cricket is its inconsistency. Barely six months ago, the Indian cricketers were world beaters, yet today they are being humiliated by a side that many thought didn't even deserve to play Test cricket. The Sri Lankans, considered happy-go-lucky weekend cricketers have proved, by beating India in the second Test, that they are a force to reckon with in international cricket and not merely carefree wielders of the willow.

What can one say about the Indians? That they are a depressed and humiliated lot? That they are lacking in spirit and confidence? What excuse can there be for their performance, in the Emerald Isles? When a team is going through the rebuilding process, fluctuations in performances can be forgiven. But from eleven 'professionals' with a total of 367 Tests under their belts, performances, such as India's in the first two Tests, can only be condemned. After having only just saved the first Test, one thought that the Indians would finally pull up their socks. But the second Test saw a repetition of the debacle. India's gifting of a historic Test win to Sri Lanka will be hard to forget and many a fan, who six months ago was on top of the world, will now have to hang his head in shame when reminded of India's first tour of the tropical island.

Nikhil Bhattacharya

Duleep Mendis: victorious captain

Given a total of 348 to win in 330 minutes and 20 mandatory overs, the "world champions" failed to save the match, leave alone win the Test. A side which has sufficient talent to send its number nine batsman-wicketkeeper as an opener failed to bat out a day or even score 200 runs against an attack which can only be described as 'above average.' The main wreckers: the Sri Lankan pace trio of Asantha De Mel, Rumesh Ratnayake and Saliya Ahangama did nothing more than keep the ball up to the batsman and the Indians obliged with mistakes.

With all the front-line Sri Lankan batsmen in good form, the side does not have to depend only on skipper Duleep Mendis and vice-captain Roy Dias for runs. Amal Silva has been tormenting the Indians in front of the wickets as much as he has been doing behind it while Arjuna Ranatunge and Ranjan Madugalle have also added to the frustrations of the Indian attack.

The visitors were simply outplayed in both Tests. But it has become a habit in cricket to find fault with the umpires. And so, the Indian skipper Kapil Dev blamed the umpires for his team's humiliation. "We were outplayed in all departments," he said sarcastically, "in bowling, batting, fielding and umpiring." He went on to say that the Lankans would not have pulled off a victory had it not been for 'biased and motivated umpiring.'

Responsibility is a detachable burden easily shifted onto the shoulders of God, Fortune or Luck. But with cricket captains it is customary to blame the umpires. Kapil merely maintained the custom. He blamed the umpires for not giving his batsman the benefit of the doubt and for not calling the Lankan bowlers when they stepped across the crease. Granted, the decisions that went against Srikkanth and Dilip Vengsarkar might have been debatable, but even that does not justify the poor Indian showing. Kapil's explanation was that the fall of three early wickets, two due to umpiring mistakes, rattled the confidence of his side When asked how a team of experienced professionals could get rattled with the fall of three quick wickets, Kapil was silent.

The Indian skipper would have done well to admit defeat and live to fight another day. But perhaps Kapil felt that confessions, though good for the soul, are bad for the reputation. Bare statistics themselves show how the visitors have been overwhelmed by a team, who on paper are far inferior to them. But then Test matches are not played on paper. Till the end of the second Test the Indians had not reached a total of 300 in any innings of the tour. On the other hand all the teams the visitors have played against have been able to cross the 300 mark in at least one innings of the game (except the first one day international). Only a single Indian (Dilip Vengsarkar) has scored a century on the tour while five Sri Lankans—Asanka Gurusinghe, Sumithra Warnakulasuriya, Amal Silva, Arjuna Ranatunga and Ranjan Madugalle—have accomplished the feat.

Dilip Vengsarkar: fighting innings

Nath Bhattacharya

If the tourists' batting has been poor then their bowling has not been any better. The main two strike bowlers Kapil Dev and Sivaramakrishnan have failed to make any mark on the Sri Lankan batsmen. In four matches Kapil Dev. has taken only eight wickets. "Siva" has only four wickets to his credit. The unbalanced comparisons are never ending and for this we in the cricketing world should admire the new entrants to the game.

The main reason for India's disastrous showing was complacency. Kapil's comments after the fourth day's play of the second Test merely confirmed the belief. He told journalists, "We will win, you see. Come and see me tomorrow after we have won." The best remedy for the Indians would be to try and rebuild their confidence again. But they should not forget that there is still time enough for revenge if not in Sri Lanka then in Australia and time enough to prove that the success of last season was not a brief interval between a stroke of good luck and a stroke of apoplexy.

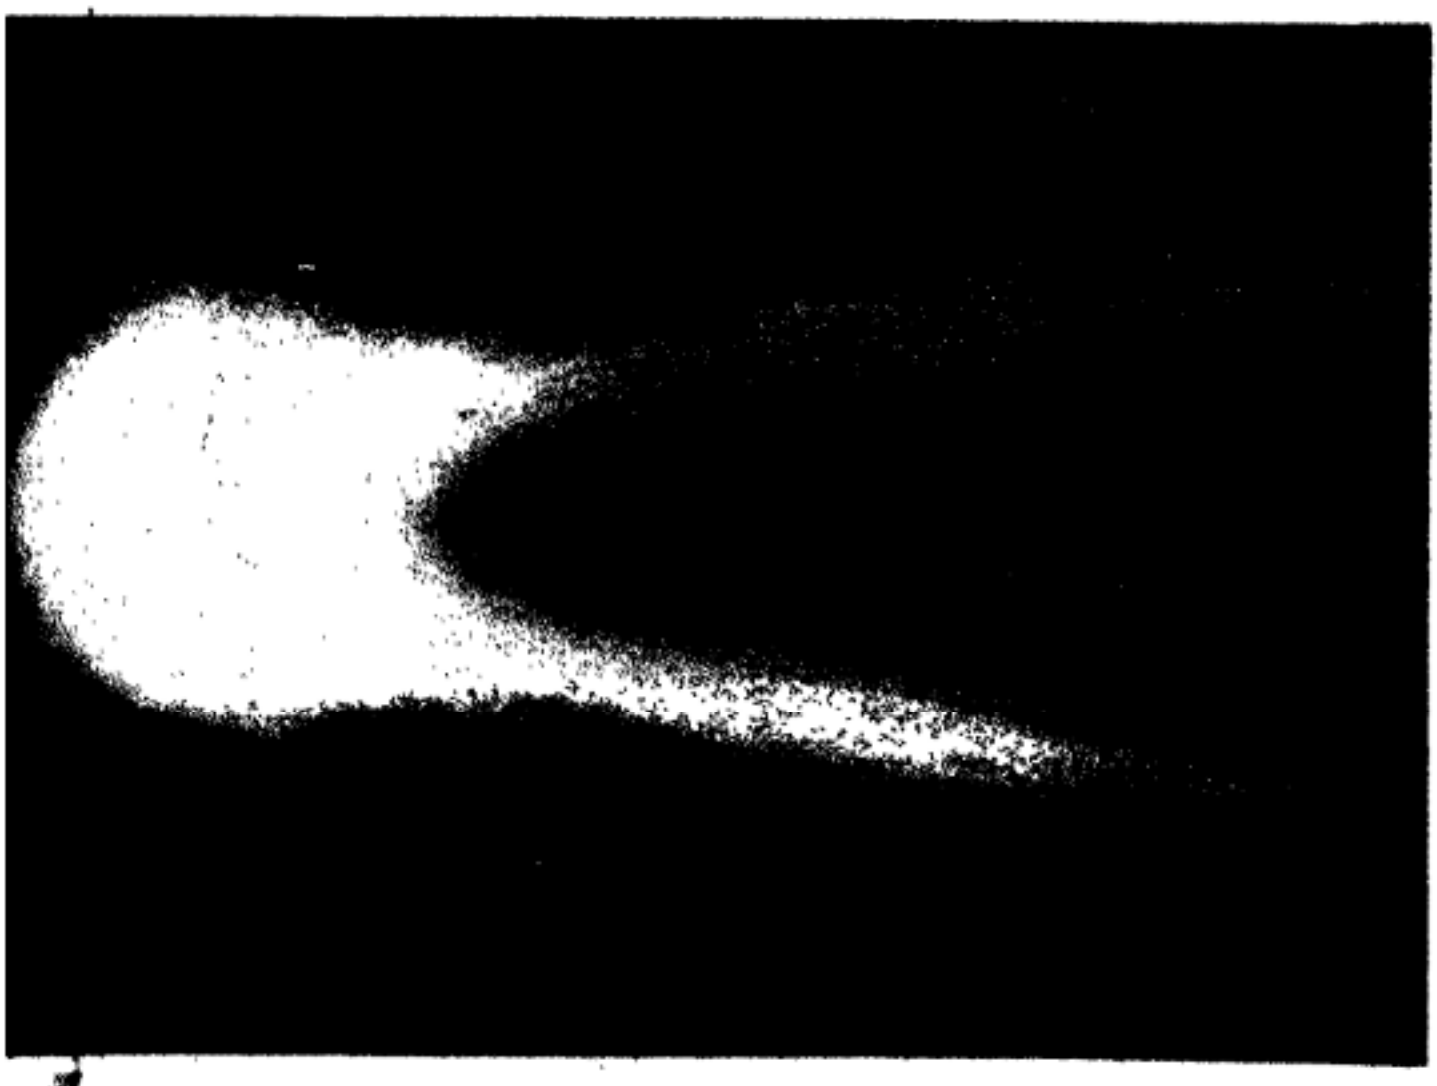
A Sight to Behold

"On 29 August, a 'broom-star' was seen in the morning in the northeast. It was 10° east of Chung-t'ai (Ursa Major). Its length was 6° and colour: pure white. It moved northwest but pointed southwest. On 1 September, it was 1° to the north-west of Hsia-t'ai (in Ursa Major). It went out of sight on the morning of 4 September. In the evening it reappeared in the northwest. It was 1° in length and pointed southeast. It gradually moved and entered Ti (in Libra). On 23 September it was barely seen. On 27 September it was extinguished."

That was how the imperial astronomers of China recorded their observations of comet Halley's apparition in 530 AD. And when the celebrated comet reappears this year it will receive one of the grandest receptions by astronomers around the world. Halley may be visible by telescope from September but will not make the closest approach to earth until 27 November when it will be at a distance of 92.7 million kilometres. At that distance its long luminous tail will cover one-eighth to one-tenth of the heaven—an awe-some spectacle.

The lemon-shaped comet that was last seen in 1910 will not appear again until 2061. This and next year's show will, however, be less spectacular than the one that was seen in 1910 as the relative position of the sun, earth and the comet is unfavourable. Halley would also be further away from earth than it was in 1910 and would rise and set with the sun whose glare would mask it.



Described as a "dirty snowball," a comet's nucleus consists of ice, snow and condensed gases mixed with particles of silicates, metals and metal oxides which can be as small as a grain of sand or might be several centimetres long. They are the primordial matter preserved in original form by the cosmic 'refrigerator' and so are likely to contain information about the physical and chemical processes that took place 4500 million years ago when the solar system was being formed. Scientists hope to obtain information about the original cosmic matter from which the entire solar system evolved, by studying the close-up shots of the Halley's comet which give details of dust and gaseous composition.

While the biggest telescopes are being prepared for the celestial visitor, six spacecraft are already on their way for a close encounter with the comet in March 1986. The probes may unlock the comet's time capsule and reveal vital clues to the origin o the solar system.

Two Soviet Vega spacecraft laun ched in December 1984 are on thei way to meet Halley's comet on March. The probes with two T cameras will get as close as 3,000 t 10,000 kilometres from the comet' nucleus. The Japanese probe Sak gake which took off on 8 January wil take a look at the comet from distance of seven million kilometres The second Japanese spacecraf Planet-A launched in August wil take photographs of the comet i ultraviolet light from a distance o 20,000 kilometres. The US probe Ic will encounter another comet—Giacopini Zinner—in September be fore joining the Halley study. It wil watch the comet from a distance o 30 million kilometres. A Europea craft Giotto launched on 2 July wil get as close as 100-500 km to th comet's nucleus. During the four hour encounter it will send picture of objects as small as 50 metres i diameter. Giotto is likely to be des troyed while flying through the man tle of gas and dust. A space particle of the size of a pea could destroy the Rs 525 million craft as it will be hitting the comet in a head-on colli sion at a relative speed of 69 km pe second.

Until now, man has observed more than 1000 comets. Most comets fly past the sun only once before return ing deep into space, never to be seen again. Halley, however, is trapped i an orbit within the inner solar system and returns repeatedly once in 76 years. The comet was, reportedly, first sighted by the Chinese in 12 BC. It was the British astronomer, Edmund Halley (1658-1742), who struck by the similarity of comets that appeared in 1531, 1607 and 1682., concluded that it was the same body and predicted its next appearance in 1758. But he did not live to see it. Although this comet is not the brightest, it is one of the few comets, the return of which could be accurately predicted.

When the core of a comet approaches the sun, it is warmed and gas and dust are released to form a giant cloud that gives the comet its distinctive tail. The core of Halley's comet was originally 20-km thick but every time it goes around the sun it loses a two-meter thick layer. The comet's diameter is now halved to 10 km. After another 2500 journeys the comet will disappear.

Halley's appearance has brought the world astronomers together. The International Halley Watch (IHW) has been formed to coordinate the observations made in laboratories scattered all over the globe. All data will be passed on to the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in California, USA, and Erlangen University's Jurgen Remeis observatory in Bomberg, Bavaria. The space agencies of the US, USSR, Japan and Europe have set up an inter-agency consultative group to consolidate data sent by their respective Halley's probes.

India has been invited to join the IHW because of the strategic location of its three major observatories where hectic preparation is going on for the Halley study. These observatories at Kavalur (Tamil Nadu), Nainital and Hyderabad will bridge the longitudinal gap between Chinese and Soviet observatories. India has also signed a protocol with the USSR under which Indian observatories will supply astrometric data needed for calculating the comet's trajectory. The data will be used by the USSR for mid-course corrections to the Vega spacecraft. Besides astrometry, the protocol envisages collaborative observations from the Indian and Soviet-based stations for measuring polarisation, speckle interferometry of the comet, infra-red and radio observations

Giotto: close encounters

The Indian Halley Watch programme is being coordinated by the Indian Institute of Astrophysics (IIA) in Bangalore. Participants in this programme include the Uttar Pradesh solar observatory in Nainital, Physical Research Laboratory, Tata Institute of Fundamental Research (TIFR) and the Positional Astronomy Centre in Calcutta and solar observatories in Udaipur, Punjab, Delhi and Osmania universities.

The 40-inch reflector telescopes at Kavalur and Nainital and the 48-inch reflector at the Osmania University in Hyderabad are the major instruments that will be used to study the comet. Besides these, half a dozen smaller telescopes will also be used. The radio telescope at Ooty will be used for scintillation studies of radio sources (stars) that will be occulted by the comet's tail. The radio telescope at Gauribidanur will be used to observe the comet in decameter wavelength. The TIFR will send balloons carrying telescopes to the height of 30 kilometres to take pictures of Halley. Additional equipment has been purchased from the Rs 1.3 million fund, provided by the department of science and technology specifically for the Halley watch.

In the past, Indian astronomers have observed comets such as Ikeya-Seki, Bennet, Kohoulek, West Churymov-Gerosimenko and Crommelin. The Nizamiah observatory in Hyderabad made pioneering efforts in astrometric work during Halley's appearance in 1910. "This year," says Dr J.C. Bhattacharya, IIA director, "we are better prepared and equipped to watch Halley."

Waiting for Halley

If you want to know the latest information on Halley's comet you can get it by dialling the London telephone number 01-790-3400. British Aerospace, the prime contractor to European Space Agency for Giotto spacecraft and Halley's Comet Society in conjunction with British Telecom has begun the Halley comet nationwide hotline service. The special service which was started in January 1985 will be made available for 24 hours till May 1986 and will be updated every week. Callers will receive the latest information on the progress of the Giotto space probe which will make the closest study of Halley's comet. Recognising the contribution to astronomy by non-professionals, the International Halley Watch has set up an "Amateur Observers' Network (AON)."

The work of Indian amateurs is being coordinated by A.I. Siddiqui, a scientist at the atomic power project in Narora, UP. The data collected at Narora will be sent to the California Institute of Technology. Siddiqui says the study "will include magnitude estimates, coma size and tail studies, recorded time of abrupt changes in brightness, positioning, drawings and observations of halos, envelopes, jets, and streamers in coma."

The Indian amateur astronomers will depend on four-inch and six-inch telescopes available in the country and SLR-35 mm camera fited with 50 mm diameter lens and orange and blue filters. Binoculars (7×50) will also be used. According to Siddiqui, a visit to the Nainital observatory has been proposed to acquaint the amateurs with the particular region of the sky where the comet will be observed. One important aspect of the amateur programme is to study the socio-psychological impact of the comet on people. Siddiqui says groups of social workers throughout the country will register the public reaction. The people will be given lectures and "information packs" on Halley's comet. Siddiqui also wants the word "apparition" used to describe a comet to be replaced by the word "appearance." The Oxford dictionary defines apparition as a supernatural being or ghost—an obviously incorrect description of a comet, especially in a scientifically advanced society.

BEGINNING 22 SEPTEMBER 1985 BY AMRITLAL

ARIES (15 April—14 May) A lucky week lies ahead of you. Monetary gains through unexpected sources are indicated. Professionals will make steady progress and businessmen will clinch profitable deals. Friends, relatives and family members will contribute to your happiness. Lovers may go ahead with marriage plans. But do not neglect your health and diet.
Good dates: 22, 23 and 25.
Lucky numbers: 1, 5 and 6.
Favourable direction: North-east.

TAURUS (15 May—14 June) Businessmen should not hesitate to undertake risky ventures this week Lovers will find this period congenial. However, students should exercise caution while accepting opportunities. This is not a lucky phase for professionals. Your children may be demanding but deal with them sympathetically Sportsmen and artists will prosper.
Good dates: 23, 24 and 26
Lucky numbers: 2, 6 and 7.
Favourable direction: South.

GEMINI (15 June—14 July) This is not a good week for businessmen. you may lose heavily if you indulge in risky financial deals Professionals, too, should be wary of their colleagues The financial front is not very encouraging. The domestic front will cause fresh problems. A journey you were looking forward to is in the offing For those in service, a promotion cannot be ruled out
Good dates: 24, 25 and 27
Lucky numbers: 3, 7 and 8
Favourable direction: North-west

CANCER (15 July—14 August) Parties and social engagements will keep you busy this week but do not overstrain yourself as this will have an adverse effect on your health. The domestic and financial fronts will remain inspiring Businessmen and professionals will make steady progress. Success is in store for sportsmen too. Your health will improve But this is not a very bright week for lovers
Good dates: 25, 26 and 28.
Lucky numbers: 4, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: East

LEO (15 August—14 September) This is the ideal time to get married The domestic front will remain peaceful. If you are looking for a job, there are chances that you will find one this week. Friends will be particularly helpful. Your financial prospects look bright. You will be called upon to shoulder more responsibilities. If you plan to change your career, do so only after consultation.
Good dates: 23, 25 and 27.
Lucky Numbers: 2, 3 and 4.
Favourable direction: South

VIRGO (15 September—14 October) This is a good week for those in love: you can go ahead with marriage plans. If you are unemployed, there are bright chances that you will find a job this week. A letter will bring unexpected good news towards the middle of the week. But businessmen will find the going tough Avoid legal problems The domestic front will create tension Stay away from politics.
Good dates: 24, 26 and 28.
Lucky numbers: 5, 6 and 7.
Favourable direction: North

LIBRA (15 October—14 November) You are advised not to make any changes in your career this week Professionals will win the praise of their employers while businessmen will encounter opposition Financial gains are in store for you. Lovers should delay marriage plans and avoid controversies. A pleasure trip towards the middle of the week is in the offing
Good dates: 22, 24 and 25.
Lucky numbers: 4, 5 and 6
Favourable direction: South-east

SCORPIO (15 November—14 December) Social engagements will keep you occupied for most of the week but avoid mixing business with pleasure Businessmen should devote more time to their business and they should consult relatives before taking crucial decisions At home, one of your relatives may suddenly fall sick. Avoid undertaking pleasure trips
Good dates: 23, 26 and 27
Lucky numbers: 1, 2 and 3
Favourable direction: North-west

SAGITTARIUS (15 December—14 January) A good phase for lovers and speculators. The mail will bring welcome tidings. The domestic scene will remain peaceful Do not consult your friends and relatives on crucial issues. Be prepared for setbacks on the professional front. Financial gains may come your way but you may have difficulty in retrieving money lent out.
Good dates: 25, 27 and 28.
Lucky numbers: 7, 8 and 9
Favourable direction: South

CAPRICORN (15 January—14 February) For those in love and intending to get married this is the opportune time to do so. Those, connected with the fine arts, are likely to find this period favourable The financial prospects are also bright but avoid extravagance. On the domestic front, your children will be a source of joy A close friend is likely to let you down.
Good dates: 22, 25 and 26
Lucky numbers: 2, 3 and 7.
Favourable direction: South-west.

AQUARIUS (15 February—14 March) If you have legal problems pertaining to property, this is the ideal time to pursue them This period is favourable for creative artists and sportsmen. A marble cutter was asked to mend a hole in the marble facing of a wall. He was given a single slab of marble and told to fill the hole by cutting a new piece into two pieces only, and since marble is so expensive, no bits were to be left over. The hole measured 2 ft by 12 ft, but the piece of marble was 3 ft. by 8 ft. Difficult though it was, the clever marble cutter managed the job. Can you?

CHESS

Many players seem to believe that positional chess and tactical chess are two different games. In particular, when faced with a gambit opening they lose sight of the possibility of a positional response.

In fact, most gambits are best met by careful simplification into a positional game in which the would-be gambiter is left permanently scarred by the effects of his earlier enterprise. Such play requires a perfect understanding of the balance between the three major forces of material, initiative and position. In the following game, White gets this wrong and goes sadly astray.

White: P. Popovic. Black: B. Kurajica. Ruy Lopez – Schliemann Defence. Sarajevo 1985.

1 P–K4	P–K4	2 N–KB3	N–QB3
3 B–N5	P–B4	4 N–B3	PxP
5 NxP	N–B3	6 Q–K2	P–Q4!?

A relatively new and highly ambitious move. The problem is the terrible weakness of Black's KP.

7 NxN	PxN	8 P–Q4	B–N2
9 PxP	0–0

Kurajica (Black)

Popovic (White) to move

The point If 10 PxP QxP 11 0–0 B–N5 Black has superb counterplay Naturally therefore White must find a good way to return the pawn

BRIDGE

This deal (next column) from the final of a Patton team event in Morocco contained two unusual features (apart from deciding the result): North at one table, South at the other, opened 2NT; and the placing of a jack decided whether one team or the other won the short match by a conclusive margin

An American team was playing the top French team and the American North opened 2NT, signifying an unspecified weak pre-empt. Such is life nowadays. Further inquiries established the spade fit and North became declarer in Four Spades. He made twelve tricks.

Dealer North Game all

At the other table the bidding was more natural:

South	West	North	East
—	—	No	No
2NT	No	3♥	dble
4♠	No	5♣	dble
5♦	No	5♥	No
6♥	No	6♠	No
No	No

North's Three Hearts was a transfer bid; East's two doubles pretty silly, in my opinion.

The American West led a trump, leaving declarer to tackle the side suits on his own. Now South could eliminate the red suits and play either West or (by leading low to the king) East for the jack of clubs. He did the wrong thing.

As the other three boards in the set had been small, this result, representing (much) more than 33 per cent of the difference in aggregate points, gave one side an 8-0 advantage. There were also 2 points available on the board-a-match principle; a ridiculously complicated and unfair method of scoring, also practised in Britain

An Imagineer's Dream Come True

To understand what or who an imagineer is, one must dwell on the man who created imagineers. The man was none other than Walt Disney.

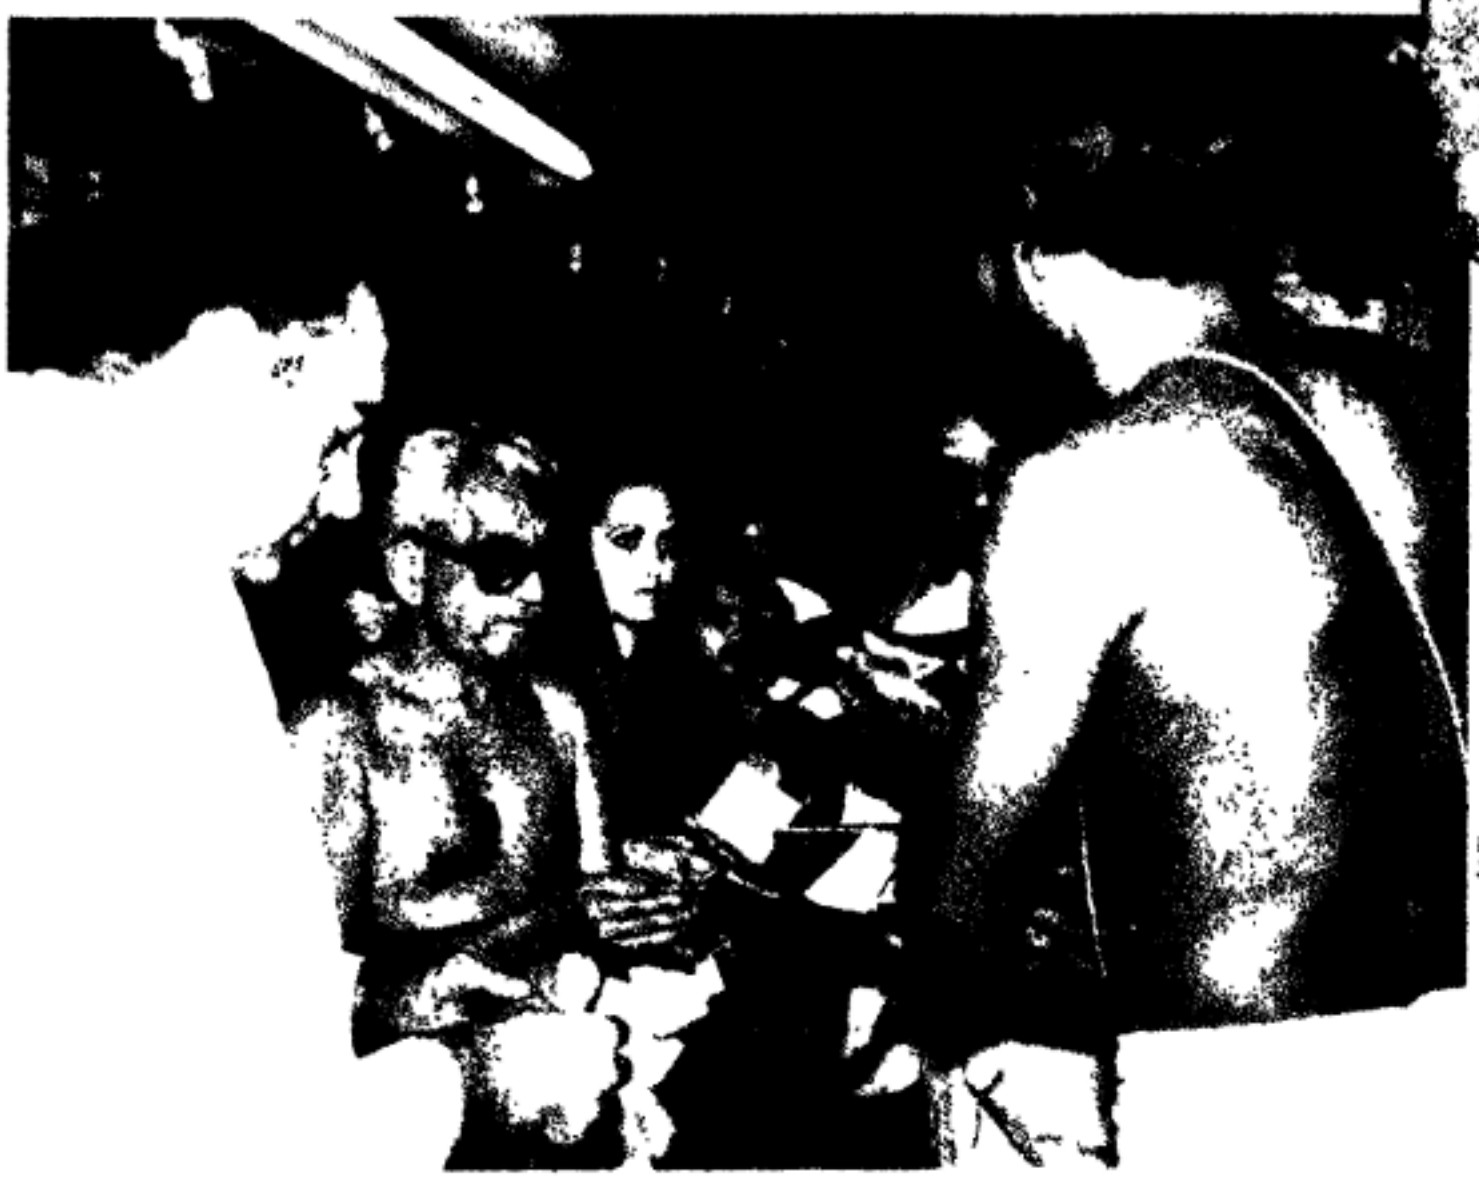
Walt Disney's favourite dream was a playground for the whole family: a large fair where the entire family, could learn while having fun. In 1964, Disney conceptualised EPCOT (Experimental Prototype Community of Tomorrow) to give shape to his dream. He visualised a futuristic community, which would never stop growing and would be continuously testing, introducing and demonstrating new materials and systems. EPCOT would take its "cue from new ideas and new technologies that were emerging from the creative centres of America."

Sadly, while EPCOT was still on the planning board, Disney died on 15 December 1966. It seemed that EPCOT would never materialise. However, imagineers at Walt Elias Disney (WED) Enterprises were determined to make Disney's dream a reality. As a result of the blending of the professional skills and creative imagination of these specialists, EPCOT finally opened as the world's largest fair, nearly three years ago in Florida, USA.

At the entrance of the fairgrounds, stands the geodesic sphere which has become synonymous with EPCOT. It stands on steel legs and is 180 feet in diameter, with millions of shiny facets of aluminium 'skin.' Glittering in the sunlight during the day, and reflecting the polychromatic hues of its surroundings at night, the sphere itself is a stunning work of art: the only one of its kind in the world. And, what lies within the surroundings of EPCOT is even more mind-boggling. The unique 'wedding' of history, technology, entertainment and learning, under the warm Florida sun, occupying acres of spotlessly maintained land, is a truly unforgettable and fascinating experience. Every step is a step into tomorrow.

The highlights of EPCOT are made possible by four unique innovations.

- The audio-animatronic figures (popularly known as A-A figures): A-A is a novel system which blends sound with animation of startlingly life-like, plastic figures of animals and human beings constructed in a Disney workshop.
- The DACS computer central: This controls not only the synchronisation of lip-movements and gestures of the A-A figures, but also looks after minute details of closing and opening of theatre doors and the monorail.
- The monorail system: This innovative system has carried nearly 400 million passengers, to date, between EPCOT and Disney World, through a hotel lobby, over immaculately manicured and verdant countryside.
- The WEDWAY people movers: This is another transport system within EPCOT—a linear induction powered transport system—which carries visitors, on land and through water, along corridors of city bazaars, marshy swamps with lifesize dinosaurs looming large, a world of computers, and on scores of other fascinating journeys.
- Last, but not the least, is the 'city beneath the kingdom': This massive basement helps to maintain the systems above—miles of drainage canals, pipes and cables, hundreds of sewers and garbage disposers, workshops and many other revolutionary technical innovations, which help to keep the city above in perfect spotlessness



And, this is only a glimpse of what imagineering is all about!

DELHI DIARY

Prayer Time

On Janamashtami day Mrs Indira Gandhi was often seen donning traditional clothes (once she wore a Garara) and heading for the Laxminarayan temple in Delhi. What did the Prime Minister of India do on Lord Krishna's birth anniversary this year? Rajiv Gandhi and Sonia Gandhi were on the last lap of their Kerala visit on 7 September. After addressing the public meeting at Palghat, the VVIP couple, accompanied by the chief minister of Kerala, K. Karunakaran, suddenly deviated from the printed programme and the motorcade rushed off to an unknown destination. On learning that there was a famous Krishna temple at Palghat, Rajiv and Sonia Gandhi decided to offer their Janamashtami prayers in the ancient shrine.

Amar, Akbar, Anthony

The Prime Minister's office has two sets of "Amar, Akbar, Anthony" teams. The three parliamentary secretaries, Arun Singh, Ahmed Patel and Oscar Fernandes constitute the first level. They are backed up by the trio of joint secretary Mani Shankar Aiyar, director Wajahat Habibullah and personal secretary Verghese George. Aiyar has been allotted the room in South Block which hitherto was occupied by Mrs Indira Gandhi's (and for a while Rajiv Gandhi's) principal secretary, Dr P.C. Alexander. Apart from advising the PM on media matters, he doubles up as an effective public relations man during Rajiv Gandhi's tours outside the capital. Wajahat Habibullah, who joined the PM's office in the days of Mrs Gandhi, is in charge of processing the public grievances received by the PM's office. George, an old AICC office staff, is always active behind the scenes, unlike his predecessor, R.K. Dhawan (who could always be seen in the photo frames during Mrs Gandhi's public appearances).

Uplift for UP

With the sole exception of Morarji Desai, all Prime Ministers so far have come from Uttar Pradesh. But the state still remains a backward state. Policy planners now seem to have realised the importance of UP. The Industrial Development Bank of India (IDBI) has trebled its assistance to the state. In 1984-85 Rs 692 crores were allocated for UP by the IDBI against its assistance of Rs 225 crores in 1983-84.

TAILPIECE: The Press Trust of India (PTI) is also known as the "Palghat Trust of India" because of the proliferation of appointees in the news agency from this particular Kerala district. It was, perhaps, ironic that the news agency chosen to accompany the PM to Palghat was the UNI, and not the PTI.
